PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE SIXTY-SIXTH CONGRESS
FIRST SESSION.

SENATE.

MONDAY, October 6, 1919.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we come to Thee day by day lifting up our hearts for Thy guidance and blessing. We pray that as we come this morning we may have the touch of the divine spirit upon our hearts. We unite our hearts in asking Thy blessing upon the President of the United States. We seek Thy guidance and blessing upon those who minister to him that he may speedily be restored to health and strength. We pray Thee to keep in Thy tenderest care the life and health and strength of all those whom Thou hast called into places of authority and power in this testing time of our national life. May they all, preserved by Thy grace and power and led by Thy spirit, so cooperate in the great movement of the world to-day as that Thy name may be glorified and the people of this country blessed. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Friday last, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

ESTIMATES OF APPROPRIATIONS (S. DOC. NO. 119).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the United States Employees' Compensation Commission, submitting supplemental estimates of appropriations in the sum of $1,283,000 required by the commission for the compensation fund and contingent expenses of the commission for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 253) for the payment of claims for loss of private property on account of the loss of firearms and ammunition taken by the United States troops during the labor strikes in the State of Colorado in 1914.

The message also announced that the House disagrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8624) to amend an act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel, approved August 10, 1917, insists on its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate, requests a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. HAUGEN, Mr. MCLAUGHLIN of Michigan, and Mr. RUBEY managers at the further conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 396. An act to authorize the payment of certain amounts for damages sustained by prairie fire on the Rosebud Indian Reservation in South Dakota;

H. R. 400. An act authorizing the Sioux Tribe of Indians to submit claims to the Court of Claims;

H. R. 685. An act for the relief of Frank S. Ingalls;

H. R. 974. An act for the relief of W. T. Dingler;

H. R. 1761. An act for the relief of the Farmers National Bank of Wilkinson, Ind.;

H. R. 1812. An act making an appropriation to compensate James M. Moore for damages sustained while in the service of the Government of the United States;

H. R. 1853. An act to reimburse E. T. Thing and S. A. Thing for losses and damages sustained by them by the negligent dipping of their cattle by the Bureau of Animal Industry, Department of Agriculture;

H. R. 5348. An act for the relief of Mrs. Thomas McGovern;

H. R. 5665. An act for the relief of Carlow Avellina; and

H. R. 6413. An act granting the sum of $549.12 to Clara Kane, dependent parent, by reason of the death of William A. Yenser, late civil employee, killed as a result of an accident at the Philadelphia Navy Yard.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 7417) to amend an act of Congress approved March 12, 1914, authorizing the President of the United States to locate, construct, and operate railroads in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes, and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

PEACE TREATY AND LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I ask, if there is no objection, that the Secretary may read a telegram received by me this morning.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none. The Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

LOS ANGELES, CALIF., October 5, 1919.

HON. GILBERT HITCHCOCK,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The following telegram is sent you by the Los Angeles branch of the League to Enforce Peace as a brief summary of important actions that have been taken by individuals and organizations in southern California on the subject of the league of nations and its ratification by the Senate of the United States during and following the visit and address here of Senator HIRAM JOHNSON, and is intended as a recital of the principal facts showing that the sentiment of the people of the State of California is overwhelmingly in favor of the league of nations and directly opposed to the attitude taken on the subject by Senator JOHNSON.

The morning after Senator JOHNSON'S speech in Los Angeles the following letter, as an answer thereto, was addressed to him by more than 150 men and women widely representative of all southern California:

"Your recent statements that California stands with you in your opposition to the covenant of the league of nations is incorrect. Hundreds of polls taken by newspapers, clubs, and societies indicate that at least 75 per cent of the votes are for immediate ratification without amendment, which will be the first great step toward allaying the unrest of the world. Present chaotic world conditions will not, in our judgment, improve until the Allies reach a common understanding in matters of such grave import. We believe a representative ought to reflect the sentiments of the majority."

The above telegram was signed by 21 judges and members of the bar; 43 business men; 9 ministers; 5 educators and college presidents; 10 Federal, State, and county officials; 3 labor leaders; 5 bankers; 4 professional men; and 61 club-women leaders.

The board of directors of the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce, representing a membership of over 3,600, unanimously passed the following resolution:

"Resolved, That it is to the best interests of the country that the United States Senate speedily ratify the treaty and league of nations as it now stands, without amendment."

The following signed statement was published by prominent judges and attorneys:

"We have given careful study to the covenant of the league of nations and have given due attention to the arguments which have been advanced in support and in opposition to the covenant; further, we see clearly that unless the Senate ratifies the peace treaty, with the league of nations, that our country must stand alone against the world and we must enter upon a stupendous program for naval and military armament, which means a crushing burden of taxation upon every man and woman in America, and that our thought and energy must go for munition manufacturing rather than for reconstruction and development of our resources for peaceful pursuits. We urge every thinking man and woman to consider this matter wholly apart from partisan bias, racial hatred, and national jealousy, and to lend his or her influence to secure the ratification of the peace treaty with the league of nations.

"(Signed) N. P. Conrey, presiding justice, department 1, second district court of appeals; W. J. Hunsaker, ex-president of the bar association; Benjamin F. Bledsoe, judge, United States district court; James A. Anderson, ex-president of the bar association; Oscar A. Trippet, judge, United States district court; W. H. Thomas, judge, department 2, second district court of appeals; Frank G. Finlayson, presiding justice, department 2, second district court of appeals; Leslie R. Hewitt, judge, superior court; Henry W. O'Melveny, ex-president of the bar association; John Perry Wood, judge, superior court; John D. Fredericks, former district attorney; W. A. Sloane, justice, department 2, second district court of appeals; Silas Evans, president Occidental College; Roy Malcolm, professor of political science, University of Southern California; Louis W. Meyers, judge, superior court; Dana R. Weller, judge, superior court; Fred H. Taft, judge, superior court; Russ Avery, judge, superior court; Dr. Ernst Carroll Moorehead, Southern Branch, University of California; George F. Bovard, president University of Southern California."

The Central Labor Council of Los Angeles unanimously adopted the following resolution:

"Whereas the American Federation of Labor at its last convention at Atlantic City declared the labor movement in favor of the covenant of the league of nations by practically a unanimous vote—29,000 to 400; and

"Whereas Senator HIRAM W. JOHNSON, while governor of this State, proved himself to be a friend of organized labor on many occasions, and is still highly regarded in consequence; and

"Whereas Senator JOHNSON is now one of the most active opponents of the covenant, so earnestly desired by the organized wage earners of the United States: Therefore be it

"Resolved by the Central Labor Council of Los Angeles, the parent body of 40,000 trade unionists of this city, That we deplore the position taken by Senator JOHNSON, and ask him to cease his opposition to the covenant of the league of nations."

At a meeting of Southern California Club Women, 300 club presidents being in attendance and 16,000 club members being represented, the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

"Resolved, That the Presidents' Council of the Los Angeles District Federation of Women's Clubs, assembled September 27, 1919, approved the ratification of the peace treaty and the covenant of the league of nations, and that telegrams be sent to Senators JOHNSON and PHELAN, notifying them of such action and requesting their support of the same in the United States Senate."

On the morning of Senator JOHNSON's arrival in Los Angeles Mayor Meredith P. Snyder was requested by the Johnson committee to make an address of welcome to the Senator. His response was a 500-word signed statement in support of the league of nations, of which the following is the opening paragraph:

"Whether a man be a high representative of the people of California at Washington or a lowly citizen here at home, he is doing something for which he should be condemned if he attempts to prevent the ratification of the covenant of the league of nations, without offering a substitute for it which will be an improvement."

In addition the mayors of a number of southern California cities, including places of importance, such as Santa Monica, San Bernardino, Pomona, Santa Ana, Passadena, and Ventura, sent signed statements to this organization enthusiastically indorsing the league of nations and requesting its immediate ratification.

The lay and ministerial conferences of the Methodist Episcopal Church of California, representing a total joint membership of approximately 85,000, in two meetings adopted strong resolutions indorsing the league of nations. One of these conferences, representing 50,000 church members, passed at Santa Barbara, Calif., on October 3 the following resolution in the form of a telegram addressed to Senator JOHNSON:

"The Laymen's Association of the Southern California Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, in annual session at Santa Barbara, most heartily indorse the league of nations covenant and urge its speedy ratification. We respectfully call upon you to withdraw your opposition."

President Blaisdell and 52 members of the Pomona College faculty presented a petition personally to Senator JOHNSON, urging that he support the peace treaty and league of nations as presented to the Senate by the President of the United States.

The following telegram was sent to Senator JOHNSON, signed by 32 officials and business men of Riverside County, all Republicans:

"We, the undersigned Republicans of Riverside City and County, do not approve of the stand taken by you on the league of nations. We are strongly for the league of nations."

This telegram was signed by the sheriff, city attorney, judge, chief of police, and 18 business men and church women.

The Church Federation of Los Angeles, representing a constituency of approximately 75,000 church members, adopted the following resolution:

"We believe the treaty of peace and the covenant for the league of nations should be ratified without reservation or amendment at the earliest possible date."

Twenty-two of the members of Senator JOHNSON's Los Angeles reception committee, both men and women, all but two Republicans, publicly withdrew their names from the committee on the ground that they were not in agreement with the Senator on the subject of the league of nations. Included among these were the speaker of the California Legislature, a State senator and assemblyman, superior court judge, two county supervisors, and others prominent in the commercial and club life of this city. Among the letters of withdrawal from the committee the following, by Capt. Walter Brinkop, Three hundred and sixty-fourth Infantry, United States Army, in France, and now president of the American Legion. Here is an example:

"I not only repudiate the use of my name, but I bitterly resent it. There is no pro-Germanism in my blood and therefore I am not with JOHNSON's fight against the league, but am unequivocally for it. Americanism is the big question of the hour, and the league of nations is the big hope of all of us who are true, loyal Americans."

One other member of the Johnson reception committee, who was JOHNSON's former campaign manager in the important city of Pomona, in withdrawing his name from the committee, wrote as follows:

"My name was used without my authority. I consider the policy of the Johnson committee in naming a large list of vice presidents, without securing their consent as unfair and unjust, because it implies an indorsement of Senator JOHNSON's position. I am heartily in favor of the league of nations, and after reading Senator JOHNSON's speeches I can say that I so heartily disapprove of his methods and his attacks upon England and France that I do not want to support him in any manner whatsoever."

A petition circulated for only a few hours among the returned soldiers expressing unqualified approval of the league of nations covenant and calling upon the Senate to ratify without amendment was signed by a total of 212 ex-soldiers, many of whom had just returned from service in France, and including Col. Charles F. Hutchinson, of the One hundred and sixtieth (Los Angeles) Infantry, United States Army; and Capt. Walter Brinkop, of the Three hundred and sixty-fourth Infantry, United States Army, machine-gun commander, and president of the American Legion in Los Angeles.

Many editorial expressions from Republican newspapers in various sections of the State favoring "immediate ratification" of the league covenant, challenging Senator JOHNSON's claim that support of the treaty is "un-American," and voicing the opinion that "the people unmistakably want the peace treaty and the league of nations covenant ratified without hampering amendments" have also been transmitted to our headquarters.

One of the strongest of such expressions, antagonistic to the cause of Senator JOHNSON, came from Chester H. Rowell, proprietor of the Fresno Republican, an intimate friend and former political supporter of Senator JOHNSON. The two Republican daily newspapers of this city, the Los Angeles Times and Los Angeles Express, are unqualified supporters of the league of nations, demanding its immediate ratification and repudiating Senator JOHNSON's attitude.

At a public meeting to-day, Sunday afternoon, every seat in auditorium filled and about 2,000 turned away. JOHNSON's speech was answered by John D. Fredericks, former Republican district attorney and leading attorney of Los Angeles; A. J. Wallace, former Republican lieutenant governor with JOHNSON; and J. Stitt Wilson, distinguished orator and former mayor of Berkeley, Calif., who for more than three hours compared statements of Senator JOHNSON in his Los Angeles address with the language of the treaty and covenant. At the conclusion of the meeting a rising vote was taken on the question of the league of nations, with result that entire audience of nearly 4,000 stood up as favoring the league of nations, with only 20 remaining seated.

LEAGUE TO ENFORCE PEACE, COUNTY ORGANIZATION,
By WM. BOWEN, President.
ROY MALCOM, Secretary.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the telegram which has just been read into the RECORD from the League to Enforce Peace lays stress upon the proposition that some of the former political friends of Senator JOHNSON, of California, disagree with him as to the league of nations, I suppose drawing the inference that he would thereby suffer politically. It may be possible, Mr. President, that Senator JOHNSON will be able to recoup his losses of Republicans in California by gains from the Democrats in Massachusetts. I desire to read a portion of the platform which was adopted by the Massachusetts Democrats, in convention assembled on last Saturday. They favor the ratification of the treaty, "provided the covenant is so amended"—not that reservations shall be made in it but that it shall be so amended—"as to give to no other nation more votes than the United States; to protect the sovereignty of the American people; to protect the right of self-determination, and to refrain from adding to the burden of peoples wanting to be free and independent."

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President——

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Florida permit me to ask the Senator from Idaho a question?

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator from Idaho will allow me, I desire to interrupt him. Why does the Senator not also ask to have inserted in the RECORD the Republican platform which was adopted in Massachusetts in juxtaposition to the Democratic platform? It might possibly throw some further light on the subject.

Mr. BORAH. No; I do not think it would throw any light upon the particular subject; but if the Senator from Minnesota can see any light in it, I shall be very glad to have it inserted. So, Mr. President, I ask also to insert the Republican platform, although I have not it upon my desk at this moment. I desire to have inserted in the RECORD both platforms as soon as full copies can be secured.

While I am on my feet I desire to say that, notwithstanding the assurances that this question would not enter the domain of politics, there seems to be some danger of its getting into the political arena, for every political organization and every political meeting which has gathered together since this matter came before the people has declared upon this question, one way or the other. I now yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I was going to make an observation along the lines of the statement made by the Senator from Minnesota that I thought the Republicans would probably offset the Democrats in Massachusetts.

Mr. BORAH. In what respect does the Senator think so?

Mr. TRAMMELL. In regard to their indorsement of the league of nations with no modifications or amendments which would result in reopening negotiations. That seems to have been the indorsement of the Republicans in Massachusetts.

Mr. BORAH. I am perfectly willing to have the Republican platform inserted in the RECORD; and, so far as my construction of it is concerned, I understand it to be an indorsement of reservations, unmistakable and efficient to accomplish certain things which they define. While that is not my program, it is far from being the program, as I understand, of those who are in favor of the treaty upon the other side of the Chamber. So I do not see any particular consolation to them in that platform. However, I shall be glad to insert it in the RECORD.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho has somewhat mistaken my purpose in presenting the telegram from California showing a tremendous repudiation of Senator JOHNSON'S views upon the league of nations. My purpose was not to show that Senator JOHNSON had lost personal following there; my purpose was to show that the Republicans of that State, the business men, the laboring men, the churches, the women, large portions of the reception committee, and many of his former campaign managers repudiated his attitude upon the league of nations. I am not saying that those elements of the community in California may not still be in favor of the Senator from California as a Republican candidate for President of the United States; I am introducing it to show that Republican sentiment and public sentiment generally in California is so overwhelmingly strong in favor of a league of nations that they repudiate even the attitude of a favorite son upon that subject, which shows a strength greater than any that I can conceive of in any State in the Union.

Mr. BORAH. How does the Senator construe the Democratic platform in Massachusetts with reference to the amendment of Senator JOHNSON? Does he construe that to be in harmony with his position?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am not construing platforms. If I were to construe platforms, I would construe the platform which was adopted by the Republican convention in Massachusetts, to which reference has already been made and which, with the Senator's permission, I should like to read at length——

Mr. BORAH. I will permit the Senator to read it; but the difference between the Senator from Nebraska and the Senator from Idaho is that I am perfectly willing to construe both platforms; it does not make any difference to me which platform the Senator reads; but will not the Senator before he takes his seat state what he understands to be the position of the great Democratic Party in the State of Massachusetts with reference to the particular proposition which Senator JOHNSON represents?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, the Democratic Party of the State of Massachusetts has on so few occasions been of any service to the national Democratic Party that I am not so much interested in their attitude. However, there is one notable exception, which has given us the presence of the able Democratic Senator from Massachusetts, Mr. WALSH, but such events are so rare and depend so largely on personal strength that we who represent debatable States and Democratic States are not worrying about the resolutions that may be adopted by the Democrats of Republican Massachusetts. We see, however, a peculiar significance when the dominant Republican Party of the State from which the Republican leader hails speaks on the treaty. The chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee is the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], and in a platform adopted in his presence the Massachusetts convention denounces and condemns amendments to the treaty reported by the committee of which he is chairman and supported by him in the Senate. We see in the attitude of those Republicans from Massachusetts, as we see in the attitude of the Republicans of California repudiating the attitude of their favorite son, a tremendous evidence that the Republican as well as the Democratic sentiment of the people of the United States is overwhelmingly in favor of the league of nations.

Mr. BORAH. It seems to me that the Senator's reference to the Democrats in Massachusetts is hardly justified by the facts; the Democrats of Massachusetts have furnished quite as much strength to this Chamber in the present situation as have the Democrats in Nebraska. The Democrats of Nebraska have furnished one Senator and the Republicans have furnished one, and that is what the Democrats of Massachusetts have done.

Mr. HITCHCOCK, Mr. McCORMICK, and Mr. EDGE addressed the Chair.

Mr. BORAH. Just a moment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. This is not a chorus.

Mr. BORAH. It is true, Mr. President, that the Democrats of Nebraska have furnished a candidate for President more often than have the Democrats of Massachusetts, but they are not any nearer the White House than the Democrats of Massachusetts.

Mr. THOMAS, Mr. McCORMICK, and Mr. EDGE addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Four Senators are on their feet. To whom does the Senator from Idaho yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield first to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. I merely wish to ask the Senator from Idaho if he does not think that this discussion powerfully supports the President of the United States in so far as he has urgently requested the people of the United States not to make this a partisan question?

Mr. BORAH. I do not know that it is a partisan question, but it is a political question, and that is a matter in which I have always been interested. It is not so material to me which side either party gets on. I expect them to take positions, though, and they have taken positions, and they will continue to take positions. Now, I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, I wanted to ask if our seniors in experience would not enlighten the novices in the Senate as to the significance of the Alabama elections? In Massachusetts politicians assembled in conventions spoke; but in Alabama the people spoke.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I shall be very glad to have more light.

Mr. EDGE. It occurred to me that the Senator from Nebraska was somewhat critical as to Democracy in Massachusetts and did not seem to be very much impressed with the action of the Democratic convention in that great State. I thought it perhaps appropriate to draw his attention to the action of the Democratic Party in the State of New Jersey in the State convention only a week ago. The Democratic Party in New Jersey, perhaps unfortunately, has been of some consequence to the Democratic development throughout the country, and a week or 10 days ago, when the Democratic convention was held in the city of Trenton, they passed unanimously a resolution as part of their platform that they would not indorse the league of nations—mind you, the President's own State—unless it took proper care of the people of Ireland.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, this is out of order from the standpoint that we have enough discussion of the league of nations in the afternoon; but the Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK] recently referred to the election in Alabama. There were a good many issues involved in that election, but undoubtedly the issue over the ratification of the league of nations was one of the issues. The Republican candidate was occupying a position in emphatic repudiation of the league and the ratification of the treaty with the league in it, while the Democratic candidate was sustaining the position of the President of the United States. I do not know what the exact official returns are, but my information is that the Democratic candidate carried the district by a normal majority.

I have seen some statements in the paper recently with reference to this district that are very misleading. I saw in one of the papers yesterday the statement that the usual majority was 4,000. As a matter of fact, since I have been in Congress that district has been twice represented by a Republican. Mr. Burnett, who represented it for 20 years, carried it largely on account of his great personal popularity; but he rarely got a majority of over 1,000, and one time his majority was only 326. I think, though, in the last elections during the war, due to war conditions, Mr. Burnett got the largest majority that his district ever had, and that was a majority of something over 3,000. I think, though, that if you will take the trouble to estimate the results, you will see that the present candidate was elected by a majority that equaled the average majority in the district.

Now, Mr. President, I do not think that decides the question as to how we should vote on the league of nations, or as to how public opinion is divided on the subject. The seventh Alabama district is a good deal like the eastern Tennessee district and the western Virginia district. It is the district in the State of Alabama where the largest number of Republicans live. It is largely a white district. There are very few negroes in it. It is what we call a mountain district; and although the league of nations was an issue, the vote was along old-time party lines, and largely determined along those lines, and our candidate won out by a majority that I think was about an average majority. So I do not claim that there was anything very remarkable in the vote in favor of the league of nations, and I am sure there was nothing in that vote or that election that sustained the Republican contention that the league of nations ought to be eliminated from the treaty.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I quite agree with the Senator from Alabama that there is nothing in the popular vote which should determine how Senators should vote here; but it is a fact, nevertheless, that the Republican candidate was pronouncedly and uncompromisingly against the league of nations and made his campaign upon that issue.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And got beaten.

Mr. BORAH. And got beaten by 45 votes, according to the last telegram.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think the Senator will find he is mistaken about that.

Mr. BORAH. I received a telegram just before I came into the Chamber from Mr. Pollack, with whom I have been in touch since the campaign opened, in which he said that, according to the count at the present time, the Democratic candidate was 45 votes ahead. That is my authority.

ADDRESS OF HERBERT C. HOOVER.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I ask to have inserted in the RECORD the report which I send to the desk of an address by Mr. Hoover on the league of nations, which was delivered in Palo Alto, Calif., on October 2.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Herbert C. Hoover explained his views on the peace treaty to the students of Stanford University and his own townspeople. He stated he had been urged to do so by ex-President Taft and others.

Mr. Hoover began by saying he was not impatient of honest debate and did not criticize the Senate for not accepting the treaty out of hand. He touched on the difficult situation in Paris and said none could have been more disappointed than the American delegation that great wrongs, the result of secret treaties, were not eradicated by the conference.

NO OBLIGATION TO FIGHT.

Coming specifically to the league of nations, he said in part:

"We hear the cry that the league obligates that our sons be sent to fight in foreign lands. Yet the very intent and structure of the league is to prevent war. There is no obligation for the United States to engage in military operations or to allow any interference with our internal affairs without the full consent of our representatives in the league. If there is any danger that we should be charged with an obligation to go to war, either direct or implied, without the full consent and approval of Congress, I believe the President will be the first to agree to any interpretation that this can not be.

THE FRENCH VIEW.

"The French Government so far takes this view: That it has requested from us a separate military guaranty for themselves. The league is founded expressly in the attempt to secure the specific settlement of these questions without military force. To me every line of it is the complete negation of militarism. Its opposition in Paris arose entirely from the representatives of the old militaristic régimes and from the reactionaries of the world in general. They saw in it truly the undermining of militarism. What they foresaw has already happened in a great military nation, the British, where the population, broken under a load of taxation, is responding quickly to the new possibility of international safety without the burden of gigantic naval armament. It would have been impossible to give liberty to the score of new nations of militarily weak yet liberty-loving people without the league to safeguard them from invasion.

"I paid a recent visit to many of the capitals of the new States, and the first anxious question of their officials was, 'Will America ratify the league?' Their invariable statement was that without it their only course was the hopeless effort to arm themselves against stronger neighbors; to do it in the midst of misery; to endeavor to set up groups and military alliances, all the old treadmill of oppression of arms and ultimate war.

WANT TREATY TO FAIL.

"There are many elements in Europe who wish to see the treaty break down and the league of nations disappear. For instance, during the last five months our allies have been growing weaker from a military point of view, due to the necessity of demobilizing their armies, while at the same time the reactionary group in Germany has been growing in strength through the hope of yet securing a division of the Allies.

"At the time I left Europe, a month ago, a German militarism had already reestablished itself as a well disciplined, well officered army of at least 400,000 men, largely congregated on the Polish frontier, and even defying the Government at Berlin. If the treaty is ratified the German Army will be reduced to 200,000 men. The failure of the treaty means the invasion of the Polish State.

"This is only one of the powder magazines in Europe which can not be destroyed until this treaty is ratified, and during every day of delay more explosives are poured into them.

"If the balance of power is to supplant the league of nations we will have torn asunder the only hope that Europe will not break into further wars of races, classes, and combinations that will take civilization back to the Middle Ages.

CHAOS WITHOUT TREATY.

"I am confident that if we attempt now to revise the treaty we shall tread a road through European chaos. Even if we managed to keep our soldiers out of it, we will not escape fearful economic losses. If the league is to break down we must at once prepare to fight.

"Few people seem to realize the desperation to which Europe has been reduced. During the coming winter some of them will look with longing eyes on this rich, fat Nation, possessing great surpluses of every human necessity, while they endure inevitable hunger and cold. Others of them will be plunged into war with their neighbors, and we have already experienced the impossibility of maintaining neutrality with self-respect and safety.

"We can not fiddle while Rome burns. The Allies may themselves ratify this treaty without us, and thus assemble a council of nations of their own in an endeavor to solve the problems of Europe. It would be a council of Europe, and in the midst of these terrible times, considering the debts they owe us, the material they must have from us or starve, I would rather that we be represented therein lest it become a league of Europe against the Western Hemisphere. A peace without us means more Army and Navy for us, with the old treadmill of taxes and dangers for us.

"Neither the gospel of hate nor the gospel of unpreparedness is the road to peace. The true road lies in every effort to remove the causes of war, not in tearing down such structure of peace as we have, nor in blindness to present dangers. Those who think we can isolate ourselves seem to ignore the fact that modern communication has shortened our distance from our neighbors from a month to an hour.

ECONOMIC LOSSES.

"We are an overseas people and we are dependent upon Europe for a market for the surplus products of our farmers and laborers. Without order in Europe we will at best have business depression, unemployment, and all their train of troubles. With renewed disorganization in Europe, social diseases, and anarchy thrive, and we are infected by every social wind that blows from Europe.

"Our expansion overseas has entangled us for good or ill, and I stand for an honest attempt to join with Europe's better spirits to prevent these entanglements from involving us in war. We are not dealing with perfection, we are dealing with the lesser of evils. These are reasons of interest.

"There are also reasons of idealism and true national interest lies along the path of practical ideals. It was with the hope of ending war that we went into it. To fix peace in international law—that idea dominated our representatives in the peace conference. We have expended the lives of our sons and an enormous portion of our wealth hoping to see these ends made secure. For us to refuse to enter into a joint attempt with the well-thinking sections of a large part of the world, to establish a continuing moral conscience against war, is the utmost folly in our own interests.

SHALL WE DESERT NOW?

"We fought the attempt to impose autocracy on the world. We won. We imposed democracy all over Europe. We set up a score of new democracies, and there are in many of them peoples of our own blood—in the Baltic, Polish and Slav races. Are we to refuse our counsels to these peoples now struggling to realize our own ideals?

"I am one of those who hold that this war would never have happened if the nations of Europe had accepted the invitation of Sir Edward Grey to a conference of civilians in July, 1914. We have now seen the most terrible five years of history, because the reactionaries of Europe refused to come into a room to discuss the welfare of humanity. From this mighty political, social, and economic upheaval there has resulted a host of outstanding problems which can breed war at any minute. The liberal world is not asking for soldiers, it is asking for our economic and moral weight, our idealism, and our distinterested sense of justice. Are we not to take the responsibility that rests on the souls of those men in Europe who refused this invitation in 1914?"

ADDRESSES OF PRESIDENT WILSON.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I also ask to have inserted in the RECORD the remaining addresses of the President of the United States upon his recent trip in the West.

There being no objection, the addresses were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE PRESIDENT AT SAN DIEGO, CALIF., SEPTEMBER 19, 1919.

"Mr. Mayor, ladies, and gentlemen, it is very agreeable to have been indirectly introduced by my friend Mr. Gage, for whom I have so affectionate a regard. I know he will not mind my saying that I first met him when we were both 'lame ducks.' I had just come out of the hospital after an operation and he had one arm out of commission from neuritis, and we met sitting, rather helplessly and perhaps hopelessly, on one of the broad piazzas of one of the hotels at Palm Beach. Being fellow sufferers and comrades in misery, we were drawn toward each other and drawn into confidences which I greatly enjoyed, and which I now recall with peculiar pleasure in seeing Mr. Gage without his hand bound up and in the sort of health I would wish to see him in. What he has said has reminded me of one of the thoughts which has been prominent in my mind of late. He has spoken of our dealings with the Philippine Islands. One of the perplexities under which we have suffered is that, although we were leading the Philippine Islands toward independence, we were in doubt of what would happen to them when they obtained their independence. Before this conference at Paris, the only thing that could be suggested was that we should get a common guaranty from all the nations of the world that the Philippines should be regarded as neutral, just as Belgium was once regarded as neutral, and that they should guarantee her inviolability, because it was certainly to be expected that she would not be powerful enough to take care of herself against those who might wish to commit aggression against her. That serves as a very useful illustration of one of the purposes for which the league of nations has been established, for do you not observe that the moment we are ready to give independence to the Philippines her independence is already guaranteed, because all the great nations of the world are under engagement of the most solemn sort to respect and preserve her territorial integrity and her existing political independence as against external aggression? Those words 'external aggression' are sometimes left out of the exposition of article 10. There was not a member of that peace conference with whom I conferred who did not hold the same opinion that I hold as to the sacred right of self-determination and did not hold the principle which all Americans hold, that it was not the right of any nation to dictate to another nation what sort of government it should have or under what sort of sovereignty it should live.

"For us the problem of the future of the Philippines is solved by the league of nations. It is the first time that the world has come to this mind about matters of that sort, and what brought it to that mind? The breakdown of the neutrality of Belgium. You know you can not establish civil society if anybody is going to be a neutral with regard to the maintenance of the law. We are all bound in conscience, and all public officers are bound in oath, not to remain neutral with regard to the maintenance of the law and the vindication of the right, and one of the things that occurred in this conference, as a sort of practical joke on myself, was this: One of the principles that I went to Paris most insisting on was the freedom of the seas. Now, the freedom of the seas means the definition of the right of neutrals to use the seas when other nations are at war, but under the league of nations there are no neutrals, and, therefore, what I have called the practical joke on myself was that by the very thing that I was advocating it became unnecessary to define the freedom of the seas. All nations are engaged to maintain the right, and in that sense no nation can be neutral when the right is invaded, and, all being comrades and partners in a common cause, we all have an equal right to use the seas. To my mind it is a much better solution than had occurred to me, or than had occurred to anyone else with regard to that single definition of right.

"We have no choice, my fellow citizens, in this matter except between these alternatives: We must go forward with this concert of nations or we must go back to the old arrangement, because the guaranties of peace will not be sufficient without the United States, and those who oppose this covenant are driven to the necessity of advocating the old order of balances of power. If you do not have this universal concert, you have what we have always avoided, necessary alignment of this or that nation with one other nation or with some other group of nations. What is disturbing me most about the present debate—not because I doubt its issue, but because I regret its length—is that it is heartening the representatives of Germany to believe that at last they are going to do in this way what they were not able to do by arms, separate us in interest and purpose from our associates in the war. I am not suggesting, I have no right to suggest, that the men who are opposing this covenant have any thought of assisting Germany in their minds, but my point is that by doing what they are doing they are assisting Germany, whether they want to do so or not. And it is not without significance, my fellow countrymen, that coincidentally with this debate there has been a revival of the pro-German propaganda all over the United States, for this is Germany's calculation that, inasmuch as she is obliged to stand apart and be for the time suspected and have other nations come slowly to accommodation with her, if we hold off other nations will be similarly alienated from us, as they will be, and that there will be, whether we design it or not, a community of interest between the two isolated nations. It is an inevitable psychological result. We must join this arrangement to complete the psychology of this war.

"The psychology of this war is this, that any nation that attempts to do what Germany did will certainly have the world combined against it. Germany not only did not know she would have the world combined against her, but she never dreamed she would. Germany confidently expected that Great Britain would not go into the war; she never dreamed that America would go into the war, and in order not absolutely to disheaven her people she had continuously to lie to them and tell them that the submarine warfare was so effective that American troops could not be sent to Europe. Friends of mine who, before we went into the war, conversed with Germans on the other side and told them that they had come over since the submarine warfare began were not believed. The Germans said, 'Why, you can not cross the sea.' The body of the German people actually thought that the sea was closed, and that we could send 2,000,000 men over there without losing any of them, except on a single transport, was incredible to them. If they had ever dreamed that that would happen they never would have ventured upon so foolish an attack upon the liberties of mankind.

"What is impressed upon my mind by my stay on the other side of the water more than any one thing is that, while old rivalries and old jealousies and many of the intricate threads of history woven in unhappy patterns have made the other nations of the world suspect one another, nobody doubts or suspects America. That is the amazing and delightful discovery that I made on the other side of the water. If there was any place in our discussions where they wanted troops sent, they always begged that American troops might be sent, because they said none of the other associated powers would suspect them of any ulterior designs, and that the people of the country itself would know that they had not gone there to keep anything that they took, that they had not gone there to interfere with their internal affairs; that they had gone not as exploiters but as friends. That is the reputation of American soldiers throughout Europe, and it is their reputation because it is true. That is the beautiful background of it. That is the temper in which they go; that is the principle upon which they act and upon which the Government back of them acts, and the great people whom that Government represents. There is something more than the choosing between peace and armed isolation, for that is one aspect of the choice. We are choosing between a doubtful peace and an assured peace, guided and led by the United States of America.

"I was very much interested to scan the names on a very beautifully engrossed communication that was put in my hands to-day by Mr. Gage, a communication from the representatives of the League to Enforce Peace. I found upon it the names of many of the principal and most representatives citizens and professional men of San Diego, and it happened, I believe, unless I am misinformed, that practically all the signers were Republicans. There is one thing against which I wish to enter a protest. I have had, I do not know how many, men come to me and say, 'Mr. President, I am a Republican, but I am for the league of nations.' Why but? For as a Democrat you will permit me to remind you who are Republicans that you have always boasted that your party was the party of constructive programs. Here is the most constructive, the greatest constructive, program ever proposed. Why should you say but? If I were in your place and had in my heart the pride which you very properly entertain because of the accomplishments of your party, I would say, 'I am a Republican, and for that reason I am in favor of the league of nations.' But I am not going to say that I am a Democrat, and therefore in favor of the league of nations, because I am not in favor of it because I am a Democrat. I am in favor of it because I am an American and a believer in humanity, and I believe in my heart that if the people of this country, as I am going about now, were to suspect that I had political designs they would give me evident indication that they wanted me to go back to Washington right away. They would not give me the splendid and delightful welcomes they are giving me. Men and women would not come up to me as they are doing now and take my hand in theirs and say, 'Mr. President, God bless you!' I wonder if you realize, as I have tried to realize, what that gracious prayer means. I have had women who had lost their dearest in the war come up to me with tears upon their cheeks any say, 'God bless you!' Why did they bless me? I advised the Congress to go into the war and to send their sons to their death. As Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, I sent their sons to their death, and they died, and their mothers come and say 'God bless you!' There can be only one explanation. They are proud of the cause in which their sons died; and, my friends, since we all have to die, the way those fellows died is the best way after all. There was nothing in it for them, no possible personal gain, nothing except the noble performance of a disinterested duty, and that is the highest distinction that any man can achieve.

"I remember years ago reading an essay that left a permanent impression on my mind. It was entitled 'Christmas, Its Unfinished Business.' It was a discourse upon what was then a very common occurrence—the meeting of assemblies to promote peace. You know, we used to be always having conventions to promote peace, and most of the men who sat on the platform were men who were doing everything they could to bring on war by unjustly exploiting other countries and taking advantages that they should not take, that were sure to exasperate the feeling of people elsewhere. But they did not realize that they were really bringing on wars; they, in their minds, were trying to bring on peace, and the writer of the essay called attention to this. His thesis was, 'There will be peace when peace is as handsome as war.' He hurried to explain that what he meant was this: That leaving aside the men who may have unjustly and iniquitously plotted war—like the general staff in Germany—the men in the ranks gave everything that they had, their lives included, for their country, and that while you would always hang the boy's musket or the boy's sword up over the mantelpiece, you never would hang up his ledger or his yardstick or his spade; not that civil employments meant to support yourself are dishonorable, but that they are centered upon yourself, whereas the sword and the gun mean that you had forgotten yourself and remembered only the call of your country. Therefore, there was a certain sacredness about that implement that could not attach to any implement of civil life. 'Now,' said my essayist, 'when men are devoted to the purposes of peace with the same self-forgetfulness and the same thought for the interest of their country and the cause that they are devoted to that they display under arms in war, then there will be no more war. When the motives of peace are as disinterested and as handsome as the motives of war for the common soldier, then we will all be soldiers in an army of peace and there will be no more wars.' Now, that comes about when there is a common conception of peace, and the heart of this covenant of peace is to bring nations together into consultation so that they will see which of their objects are common, so that they will discuss how they can accommodate their interests, so that their chief objective will be conciliation and not alienation; and when they understand one another, they will cooperate with one another in promoting the general interest and the common peace. It is the parliament of nations at last, where everyone is under covenant himself to do right, to respect and preserve the territorial integrity and existing political independence of the others, and where everyone engages never to go to war without first trying to settle the matter by the slow-cooling, disinterested processes of discussion. It is what we have been striving for for generation after generation, and now some men hesitate to accept it when the golden thing is placed in their hand. It would be incredible to me if I did not understand some of them, but it is not permitted to one occupying my present office to make personal remarks. After all, personal remarks are neither here nor there. What does any one of us matter in so great a thing as this? What difference does it make whether one man rises and another falls, or we all go down or go up together? We have got to serve humanity. We have got to redeem the honor of the United States. We have got to see this thing through to its great end of justice and peace."

THE PRESIDENT AT HOTEL ALEXANDRIA, LOS ANGELES, CALIF., SEPTEMBER 20, 1919.

"Mr. Toastmaster and ladies and gentlemen, may I not first thank you, Mr. Toastmaster, for your very generous introduction. It spoke in the same delightful tone of welcome that I have heard in the voices on the street to-day, and, although I do not accept for myself the praise that you have so generously bestowed upon me, I nevertheless do recognize in it that you have set just the right note for the discussion which I wanted for a few moments to attempt.

"There is only one thing, my fellow citizens, that has daunted me on this trip. My good father used to teach me that you can not reason out of a man what reason did not put in him, and, suspecting—may I not say knowing—that much of the argument directed against the league of nations is not based upon reason, I must say I have sometimes been puzzled how to combat it, because it is true, as your toastmaster has said, that there is a great constructive plan presented, and no man in the presence of the present critical situation of mankind has the right to oppose any constructive plan except by a better constructive plan. I will say now that I am ready to take ship again and carry back to Paris any constructive proposals which appear a suitable and better substitute for those which have been made.

"There is a peculiarity about this constructive plan which ought, I think, to facilitate our acceptance of it. It is laid out in every part upon American principles. Everybody knows that the principles of peace proposed by America were adopted, were adopted as the basis of the armistice and have been acted upon as the basis of the peace, and there is a circumstance about those American principles which gives me absolute confidence in them. They were not principles which I originated. They would have none of the strength in them that they have if they had been of individual origination. I remember how anxiously I watched the movements of opinion in this country during the months immediately preceding our entrance into the war. Again and again I put this question to the men who sat around the board at which the Cabinet meets: They represented different parts of the country, they were in touch with the opinion in different parts of the United States, and I would frequently say to them, 'How do you think the people feel with regard to our relation to this war?' And I remember, one day, one of them said, 'Mr. President, I think that they are ready to do anything you suggest.' I said, 'That is not what I am waiting for. That is not enough. If they do not go in of their own impulse, no impulse that I can supply will suffice, and I must wait until I know that I am their spokesman. I must wait until I know that I am interpreting their purpose. Then I will know that I have got an irresistible power behind me.' And that is exactly what happened.

"That is what is now appreciated as it was not at first appreciated on the other side of the sea. They wondered and wondered why we did not come in. They had come to the cynical conclusion that we did not come in because we were making money out of the war and did not want to spoil the profitable game; and then at last they saw what we were waiting for, in order that the whole plot of the German purpose should develop, in order that we might see how the intrigue of that plot had penetrated our own life, how the poison was spreading, and how it was nothing less than a design against the freedom of the world. They knew that when America once saw that she would throw her power in with those who were going to redeem the world. And at every point of the discussion I was attempting to be the mouthpiece of what I understood right-thinking and forward-thinking and just-thinking men without regard to party or section in the United States to be purposing and conceiving, and it was the consciousness in Europe that that was the case that made it possible to construct the peace upon American principles. The American principles were not only accepted. They were acted upon, and when I came back to this country with that plan I think you will bear me out that the Nation was prepared to accept it. I have no doubt, and I have not met anybody who had any well-reasoned doubt, that if immediate action could have been secured upon the treaty at that time only a negligible percentage of our people would have objected to its acceptance, without a single change in either the wording or the punctuation. But then something intervened, and, my fellow citizens, I am not only not going to try to analyze what that was, I am not going to allow my own judgment to be formed as regards what it was. I do not understand it, but there is a certain part of it that I do understand. It is to the immediate interest of Germany to separate us from our associates in the war, and I know that the opposition to the treaty is most acceptable in those quarters of the country where the pro-German sentiment was strongest. I know that all over the country German propaganda has lifted its hideous head again, and I hear the hiss of it on every side.

"When gentlemen speak of isolation, they forget we would have a companion. There would be another isolated nation, and that is Germany. They forget that we would be in the judgment of the world in the same class and at the same disadvantage as Germany. I mean sentimental disadvantage. We would be regarded as having withdrawn our cooperation from that concerted purpose of mankind which was recently conceived and exercised for the liberation of mankind, and Germany would be the only nation in the world to profit by it. I have no doubt there are scores of business men present. Do you think we would profit materially by isolating ourselves and centering upon ourselves the hostility and suspicion and resistance of all the liberal minds in the world? Do you think that if, after having won the absolute confidence of the world and excited the hope of the world, we would lead if we should turn away from them and say, 'No; we do not care to be associated with you any longer; we are going to play a lone hand; we are going to play it for our single advantage'? Do you think after that there is a very good psychology for business, there is a very good psychology for credit? Do you think that throws foreign markets open to you? Do you remember what happened just before we went into the war? There was a conference in Paris, the object of which was to unite the peoples fighting against Germany in an economic combination which would be exclusively for their own benefit. It is possible now for those powers to organize and combine in respect of the purchase of raw materials, and if the foreign market for our raw materials is united, we will have to sell at the price that they are willing to pay or not sell at all. Unless you go into the great economic partnership with the world, you have the rest of the world economically combined against you. So that if you bring the thing down to this lowest of all bases, the bases of material self-interest, you lose in the game, and, for my part, I am free to say that you ought to lose.

"We are told that we are strong and they are weak; that we still have economic or financial independence and they have not. Why, my fellow citizens, what does that mean? That means that they went into the redemption of the freedom of the world sooner than we did and gave everything that they had to redeem it. And now we, because we did not go in so soon or lose so much, want to make profit of the redeemers! The thing is hideous. The thing is unworthy of every tradition of America. I speak of it not because I think that sort of thing takes the least hold upon the consciousness or the purpose of America but because it is a pleasure to condemn so ugly a thing.

"When we look at the objections which these gentlemen make, I have found in going about the country that the result has been that in the greater part of the United States the people do not know what is in the treaty. To my great surprise, I have had to stand up and expound the treaty—tell the people what is in it—and I have had man after man say, 'Why, we never dreamed that those things were in the treaty. We never heard anything about that.' No; you never heard anything about the greater part of the enterprise; you only heard about some of the alleged aspects of the method in which the enterprise was to be carried out. That is all you have heard about. I remember saying—and I believe it was the thought of America—that this was a people's war and the treaty must be a people's peace. That is exactly what this peace treaty proposes. For the first time in the history of civilized society, a great international convention, made up of the leading statesmen of the world, has proposed a settlement which is for the benefit of the weak and not for the benefit of the strong. It is for the benefit of peoples who could not have liberated themselves, whose weakness was profitable to the ambitious and imperialistic nations, whose weakness had been traded in by every cabinet in Europe; and yet these very cabinets represented at the table in Paris were unanimous in the conviction that the people's day had come and that it was not their right to dispose of the fortunes of people without the consent of those people themselves.

"At the front of this great settlement they put the only thing that will preserve it. You can not set weak peoples up in independence and then leave them to be preyed upon. You can not give a false gift. You can not give to people rights which they never enjoyed before and say, 'Now, keep them if you can.' That is an Indian gift. That is a gift which can not be kept. If you have a really humane purpose and a real knowledge of the conditions of peace in the world, you will have to say, 'This is the settlement and we guarantee its continuance.' There is only one honorable course when you have won a cause—to see that it stays won and nobody interferes with or disturbs the results. That is the purpose of the much-discussed article 10 in the covenant of the league of nations. It is the Monroe doctrine applied to the world. Ever since Mr. Monroe uttered his famous doctrine we have said to the world, 'We will respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and the political independence of every State in the Western Hemisphere,' and those are practically the words of article 10. Under article 10 all the members of the league engage to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of the other member States, and if that guaranty is not forthcoming the whole structure of peace will crumble, because you can not point out a great war that has not begun by a violation of that principle; that has not begun by the intention to impair the territorial integrity or to interfere with the political independence of some body of people of some nation. It was the heart of the Pan-German plan. It is the heart of every imperialistic plan, because imperialism is the design to control the destinies of people who did not choose you to control them. It is the principle of domination. It is at the opposite extreme from the principle of self-determination and self-government, and in that same covenant of the league of nations is the provision that only self-governing States shall be admitted to the membership of the league. No influence shall be injected there which is not sympathetic with the fundamental principle, namely, that ancient and noble principle that underlies our institutions, that all just government depends upon the consent of the governed.

"You have no choice, my fellow citizens, because the peoples of the world, even those that slept, are awake. There is not a country in the world where the great mass of mankind is not now aware of its rights and determined to have them at any cost, and the present universal unrest in the world, which renders return to normal conditions impossible so long as it continues, will not stop until men are assured by some arrangement they can believe in that their rights will be protected and that they can go about the normal production of the necessaries of life and begin to enjoy the ordinary pleasures and privileges of life without the constant shadow of some cloud of terror over them, some threat of injustice, some tyranny of control. Men are not going to stand it. If you want to quiet the world, you have got to reassure the world, and the only way in which you can reassure it is to let it know that all the great fighting powers of the world are going to maintain that quiet, that the fighting power is no longer to be directed toward aggression, but is to be directed toward protection. And every great fighting nation in the world will be in the league—because Germany for the time being is not a great fighting power. That great nation of over 60,000,000 people has consented in the treaty to reduce its standing armed force to 100,000 men and to give up all the war material over and above what is necessary to maintain an army of 100,000 men; so that for the time being we may exclude Germany from the list of the fighting nations of the world. The whole power of the world is now offered to mankind for the maintenance of peace, and for the maintenance of peace by the very processes we have all professed to believe in, by substituting arbitration and discussion for war, by substituting the judgment of mankind for the force of arms. I say without qualification that every nation that is not afraid of the judgment of mankind will go into this arrangement. There is nothing for any nation to lose whose purposes are right and whose cause is just. The only nations that need fear to go into it are those that have designs which are illegitimate, those which have designs that are inconsistent with justice and are the opposite of peace.

"The whole freedom of the world not only, but the whole peace of mind of the world, depends upon the choice of America, because without America in this arrangement the world will not be reassured. I can testify to that. I can testify that no impression was borne in deeper upon me on the other side of the water than that no great free peoples suspected the United States of ulterior designs, and that every nation, the weakest among them, felt that its fortunes would be safe if intrusted to the guidance of America; that America would not impose upon it. At the peace table one of the reasons why American advice constantly prevailed, as it did, was that our experts, our financial experts, our economic experts, and all the rest of us—for you must remember that the work of the conference was not done exclusively by the men whose names you all read about every day; it was done in the most intensive labor of experts of every sort who sat down together and got down to the hardpan of every subject that they had to deal with—were known to be disinterested, and in nine cases out of ten, after a long series of debates and interchanges of views and counterproposals, it was usually the American proposal that was adopted. That was because the American experts came at last into this position of advantage, they had convinced everybody that they were not trying to work anything, that they were not thinking of something that they did not disclose, that they wanted all the cards on the table, and that they wanted to deal with nothing but facts. They were not dealing with national ambitions, they were not trying to disappoint anybody, and they were not trying to stack the cards for anybody. It was that conviction, and that only, which led to the success of American counsel in Paris.

"Is not that a worthy heritage for people who set up a great free Nation on this continent in order to lead men in the ways of justice and of liberty? My heart was filled with a profound pride when I realized how America was regarded, and my only fear was that we who were over there would not have wisdom enough to play the part. Delegations from literally all parts of the world came to seek interviews with me as the spokesman of America, and there was always a plea that America should lead; that America should suggest. I remember saying to one of the delegations, which seemed to me more childlike in its confidence than the rest, 'I beg that you gentlemen will not expect the impossible. America will do everything that she can, but she can not do some of the things that you are expecting of her. My chief fear is to disappoint, because you are expecting what can not be realized.' My fear was not that America would not prove true to herself, but that the things expected of her were so ideal that in this practical world, full of obstacles, it would be impossible to realize the expectation. There was in the background the infinite gratification at the reputation and confidence that this country had won.

"The world is in that situation industrially, economically, politically. The world will be absolutely in despair if America deserts it. But the thing is inconceivable. America is not going to desert it. The people of America are not going to desert it. The job is to get that into the consciousness of men who do not understand it. The job is to restore some of our fellow citizens to that large sort of sanity which makes a man bigger than himself. We have had a great many successful men in America, my fellow citizens, but we have seldom erected a statue to a man who was merely successful in a business way. Almost all the statues in America, almost all the memorials, are erected to men who forgot themselves and worked for other people. They may not have been rich, they may not have been successful in the worldly sense, they may have been deemed in their generation dreamers and idealists, but when they were dead America remembered that they loved mankind, America remembered that they embodied in those dreamy ideals of theirs the visions that America had had, America remembered that they had a great surplus of character that they spent not upon themselves but upon the enterprises of humanity. A man who has not got that surplus capital of character that he spends upon the great enterprises of communities and of nations will sink into a deserved oblivion, and the only danger is that in his concentration upon his own ambitions, in his centering of everything that he spends upon himself, he will lead others astray and work a disservice to great communities which he ought to have served. It is now an enterprise of infection ahead of us—shall I call it? We have got to infect those men with the spirit of the Nation itself. We have got to make them aware that we will not be led; that we will not be controlled; that we will not be restrained by those who are not like ourselves; and that America now is in the presence of the realization of the destiny for which she has been waiting.

"You know, you have been told, that Washington advised us against entangling alliances, and gentlemen have used that as an argument against the league of nations. What Washington had in mind was exactly what these gentlemen want to lead us back to. The day we have left behind us was a day of alliances. It was a day of balances of power. It was a day of 'every nation take care of itself or make a partnership with some other nation or group of nations to hold the peace of the world steady or to dominate the weaker portions of the world.' Those were the days of alliances. This project of the league of nations is a great process of disentanglement. I was reading only this morning what a friend of mine reminded me of, a speech that President McKinley made the day before he was assassinated, and in several passages of that speech you see the dawn of this expectation in his humane mind. His whole thought was against isolation. His whole thought was that we had by process of circumstance, as well as of interest, become partners with the rest of the world. His thought was that the world had grown little by quickened methods of intercommunication. His whole thought was that the better we knew each other and the closer we drew together, the more certain it would be that the processes of arbitration would be adopted; that men would not fight but would talk things over; that they would realize their community of interest; and shot all through that speech you see the morning light of just such a day as this. It would look as if the man had been given a vision just before he died—one of the sweetest and most humane souls that have been prominent in our affairs, a man who thought with his head and with his heart. This new day was dawning upon his heart, and his intelligence was beginning to draw the lines of the new picture which has been completed and sketched in a constructive document that we shall adopt and that, having adopted it, we shall find to reflect a new glory upon the things that we did. Then what significance will attach to the boy's sword or the boy's musket over the mantelpiece—not merely that he beat Germany but that he redeemed the world."

THE PRESIDENT AT AUDITORIUM, LOS ANGELES, CALIF., SEPTEMBER 20, 1919.

"Mr. Mayor, Mrs. Cowles, my fellow countrymen, I esteem it a great privilege to stand before this audience, and I esteem it one of the most interesting occasions that I have had to expound a theme so great that I am always afraid that I am inadequate to its exposition. I esteem it a privilege to be in the presence that I find myself in, on the stage with this committee of gentlemen representing the nations with whom we have been associated in the war, with these men who saved the Union and with these men who saved the world.

"I feel that there is a certain sense in which I am rendering my account to the soldiers and sailors whose Commander in Chief I have been, for I sent them across the sea believing that their errand was not only to defeat Germany but also to redeem the world from the danger to which Germany had exposed it, to make the world a place in which arbitration, discussion, the processes of peace, the processes of justice should supplant the brutal processes of war. I came back from the other side proud that I was bringing with me a document which contained a great constructive plan to accomplish that very thing. It is a matter of unaffected amazement on my part, my fellow citizens, that there should be men in high station who oppose its adoption. It is a matter of amazement that they should devote their scrutiny to certain details and forget the majesty of the plan, that they should actually have made is necessary that I should go throughout the country telling the people of the United States what is in the treaty of peace. For they have not told you. They have given you no conception of its scope. They have not expounded its objects. They have not shown you how it is a people's and not a statesmen's peace. They have not shown you how at its heart lies the liberation of nations. They have not shown you that in it is the redemption of our promise that we were fighting for the right of the weak and not for the power of the strong. These promises are redeemed in that great document, these hopes are realized, and the only buttress for that great structure is the league of nations. If that should fail, there is no guaranty that any part of the settlement will stand. If that should fail, nations will once more sink back into that slough of despond in which they formerly struggled, suspecting one another, rivaling one another in preparation for war, intriguing against one another, plotting against the weak in order to supplement the power of the strong.

"And they did more than that, because mankind is now aware that the rights of the greater portion of mankind have not been safeguarded and regarded. Do not for a moment suppose that the universal unrest in the world at the present time, my fellow citizens, is due to any whim, to any newborn passion, to any newly discovered ambition. It is due to the fact, the sad, the tragic fact, that great bodies of men have throughout the ages been denied the mere rights of humanity. The peoples of the world are tired of a time with governments that exploit their people, and they are determined to have, by one process or another, that concerted order of conciliation and debate and conference which is set up in the great document that we know as the covenant of the league of nations. The heart of that document is not in the mere details that you have heard about. The heart of that document is that every great fighting nation in the world—for Germany at present is not a great fighting nation—solemnly engages that it will never resort to war without first having done one or other of two things, either submitted the matter in dispute to arbitration, in which case it agrees to abide by the verdict, or, if it does not choose to submit it to arbitration, submit it to the discussion and examination of the council of the league of nations, before whom it promises to lay all the documents, to whom it promises to disclose all the pertinent facts, by whom it agrees all the documents and facts shall be published and laid before the opinion of the world. It agrees that six months shall be allowed for the examination of those documents and facts by the council of the league and that, even if it is dissatisfied with the opinion finally uttered, it will still not resort to war until three months after the opinion has been rendered. All agree that there shall be nine months of deliberate discussion and frank weighing of the merits of the case before the whole jury of mankind before they will go to war.

"If any one of them disregards that promise and refuses to submit the question in dispute either to arbitration or to discussion, or goes to war within less than the nine months, then there is an automatic penalty that is applied, more effective, I take leave to say, than war itself, namely, the application of an absolute boycott. The nation that disregards that promise, we all agree, shall be isolated; shall be denied the right to ship out goods or to ship them in, to exchange telegraphic messages or messages by mail, to have any dealings of any kind with the citizens of the other members of the league. First, the pressure of opinion and then the compelling pressure of economic necessity—those are the great bulwarks of peace. Do you say they are not sufficient? I put this proposition to you: You want insurance against war. Wouldn't you rather have 10 per cent insurance than none? If you could get 20 per cent insurance, wouldn't you be delighted? If you got 50 per cent insurance, wouldn't you think it Utopian? Why, my fellow citizens, if you examine the provisions of this league of nations, I think you will agree with me that you have got 99 per cent insurance. That is what we promised the mothers and wives and sweethearts of these men that they should have—insurance against the terrible danger of losing those who were dear to them, slain upon the battle field because of the unhallowed plots of autocratic governments. Autocratic governments are excluded henceforth from respectable society. It is provided in the covenant of the league of nations that only self-governing peoples shall be admitted to its membership, and the reason that Germany is for the time being excluded is that we want to wait and see whether she really has changed permanently her form of constitution and her habit of government. If she has changed her mind in reality, if her great people have taken charge of their own affairs and will prove it to us, they are entitled to come into respectable society and join the league of nations. Until then they are on probation, and to hear some of them talk now you would think the probation had to be rather long, because they do not seem to have repented of their essential purpose.

"Now, offset against this, my fellow citizens, some of the things that are being said about the covenant of the league and about the treaty. I want to begin with one of the central objections which are made to the treaty, for I have come here disposed to business. I do not want to indulge in generalities. I do not want to dwell more than it is proper to dwell upon the great ideal purposes that lie behind this peace and this covenant. I want to contrast some things that have been said with the real facts. There is nothing that is formidable in this world in public affairs except facts. Talk does not matter. As I was saying the other night, if you suspect any acquaintance of yours of being a fool, encourage him to hire a hall. Your fellow citizens will then know whether your judgment of him was right or wrong, and it will not be you that convinced them, it will be he who does the convincing. The best way to dissipate nonsense is to expose it to the open air. It is a volatile thing, whereas fact and truth are concrete things and you can not dissipate them that way. Perhaps I may tell a rather trivial story. When I was governor of New Jersey I got rather reluctant support for a certain measure of reform that I was very much interested in from a particular member of the senate of the State who, I think, if he had been left to his own devices, would probably have not voted for the measure, but to whom an influential committee of his fellow townsmen came and, so to say, personally conducted his vote. After they had successfully conducted it in the way that they wished, they solemnly brought him into my office to be congratulated. It was a great strain upon my gravity, but I pulled as straight a face as I could and thanked him and congratulated him. Then, tipping a very heavy wink indeed he said, 'Governor, they never get me if I see them coming first.' Now, I have adopted that as my motto with regard to facts. I never let them get me if I see them coming first. The danger for some of the gentlemen we are thinking about to-night, but not mentioning, is that the facts are coming and they do not see them. My prediction is that the facts are going to get them and make a very comfortable meal off of them.

"Let us take up some of these things, to grow serious again. In the first place, there is that very complex question of the cession of the rights which Germany formerly enjoyed in Shantung Province, in China, and which the treaty transfers to Japan. The only way in which to clear this matter up is to know what lies back of it. Let me recall some circumstances which probably most of you have forgotten. I have to go back to the year 1898, for it was in March of that year that these cessions which formerly belonged to Germany were transferred to her by the Government of China. What had happened was that two German missionaries in China had been murdered. The central Government at Peking had done everything that was in its power to do to quiet the local disturbances, to allay the local prejudice against foreigners which led to the murders, but had been unable to do so, and the German Government held them responsible, nevertheless, for the murder of the missionaries. It was not the missionaries that the German Government was interested in. That was a pretext. Ah, my fellow citizens, how often we have made Christianity an excuse for wrong! How often in the name of protecting what was sacred we have done what was tragically wrong! That was what Germany did. She insisted that, because this thing had happened for which the Peking Government could not really with justice be held responsible, a very large and important part of one of the richest Provinces of China should be ceded to her for sovereign control, for a period of 99 years, that she should have the right to penetrate the interior of that Province with a railway, and that she should have the right to exploit any ores that lay within 30 miles either side of that railway. She forced the Peking Government to say that they did it in gratitude to the German Government for certain services which she was supposed to have rendered but never did render. That was the beginning. I do not know whether any of the gentlemen who are criticizing the present Shantung settlement were in public affairs at that time or not, but I will tell you what happened, so far as this Government was concerned.

"One of the most enlightened and humane Presidents we have ever had was at the head of the Government—William McKinley, a man who loved his fellow men and believed in justice—and associated with him was one of our ablest Secretaries of State—Mr. John Hay. The state of international law was such then that they did not feel at liberty to make even a protest against these concessions to Germany. Neither did they make any protest when, immediately following that, similar concessions were made to Russia, to Great Britain, and to France. It was almost immediately after that that China granted to Russia the right of the possession and control of Port Arthur and a portion of the region of Talien-Wan. Then England, not wishing to be outdone, although she had similar rights elsewhere in China, insisted upon a similar concession and got Weihaiwei. Then France insisted that she must have a port, and got it for 99 years. Not against one of those did the Government of the United States make any protest whatever. They only insisted that the door should not be shut in any of these regions against the trade of the United States. You have heard of Mr. Hay's policy of the open door. That was his policy of the open door—not the open door to the rights of China, but the open door to the goods of America. I want you to understand, my fellow countrymen, I am not criticizing this, because, until we adopt the covenant of the league of nations, it is an unfriendly act for any government to interfere in the affairs of any other unless its own interests are immediately concerned. The only thing Mr. McKinley and Mr. Hay were at liberty to do was to call attention to the fact that the trade of the United States might be unfavorably affected and insist that in no circumstances it should be. They got from all of these powers the promise that it should not be—a promise which was more or less kept. Following that came the war between Russia and Japan, and at the close of that war Japan got Port Arthur and the rights which Russia enjoyed in China, just as she is now getting Shantung and the rights her recently defeated enemy had in China—an exactly similar operation. That peace that gave her Port Arthur was concluded, as you know, on the territory of the United States—at Portsmouth, N. H. Nobody dreamed of protesting against that. Japan had beaten Russia. Port Arthur did not at that time belong to China; it belonged for the period of the lease to Russia, and Japan was ceded what Japan had taken by the well-recognized processes of war.

"Very well, at the opening of this war, Japan went and took Kiaochow and supplanted Germany in Shantung Province. The whole process is repeated, but repeated with a new sanction. In the meantime, after this present war began, England and France, not at the same time, but successively, feeling that it was essential that they should have the assistance of Japan on the Pacific, agreed that if Japan would go into this war and take whatever Germany had in the Pacific she should retain everything north of the Equator which had belonged to Germany. That treaty now stands. That treaty absolutely binds Great Britain and France. Great Britain and France can not in honor, having offered Japan this inducement to enter the war and to continue her operations, consent to an elimination of the Shantung provision from the present treaty. Very well, let us put these gentlemen who are objecting to the Shantung settlement to the test. Are they ready to fight Great Britain and France and Japan, who will have to stand together, in order to get this Province back for China? I know they are not, and their interest in China is not the interest of assisting China, but of defeating the treaty. They know beforehand that a modification of the treaty in that respect can not be obtained, and they are insisting upon what they know is impossible; but if they ratify the treaty and accept the covenant of the league of nations they do put themselves in a position to assist China. They put themselves in that position for the very first time in the history of international engagements. They change the whole faith of international affairs, because after you have read the much-debated article 10 of the covenant I advise you to read article 11. Article 11 says that it shall be the friendly right of any member of the league to call attention at any time to anything, anywhere, that threatens to disturb the peace of the world or the good understanding between nations upon which the peace of the world depends. That in itself constitutes a revolution in international relationships. Anything that affects the peace of any part of the world is the business of every nation. It does not have simply to insist that its trade shall not be interfered with; it has the right to insist that the rights of mankind shall not be interfered with. Not only that, but back of this provision with regard to Shantung lies, as everybody knows or ought to know, a very honorable promise which was made by the Government of Japan in my presence in Paris, namely, that just as soon as possible after the ratification of this treaty they will return to China all sovereign rights in the Province of Shantung. Great Britain has not promised to return Weihaiwei; France has not promised to return her part. Japan has promised to relinquish all the sovereign rights which were acquired by Germany for the remaining 78 of the 99 years of the lease, and to retain only what other Governments have in many other parts of China, namely, the right to build and operate the railway under a corporation and to exploit the mines in the immediate neighborhood of that railway. In other words, she retains only the rights of economic concessionaires. Personally, I am frank to say that I think all of these nations have invaded some of the essential rights of China by going too far in the concessions which they have demanded, but that is an old story now, and we are beginning a new story. In the new story we all have the right to talk about what they have been doing and to convince them, by the pressure of the public opinion of the world, that a different course of action would be just and right. I am for helping China and not turning away from the only way in which I can help her. Those are the facts about Shantung. Doesn't the thing look a little different?

"Another thing that is giving some of our fellow countrymen pangs of some sort—pangs of jealousy, perhaps—is that, as they put it, Great Britain has six votes in the league and we have only one. Well, our one vote, it happens, counts just as heavily as if every one of our States were represented and we had 48, because it happens, though these gentlemen have overlooked it, that the assembly is not an independent voting body. Great Britain has only one representative and one vote in the council of the league of nations, which originates all action, and its six votes are in the assembly, which is a debating and not an executive body. In every matter in which the assembly can vote along with the council it it necessary that all the nations represented on the council should concur in the affirmative vote to make it valid, so that in every vote, no matter how many concur in it in the assembly, in order for it to become valid, it is necessary that the United States should vote aye.

"Inasmuch as the assembly is a debating body, that is the place where this exposure that I have talked about to the open air is to occur. It would not be wise for anybody to go into the assembly with purposes that will not bear exposure, because that is the great cooling process of the world; that is the great place where gases are to be burned off. I ask you, in debating the affairs of mankind, would it have been fair to give Panama a vote, as she will have, Cuba a vote, both of them very much under the influence of the United States, and not give a vote to the Dominion of Canada, to that great energetic Republic in South Africa, to that place from which so many liberal ideas and liberal actions have come, that stout little Commonwealth of Australia? When I was in Paris the men I could not tell apart, except by their hats, were the Americans and the Australians. They both had the swing of fellows who say, 'The gang is all here, what do we care?' Could we deny a vote to that other little self-governing nation, for it practically is such in everything but its foreign affairs, New Zealand, or to those toiling—I was about to say uncounted—millions in India? Would you want to deprive these great communities of a voice in the debate? My fellow citizens, it is a proposition which has never been stated, because to state it answers it. But they can not outvote us. If we, as I said a minute ago, had 48 votes in the assembly, they would not count any more than our 1, because they would have to be combined, and it is easier to combine 1 than to combine 48. The vote of the United States is potential to prevent anything that the United States does not care to approve. All this nonsense about six votes and one vote can be dismissed and you can sleep with perfect quiet. In order that I may not be said to have misled you, I must say that there is one matter upon which the assembly can vote, and which it can decide by a two-thirds majority without the concurrence of all the States represented in the council, and that is the admission of new members to the league.

"Then, there is that passion that some gentlemen have conceived, that we should never live with anybody else. You can call it the policy of isolation or the policy of taking care of yourself, or you can give any name you choose to what is thoroughly impossible and selfish. I say it is impossible, my fellow citizens. When men tell you that we are, by going into the league of nations, reversing the policy of the United States, they have not thought the thing out. The statement is not true. The facts of the world have changed. It is impossible for the United States to be isolated. It is impossible for the United States to play a lone hand, because it has gone partners with all the rest of the world with regard to every great interest that it is connected with. What are you going to do? Give up your foreign markets? Give up your influence in the affairs of other nations and arm yourselves to the teeth and double your taxes and be ready to spring instead of ready to cooperate? We are tied into the rest of the world by kinship, by sympathy, by interest in every great enterprise of human affairs. The United States has become the economic center of the world, the financial center. Our economic engagements run everywhere, into every part of the globe. Our assistance is essential to the establishment of normal conditions throughout the world. Our advice is constantly sought. Our standards of labor are being extended to all parts of the world just so fast as they can be extended. America is the breeding center for all the ideas that are now going to fecundate the great future. You can no more separate yourselves from the rest of the world than you can take all the tender roots of a great tree out of the earth and expect the tree to live. All the tendrils of our life, economic and social and every other, are interlaced in a way that is inextricable with the similar tendrils of the rest of mankind. The only question which these gentlemen can ask us to decide is this: Shall we exercise our influence in the world, which can henceforth be a profound and controlling influence, at a great advantage or at an insuperable disadvantage? That is the only question that you can ask. As I put it the other night, you have got this choice: You have got to be either provincials, little Americans, or big Americans, statesmen. You have got to be either ostriches with your heads in the sands or eagles. I doubt if the comparison, with the head in the sands, is a good one, because I think even an ostrich can think in the sand. What he does not know is that people are looking at the rest of him. Our choice is in the bird kingdom, and I have in my mind's eye a future in which it will seem that the eagle has been misused. You know that it was a double-headed eagle that represented the power of Austria-Hungary, you have heard of the eagles of Germany, but the only proper symbol of the eagle is the symbol for which we use it—as the bird of liberty and justice and peace.

"I want to put it as a business proposition, if I am obliged to come down as low as that, for I do not like in debating the great traditions of a free people to bring the debate down to the basis of dollars and cents; but if you want to bring it down to that, if anybody wants to bring it down to that, reason it out on that line. Is it easier to trade with a man who suspects and dislikes you or with one who trusts you? Is it easier to deal with a man with a grouch or with a man who opens his mind and his opportunities to you and treats you like a partner and a friend? There is nothing which can more certainly put a drop of acid into every relationship we have in the world than if we now desert our former associates in this war. That is exactly what we should be doing if we rejected this treaty, and that is exactly what, speaking unwisely and too soon, the German leaders have apprised us that they want us to do. No part of the world has been so pleased by our present hesitation as the leaders of Germany, because their hope from the first has been that sooner or later we would fall out with our associates. Their hope was to divide us before the fighting stopped, and now their hope is to divide us after the fighting. You read how a former German privy councillor, I believe he was, said in an interview the other day that these debates in the Senate looked to him like the dawn of a new day. A new day for the world? No; a new day for the hopes of Germany, because he saw what anybody can see who lifts his eyes and looks in the future—two isolated nations; one isolated nation on probation, and then two, the other a nation infinitely trusted, infinitely believed in, that had given magnificent purpose of its mettle and of its trustworthiness, now drawing selfishly and suspiciously apart and saying, 'You may deceive us, you may draw us into broils, you may get us into trouble; we will take care of ourselves, we will trade with you and we will trade on you.' The thing is inconceivable. America is no quitter, and least of all is she a quitter in a great moral enterprise where her conscience is involved. The only immortal thing about America is her conscience. America is not going to be immortal because she has immense wealth. Other great nations had immense wealth and went down in decay and disgrace, because they had nothing else. America is great because of the ideas she has conceived. America is great because of the purposes she has set herself to achieve. America is great because she has seen visions that other nations have not seen, and the one enterprise that does engage the steadfast loyalty and support of the United States is an enterprise for the liberty of mankind.

"How can we make the purpose evident? I was saying in one place to-night that my dear father had once taught me that there was no use trying to reason out of a man what reason did not put in him, and yet here to-night I am trying to apply the remedy of reason. We must look about and find some other remedy, because in matters of this sort remedies are always homeopathic—like must cure like. Men must be made to see the great impulses of the Nation in such a fashion that they will not dare to resist them. I do not mean by any threat of political disaster. Why, my fellow citizens, may I indulge in a confidence? I have had men politically disposed say to me, as a Democrat, 'This is all to the good. These leaders of the Republican Party in Washington are going to ruin the party.' They seem to think that I will be pleased. I do not want to see the great Republican Party misrepresented and misled. I do not want to see any advantage reaped by the party I am a member of because another great party has been misrepresented, because I believe in the loyalty and Americanism and high ideals of my fellow citizens who are Republicans just as much as I believe in those things in Democrats. It seems almost absurd to say that; of course I do. When we get to the borders of the United States we are neither Republicans nor Democrats. It is our privilege to scrap inside the family just as much as we please, but it is our duty as a Nation in those great matters of international concern which distinguish us to subordinate all such differences and to be a united family and all speak with one voice what we all know to be the high conceptions of American manhood and womanhood.

"There is a tender side to this great subject. Have these gentlemen no hearts? Do they forget the sons that are dead in France? Do they forget the great sacrifice that this Nation has made? My friends, we did not go to France to fight for anything special for America. We did not send men 3,000 miles away to defend our own territory. We did not take up the gage that Germany had thrown down to us because America was being specially injured. America was not being specially injured. We sent those men over there because free people everywhere were in danger and we had always been, and will always be, the champion of right and of liberty. That is the glory of these men that sit here. The hardest thing that I had to do, and the hardest thing that a lot of you had to do, was to continue to wear civilian clothes during the war, not to don a uniform, not to risk something besides reputation—risk life and everything. We knew that an altar had been erected upon which that sacrifice could be made more gloriously than upon any other altar that had ever been lifted among mankind, and we desired to offer ourselves as a sacrifice for humanity. And that is what we shall do, my fellow citizens. All the mists will pass away. A number of halls are being hired. All the gases are being burned off; and when you come down, as the gases have passed away, to the solid metal of which this Nation is made, it will shine as lustrously and bright as it has ever shone throughout the history of the Nation we love and the Nation we will always consecrate ourselves to redeem."

"My fellow countrymen, it is impossible in these circumstances for me to attempt a speech, but I can not let the occasion go by without telling you how strong it makes my heart that you should have given me so extraordinary and delightful a welcome as this. It is the more delightful to me because I believe that it is not only a desire to welcome me, but a desire to show your interest and your support of the great cause I have come out to advocate. The happy circumstance of this journey is that I have not come out to advocate anything personal to myself; that I have not come out to seek the fortunes of any man or group of men, but to seek the safety and the guaranted peace of mankind. We undertook a great war for a definite purpose. That definite purpose is carried out in a great treaty. I have brought the treaty back, and we must not much longer hesitate to ratify it, because that treaty is the guaranty of peace; it is the guaranty of permanent peace, for all the great fighting nations of the world are combined in it to maintain a just settlement. Without this treaty, without the covenant of the league of nations which it contains, we would simply sink back into that slough of despond in which mankind was before this war began, with the threat of war and of terror constantly over them. We can not go back. We will not go back.

"It is more than a guaranty of peace. It is a guaranty of justice. For example, it affords the only hope that China can get of the restoration to herself not only of the sovereignty of Shantung, but of the sovereignty which other nations as well have taken away from her. It affords the only expectation, in similar cases elsewhere, that by the pressure, the terrible, irresistible pressure of public opinion throughout the world, ancient wrongs will be righted and men will get the chance to live that they never had before. It is the first combination of the power of the world to see that justice shall reign everywhere. We can not turn away from such an arrangement, and I am sure, my fellow citizens, not only from this great outpouring here, but from the great outpourings I have seen everywhere in this country, that the heart of America is right and her purpose is irresistible."

THE PRESIDENT FROM REAR OF PLATFORM AT OGDEN, UTAH, SEPTEMBER 23, 1919.

"I can not make a real speech in the circumstances, but it would be ungracious of me if I did not say how delightful I have felt the welcome of Ogden to be and how refreshing it is to me to come into contact with you, my fellow citizens, in this part of the world which I wish I knew much better. You will understand that the theme that I have most at heart needs a lot of sea room to turn in, and I would despair of making any adequate remarks about so great a matter as the treaty of peace or the league of nations; but I do find this, my fellow countrymen, that the thing is very near the heart of the people. There are some men in public life who do not seem to be in touch with the heart of the people, but those who are know how that heart throbs deep and strong for this great enterprise of humanity, for it is nothing less than that. We must set our purposes in a very definite way to assist the judgment of public men. I do not mean in any way to coerce the judgment of public men, but to enlighten and assist that judgment, for I am convinced, after crossing the continent, that there is no sort of doubt that 80 per cent of the people of the United States are for the league of nations, and that the chief opposition outside legislative halls comes from the very disquieting element that we had to deal with before and during the war. All the elements that tended toward disloyalty are against the league, and for a very good reason. If this league is not adopted we will serve Germany's purpose, because we will be dissociated from the nations, and I am afraid permanently dissociated from the nations, with whom we cooperated in defeating Germany. Nothing is so gratifying, we now learn by cable, to public opinion in Germany as the possibility of their doing now what they could not do by arms, separating us in feeling when they could not separate us in fact. I for my part am in to see this thing through, because these men who fought the battles on the fields of France are not now going to be betrayed by the rest of us; we are going to see that the thing they fought for is accomplished, and it does not make any difference how long the fight or how difficult the fight, it is going to be won, and triumphantly won."

THE PRESIDENT AT RENO, NEV., SEPTEMBER 22, 1919.

"Gov. Boyle, Mr. Chairman, my fellow countrymen, the governor and your chairman have both alluded to the fact that it does not often happen that the President comes to Nevada. Speaking for this President, I can say that it was not because he did not want to come to Nevada more than once, because from the first, when I have studied the movements of the history of this great country, nothing has fascinated me so much or seemed so characteristic of that history as the movement to the frontier, the constant spirit of adventure, the constant action forward. A wit in the East recently said, explaining the fact that we were able to train a great army so rapidly, that it was so much easier to train an American army than any other because you had to train them to go only one way. That has been true of America and of the movement of population. It has always been one way. They have never been returning tides. They have always been advancing tides, and at the front of the advancing tide have always been the most adventurous spirits, the most originative spirits, the men who were ready to go anywhere and to take up any fortune to advance the things that they believed in and desired. Therefore, it is with a sense of exhilaration that I find myself in this community, which your governor has described as still a frontier community. You are a characteristic part of this great country which we all love.

"And it is the more delightful to look at your individual aspect, because the subject that I have come to speak about is a forward-looking subject. Some of the critics of the league of nations have their eyes over their shoulders; they are looking backward. I think that is the reason they are stumbling all the time; they are always striking their feet against obstacles which everybody sees and avoids and which do not lie in the real path of the progress of civilization. Their power to divert, or to pervert, the view of this whole thing has made it necessary for me repeatedly on this journey to take the liberty that I am going to take with you to-night, of telling you just what kind of a treaty this is. Very few of them have been at pains to do that. Very few of them have given their audiences or the country at large any conception of what this great document contains or of what its origin and purpose are. Therefore, I want, if you will be patient with me, to set the stage for the treaty, to let you see just what it was that was meant to be accomplished and just what it was that was accomplished.

"Perhaps I can illustrate best by recalling some history. Something over a hundred years ago the last so-called peace conference sat in Vienna—back in the far year 1815, if I remember correctly. It was made up, as the recent conference in Paris was, of the leading statesmen of Europe. America was not then drawn into that general family and was not represented at that conference, and practically every Government represented at Vienna at that time, except the Government of Great Britain, was a Government like the recent Government of Germany, where a small coterie of autocrats were able to determine the fortunes of their people without consulting them, were able to use their people as puppets and pawns in the game of ambition which was being played all over the stage of Europe. But just before that conference there had been many signs that there was a breaking up of that old order, there had been some very ominous signs, indeed. It was not then so long ago that, though there were but 3,000,000 people subject to the Crown of Great Britain in America, they had thrown off allegiance to that Crown successfully and defied the power of the British Empire on the ground that nobody at a distance had a right to govern them and that nobody had a right to govern them whom they did not choose to be their government; founding their government upon the principle that all just government rests upon the consent of the governed. And there had followed, as you remember, that whirlwind of passion that we know as the French Revolution, when all the foundations of French Government not only, but of French society, had been shaken and disturbed—a great rebellion of a great suffering population against an intolerable authority that had laid all the taxes on the poor and none of them on the rich, that had used the people as servants, that had made the boys and men of France play upon the battle field as if they were chessmen upon a board. France revolted and then the spirit spread, and the conference of Vienna was intended to check the revolutionary spirit of the time. Those men met in order to concert methods by which they could make monarchs and monarchies safe, not only in Europe but throughout the world.

"The British representatives at that conference were alarmed because they heard it whispered that European governments, European monarchies, particularly those of the center of Europe, those of Austria and Germany—for Austria was then stronger than Germany—were purposing to extend their power to the Western Hemisphere, to the Americas, and the prime minister of Great Britain suggested to Mr. Rush, the minister of the United States at the Court of Great Britain, that he put it in the ear of Mr. Monroe, who was then President, that this thing was afoot and it might be profitable to say something about it. Thereupon, Mr. Monroe uttered his famous Monroe doctrine, saying that any European power that sought either to colonize this Western Hemisphere or to interfere with its political institutions, or to extend monarchical institutions to it, would be regarded as having done an unfriendly act to the United States, and since then no power has dared interfere with the self-determination of the Americas. That is the famous Monroe doctrine. We love it, because it was the first effective dam built up against the tide of autocratic power. The men who constituted the Congress of Vienna, while they thought they were building of adamant, were building of cardboard. What they threw up looked like battlements but presently were blown down by the very breath of insurgent people, for all over Europe during the middle of the last century there spread, spread irresistibly, the spirit of revolution. Government after government was changed in its character; people said, 'It is not only in America that men want to govern themselves, it is not only in France that men mean to throw off this intolerable yoke. All men are of the same temper and of the same make and same rights.' So the tide of revolution could not be stopped by the conclusions of the Congress of Vienna; until it came about, my fellow citizens, that there was only one stronghold left for that sort of power, and that was at Berlin. In the year 1914 that power sought to make reconquest of Europe and the world. It was nothing less than the reassertion of that old, ugly thing which the hearts of men everywhere always revolt against, the claim of a few men to determine the fortunes of all men, the ambition of little groups of rulers to dominate the world, the plots and intrigues of military staffs and men who did not confide in their fellow citizens what it was that was their ultimate purpose. So the fire burned in Europe, until it spread and spread like a great forest conflagration, and every free nation was at last aroused; saw the danger, saw the fearful sparks blowing over, carried by the winds of passion and likely to lodge in their own dear countries and destroy their own fair homes; and at last the chief champion and spokesman of liberty, beloved America, got into the war, and said, 'We see the dark plot now. We promised at our birth to be the champions of humanity and we have never made a promise yet that we will not redeem.' I know how the tides of war were going when our men began to get over there in force, and I think it is nothing less than true to say that America saved the world.

"Then a new congress of peace met to complete the work that the congress of Vienna tried to stop and resist. At the very front of this treaty of peace, my fellow citizens, is the covenant of the league of nations, and at the heart of that lies this principle, that no nation shall be a member of that league which is not a self-governing and free nation; that no autocratic power may have any part in the partnership; that no power like Germany—such as Germany was—shall ever take part in its counsels. Germany has changed her constitution, as you know—has made it a democratic constitution, at any rate in form—and she is excluded for the time being from the league of nations only in order that she may go through a period of probation to show that she means what she professes; to demonstrate that she actually does intend permanently to alter the character of her constitution and put into the hands of her people what was once concentrated as authority in Wilhelmstrasse in Berlin. If she can prove her change of heart and the permanency of her change of institutions, then she can come into respectable society; but if she can not, she is excluded forever. At last the cycle is completed, and the free peoples who were resisted at Vienna have come into their own. There was not a single statesman at Paris who did not know that he was the servant, and not the master, of his people. There was not one of them who did not know that the whole spirit of the times had changed and that they were there to see that people were liberated, not dominated; that people were put in charge of their own territories and their own affairs. The chief business of the congress was to carry out that great purpose, and at last, in the covenant of the league of nations, the Monroe doctrine became the doctrine of the world. Not only may no European power impair the territorial integrity or interfere with the political independence of any State in the Americas but no power anywhere may impair the territorial integrity or invade the political independence of another power. The principle that Mr. Canning suggested to Mr. Monroe has now been vindicated by its adoption by the representatives of mankind.

"When I hear gentlemen ask the question, 'Is the Monroe doctrine sufficiently safeguarded in the covenant of the league of nations?' I can only say that it is, if I understand the English language. It says in plain English that nothing in that covenant shall be interpreted as affecting the validity of the Monroe doctrine. Could anything be plainer than that? And when you add to that that the principle of the Monroe doctrine is applied to the whole world, then surely I am at liberty to say that the heart of the document is the Monroe doctrine itself. We have at last vindicated the policy of America, because all through that treaty, and you will presently see all through the Austrian treaty, all through the Bulgarian treaty, all through the Turkish treaty, all through the separate treaty we must make with Hungary, because she is separated from Austria, runs the same principle, not only that no government can impose its sovereignty on unwilling people, but that governments which have imposed their sovereignty upon unwilling people must withdraw it. All the regions that were unwillingly subject to Germany, subject to Austria-Hungary, and subject to Turkey are now released from that sovereignty, and the principle is everywhere adopted that territories belong to the people that live on them, and that they can set up any sort of government they please, and that nobody dare interfere with their self-determination and autonomy. I conceive this to be the greatest charter—nay, it is the first charter—ever adopted of human liberty. It sets the world free everywhere from autocracy, from imposed authority, from authority not chosen and accepted by the people who obey it.

"By the same token it removes the grounds of ambition. My fellow citizens, we never undertake anything that we do not see through. This treaty was not written, essentially speaking, at Paris. It was written at Chateau-Thierry and in Belleau Wood and in the Argonne. Our men did not fight over there for the purpose of coming back and letting the same thing happen again. They did not come back with any fear in their heart that their public men would go back on them and not see the thing through. They went over there expecting that the business would be finished, and it shall be finished. Nothing of that sort shall happen again, because America is going to see it through, and what she is going to see through is this, what is contained in article 10 of the covenant of the league. Article 10 is the heart of the enterprise. Article 10 is the test of the honor and courage and endurance of the world. Article 10 says that every member of the league, and that means every great fighting power in the world, Germany for the time being not being a great fighting power, solemnly engages to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of the other members of the league. If you do that, you have absolutely stopped ambitious and aggressive war. There is one thing you have not stopped, and that I for my part do not desire to stop, and I think I am authorized to speak for a great many of my colleagues, if not all of my colleagues at Paris, that they do not wish to stop it. It does not stop the right of revolution. It does not stop the choice of self-determination. No nation promises to protect any government against the wishes and actions of its own people or of any portion of its own people. Why, how could America join in a promise like that? She threw off the yoke of a government. Shall we prevent any other people from throwing off the yoke that they are unwilling to bear? She never will, and no other government ever will, under this covenant. But as against external aggression, as against ambition, as against the desire to dominate from without, we all stand together in a common pledge, and that pledge is essential to the peace of the world.

"I said that our people were trained to go only one way, that our soldiers were trained to go only one way, and that America will never turn about upon the path of emancipation upon which she has set out. Not once, but several times, German orders were picked up, or discovered during the fighting, the purport of which was to certain commanders, 'Do not let the Americans capture such and such a post, because if they ever get there you can never get them out.' They had got other troops out, temporarily at any rate, but they could not get the Americans out. The Americans were under the impression that they had come there to stay, and I am under that impression about American political purposes. I am under the impression that we have come to the place where we have got in order to stay, and that some gentlemen are going to find that no matter how anxious they are to know that the door is open and that they can get out any time they want to they will be allowed to get out by themselves. We are going to stay in. We are going to see this thing finished, because, my fellow citizens, that is the only possibility of peace; and the world not only desires peace but it must have it. Are our affairs entirely in order? Isn't the rest of the world aflame? Have you any conception of the restlessness, of the insubordinate restlessness, of the great population of Europe and of great portions of Asia? Do you suppose that these people are going to resume any sort of normal life unless their rulers can give them adequate and ample guaranty of the future? And do you realize—I wonder if America does realize—that the rest of the world deems America indispensable to the guaranty? For a reason of which we ought to be very proud. They see that America has no designs on any other country in the world. They keep in mind—they keep in mind more than you realize—what happened at the end of the Spanish-American War. There were many cynical smiles on the other side of the water when we said that we were going to liberate Cuba and then let her have charge of her own affairs. They said, 'Ah, that is a very common subterfuge. Just watch. America is not going to let that rich island, with its great sugar plantations and its undeveloped agricultural wealth, get out of its grip again.' And all Europe stood at amaze when, without delay or hesitation, we redeemed our promise and gave Cuba the liberty we had won for her. They know that we have not imperialistic purposes. They know that we do not desire to profit at the expense of other peoples. And they know our power, they know our wealth, they know our indomitable spirit; and when we put our names to the bond then Europe will begin to be quiet, then men will begin to seek the peaceful solutions of days of normal industry and normal life, then men will take hope again, then men will cease to think of the revolutionary things they can do and begin to think of the constructive things they can do, will realize that disorder profits nobody and that order can at last be had upon terms of liberty and peace and justice. Then the reaction will come on our own people, because, do you think, my fellow citizens, does any body of Americans think, that none of this restlessness, this unhappy feeling, has reached America? Do you find everybody about you content with our present industrial order? Do you hear no intimations of radical change? Do you learn of no organizations the object of which is nothing less than to overturn the Government itself? We are a self-possessed Nation. We know the value of order. We mean to maintain it. We will not permit any minority of any sort to dominate it. But it is rather important for America, as well as for the rest of the world, that this infection should not be everywhere in the air, and that men everywhere should begin to look life and its facts in the face and come to calm counsels and purposes that will bring order and happiness and prosperity again. If you could see the stopped, the arrested factories over there, the untilled fields, the restless crowds in the cities with nothing to do, some of them, you would realize that they are waiting for something. They are waiting for peace, and not only for peace but for the assurance that peace will last, and they can not get that assurance if America withholds her might and her power and all the freshness of her strength from the assurance. There is a deep sense in which what your chairman said just now is profoundly true. We are the hope of humanity, and I for one have not the slightest doubt that we shall fulfill that hope.

"Yet, in order to reassure you about some of the things about which you have been diligently misinformed, I want to speak of one or two details. I have set the stage now, and I have not half described the treaty. It not only fulfills the hopes of mankind by giving territories to the people that belong to them and assuring them that nobody shall take it from them, but it goes into many details. It rearranges, for example, the great waterways of Europe, so that no one nation can control them, so that the currents of European life through the currents of its commerce may run free and unhampered and undominated. It embodies a great charter for labor by setting up a permanent international organization in connection with the league of nations which shall periodically bring the best counsels of the world to bear upon the problem of raising the levels and conditions of labor for men, women, and children. It goes further than that. We did not give Germany back her colonies, but we did not give them to anybody else. We put them in trust in the league of nations, said that we would assign their government to certain powers by assigning the powers as trustees, responsible to the league, making annual report to the league and holding the power under mandates which prescribe the methods by which they should administer those territories for the benefit of the people living in them, whether they were developed or undeveloped people. We have put the same safeguards, and as adequate safeguards, around the poor, naked fellows in the jungles of Africa that we have around those peoples almost ready to assume the rights of self-government in some parts of the Turkish Empire, as, for example, in Armenia. It is a great charter of liberty and of safety, but let me come to one or two details.

"It sticks in the craw of a great many persons that in the constitution of the league of nations, as it is said, Great Britain has been given six votes and the United States only one. That would be very interesting if true, but it does not happen to be true; that is to say, it is not true in this sense, that the one American vote counts as much as the British six. In the first place, they have not got six votes in the council of the league, which is the only body that originates action, but in the assembly of the league, which is the debating and not the voting body. Every time the assembly participates in any active resolution of the league that resolution must be concurred in by all the nations represented on the council, which makes the affirmative vote of the United States in every instance necessary. The six votes of the British Empire can not do anything to which the United States does not consent. Now—I am mistaken—there is one thing they can do. By a two-thirds vote they can admit new members to the league, but I do not think that is a formidable privilege since almost everybody is going to be in the league to begin with, and since the only large power that is not in the league enjoys, if I may use that word, a universal prejudice against it, which makes its early admission, at least, unlikely. But aside from admission of any members, which requires a two-thirds vote—in which the six British votes will not count a very large figure—every affirmative vote that leads to action requires the assent of the United States, and, as I have frequently said, I think it is very much more important to be one and count six than to be six and count six. So much for this bugaboo, for it is nothing else but a bugaboo. Bugaboos have been very much in fashion in the debates of those who have been opposing this league. The whole energy of that body is in the council of the league, for whose every action in the way of formulating policy or directing energetic measures a unanimous vote is necessary. That may sometimes, I am afraid, impede the action of the league; but, at any rate, it makes the sovereignty and the sovereign choice of every nation that is a member of that league absolutely safe. And pray do not deceive yourselves. The United States is not the only Government that is jealous of its sovereignty. Every other Government, big or little or middle sized, that had to be dealt with in Paris, was just as jealous of its sovereignty as the United States. The only difference between some of them and us is that we could take care of our sovereignty and they could not take care of theirs, but it has been a matter of principle with the United States to maintain that in respect of rights there was and should be no difference between a weak State and a strong State. Our contention has always been, in international affairs, that we should deal with them upon the principle of the absolute equality of independent sovereignty, and that is the basis of the organization of the league. Human society has not moved fast enough yet or far enough yet, my fellow citizens, for any part of that principle of sovereignty to be relinquished, by any one of the chief participants at any rate.

"Then there is another matter, that lies outside the league of nations, that I find my fellow citizens, in this part of the continent particularly, are deeply interested in. That is the matter of the cession of certain German rights in Shantung Province in China to Japan. I think that it is worth while to make that matter pretty clear, and I will have to ask you to be patient while I make a brief historical review in order to make it clear. In the first place, remember that it does not take anything from China, it takes it from Germany, and I do not find that there is any very great jealousy about taking things from Germany. In 1898 China granted to Germany for a period of 99 years certain very important rights around Kiaochow Bay, in the rich and ancient Province of Shantung, together with the right to penetrate the interior with a railway and exploit such ores as might be found in that Province for 30 miles on either side of the railway. We are thinking so much about that concession to Germany that we have forgotten that practically all of the great European powers had exacted similar concessions of China previously; they already had their foothold of control in China; they already had their control of railways; they already had their exclusive concessions over mines. Germany was doing an outrageous thing, I take the liberty of saying, as the others had done outrageous things, but it was not the first; at least, it had been done before. China lay rich and undeveloped and the rest of the world was covetous and it had made bargains with China, generally to China's disadvantage, which enabled the world to go in and exploit her riches. I am not now going to discuss the merits of that question, because it has no merits. The whole thing was bad, but it was not unprecedented. Germany obliged China to give her what China had given others previously. Immediately thereafter China was obliged, because she had done this thing, to make fresh concessions to Great Britain of a similar sort, to make fresh concessions to France, to make concessions of a similar kind to Russia. It was then that she gave Russia Port Arthur and Talien-Wan.

"Now, remember what followed. The Government of the United States did not make any kind of protest against any of those cessions. We had at that time one of the most public-spirited and humane men in the Executive Chair at Washington that have ever graced that chair—I mean William McKinley—and his Secretary of State was a man whom we have all always delighted to praise, Mr. John Hay. But they made no protest against the cession to Germany, or to Russia, or to Great Britain, or to France. The only thing they insisted on was that none of those powers should close the door of commerce to the goods of the United States in those territories which they were taking from China. They took no interest, I mean so far as what they did was concerned, in the liberties and rights of China. They were interested only in the rights of the merchants of the United States. I want to hasten to add that I do not say this even to imply criticism on those gentlemen, because as international law stood then it would have been an unfriendly act for them to protest in any one of these cases. Until this treaty was written in Paris it was not even proposed that it should be the privilege of anybody to protest in any such case if his own rights were not directly affected. Then, some time after that, followed the war between Russia and Japan. You remember where that war was brought to a close—by delegates of the two powers sitting at Portsmouth, N. H., at the invitation of Mr. Roosevelt, who was then President. In that treaty, Port Arthur—China's Port Arthur, ceded to Russia—was ceded to Japan, and the Government of the United States, though the discussions were occurring on its own territory, made no suggestion even to the contrary. Now, the treaty in Paris does the same thing with regard to the German rights in China. It cedes them to the victorious power, I mean to the power that took them by force of arms, the power which was in the Pacific victorious in this war, namely, to Japan, and there is no precedent which would warrant our making a protest. Not only that, but, in the meantime, since this war began, Great Britain and France entered into solemn covenants of treaty with Japan that if she would come into the war and continue her operations against Germany in the Pacific they would lend their whole influence and power to the cession to Japan of everything that Germany had in the Pacific, whether on the mainland or in the islands, north of the Equator, so that if we were to reject this provision in the treaty Great Britain and France would not in honor be at liberty to reject it, and we would have to devise means to do what, let me say with all solemnity only war could do, force them to break their promise to Japan.

"Well, you say, 'Then, is it just all an ugly, hopeless business?' It is not, if we adopt the league of nations. The Government of the United States was not bound by these treaties. The Government of the United States was at liberty to get anything out of the bad business that it could get by persuasion and argument, and it was upon the instance of the Government of the United States that Japan promised to return to China what none of these other powers has yet promised to return—all rights of sovereignty that China had granted Germany over any portion of the Province of Shantung—the greatest concession in that matter that has ever been made by any power that has interested itself in the exploits of China—and to retain only what corporations out of many countries have long enjoyed in China, the right to run the railroad and extend its line to certain points and to continue to work the mines that have already been opened. Not only that, but I said a minute ago that Mr. Hay and Mr. McKinley were not at liberty to protest. Turn to the league of nations and see what will be the situation then. Japan is a member of the league of nations, all these other powers that have exploited China are members, and they solemnly promise to respect and preserve the territorial integrity and existing political independence of China. Not only that, but in the next article the international law of the world is revolutionized. It is there provided that it is the friendly right of any member of the league at any time to call attention to anything anywhere that is likely to disturb the peace of the world or the good understanding between nations upon which the peace of the world depends. If we had had the covenant at that time, Mr. McKinley could, and I venture to say would, have said to Germany, 'This is directly none of our business, for we are seeking no competitive enterprise of that sort in China, but this is an invasion of the territorial integrity of China. We have promised, and you have promised, to preserve and respect that integrity, and if you do not keep that promise it will destroy the good understanding which exists between the peaceful nations of the world. It will be an invasion, a violation of the essential principle of peace and of justice.' Do you suppose for one moment that if the matter had been put in that aspect, with the attention of the world called to it by the great power of the United States, Germany would have persisted in that enterprise?

"How had she begun it? She had made the excuse of the death of two German missionaries at the hands of irresponsible mobs in certain Provinces of China an excuse for taking this valuable part of China's territory. Ah, my fellow citizens, it makes anybody who regards himself as a Christian blush to think what Christian nations have done in the name of protecting Christianity! But it can not be done any more under the league of nations. It can not be done without being cited to the bar of mankind, and if Germany had been cited to the bar of mankind before she began her recent tragical enterprise she never would have undertaken it. You can not expose such matters to the cool discussion of the world without disclosing all their ugliness, their illegitimacy, their brutality. This treaty sets up, puts in operation, so to say, puts into commission the moral force of the world. Our choice with regard to Shantung, therefore, is to keep out of the treaty, for we can not change it in that respect, or go in and be an effective friend of China. I for one am ready to do anything or to cooperate in anything in my power to be a friend, and a helpful friend, to that great, thoughtful, ancient, interesting, helpless people—in capacity, in imagination, in industry, in numbers one of the greatest peoples in the world and entitled to the wealth that lies underneath their feet and all about them in that land which they have not as yet known how to bring to its development.

"There are other things that have troubled the opponents of the league. One thing is they want to be sure they can get out. That does not interest me very much. If I go into a thing, my first thought is not how I can get out. My first thought is not how I can scuttle, but how I can help, how I can be effective in the game, how I can make the influence of America tell for the guidance and salvation of the world—not how I can keep out of trouble. I want to get into any kind of trouble that will help liberate mankind. I do not want always to be thinking about my skin or my pocketbook or my friendships. Is it just as comfortable to die quietly in your bed, never having done anything worth anything, as to die as some of those fellows that we shall always love when we remember them died upon the field of freedom? Is there any choice? Do you think anybody outside the family is going to be interested in any souvenir of you after you are dead? They are going to be interested in souvenirs of the boys in khaki, whether they are of their family or not. They are going to touch with reverence any sword or musket or rapid-fire gun or cannon that was fired for liberty upon the fields of France. I am not thinking of sitting by the door and keeping my hand on the knob, but if you want to do that you can get out any time you want to. There is absolutely nothing in the covenant to prevent you. I was present at its formulation, and I know what I am talking about, besides being able to understand the English language. It not only meant this, but said it, that any nation can, upon two years' notice, withdraw at any time, provided that at the time it withdraws it has fulfilled its international obligations and its obligations under the covenant, but it does not make anybody judge as to whether it has fulfilled those obligations, except the nation that withdraws.

"The only thing that can ever keep you in the league is being ashamed to get out. You can get out whenever you want to after two years' notice, and the only risk you run is having the rest of the world think you ought not to have got out. I, for my part, am not very sensitive about that, because I have a memory. I have read the history of the United States. We are in the habit of keeping our international obligations, and I do not believe that there will ever come a time when any just question can be raised as to whether we have fulfilled them or not. Therefore, I am not afraid to go before the jury of mankind at any time on the record of the United States with regard to the fulfillment of its international obligations; and when these gentlemen who are criticizing it once feel, if they ever should feel, the impulse of courage instead of the impulse of cowardice, they will realize how much better it feels. Your blood is at least warm and comfortable, and the red corpuscles are in command, when you have got some spunk in you; but when you have not, when you are afraid somebody is going to put over something on you, you are furtive and go about looking out for things, and your blood is cold and you shiver when you turn a dark corner. That is not a picture of the United States. When I think of these great frontier communities, I fancy I can hear the confident tread, tread, tread of the great hosts that crossed this continent. They were not afraid of what they were going to find in the next canyon. They were not looking over their shoulders to see if the trail was clear behind them. They were making a trail in front of them and they had not the least notion of going back.

"What I have come to suggest to you, my fellow citizens, is that you do what I am sure all the rest of our fellow countrymen are doing—clear the deck of these criticisms, that really have nothing in them, and look at the thing in its large aspect, in its majesty. Particularly, look at it as a fulfillment of the destiny of the United States, for it is nothing less. At last, after this long century and more of blood and terror, the world has come to the vision that that little body of 3,000,000 people, strung along the Atlantic coast of this continent, had in that far year 1776. Men in Europe laughed at them, at this little handful of dreamers, this little body of men who talked dogmatically about liberty, and since then that fire which they started on that little coast has consumed every autocratic government in the world, every civilized autocratic government, and now at last the flame has leaped to Berlin, and there is the funeral pyre of the German Empire."

THE PRESIDENT AT TABERNACLE, SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH, SEPTEMBER 23, 1919.

"Gov. Bamberger, President Grant, my fellow countrymen, it is indeed inspiring to stand before this great audience, and yet I feel that I have come to present a theme which deserves the greatest of all audiences. I must admit to a very considerable degree of unaffected diffidence in presenting this theme, because the theme is so much bigger than any man's capacity to present it adequately. It is a theme which must engage the enthusiastic support of every lover of humanity and every man who professes Christian conviction, because we are now as a nation to make what I can not help characterizing as the most critical decision we have ever made in the history of America. We sent our boys across the sea to defeat the purposes of Germany, but we engaged that after we had defeated the purposes of Germany we would complete what they had begun and effect such arrangements of international concert as would make it impossible for any such attempt ever to be made again. The question therefore is, Shall we see it through or shall we now at this most critical juncture of the whole transaction turn away from our associates in the war and decline to complete and fulfill our sacred promise to mankind?

"I have now crossed the continent, my fellow countrymen, and am on my way East again, and I feel qualified to render testimony as to the attitude of this great Nation toward the covenant of the league. I say without the slightest hesitation that an overwhelmnig majority of our fellow countrymen purpose that this covenant shall be adopted. One by one the objections to it have melted away. One by one it has become evident that the objections urged against it were without sufficient foundation. One by one it has become impossible to support them as objections, and at last we come to the point of critical choice as to the very heart of the whole matter.

"You know it troubled some of our public men because they were afraid it was not perfectly clear that we could withdraw from this arrangement whenever we wanted to. There is no justification for doubt in any part of the language of the covenant on that point. The United States is at liberty to withdraw at any time upon two years' notice, the only restriction being that when it withdraws it shall have fulfilled its international obligations and its obligations under the covenant of the league, but it is left to its own conscience and to no other tribunal whatever to determine whether those obligations have been fulfilled or not. I, for one, am not afraid of the judgment of mankind with regard to matters of this sort. The United States never has failed to fulfill its international obligations. It never will fail, and I am ready to go to the great jury of humanity upon that matter at any time that within our judgment we should withdraw from this arrangement. But I am not one of those who, when they go into a great enterprise, think first of how they are going to get out of it. I think first of how I am going to stay in it and how, with the power and influence I can command, I am going to promote the objects of the great concert and association which is being formed. And that is the temper of America.

"I was quoting the other night the jest of an American wit who, commenting upon the extraordinary rapidity with which we had trained an army, said that it was easier to train an army in America than anywhere else; it took less time, because you had to train them to go only one way. They showed the effects of the training. They went only one way, and the issues that we are now debating were really decided at Chateau-Thierry and Belleau Wood and in the Argonne. We are now put to the test by these men who fought, as they were put to the test by those of us who ordered them to the field of battle. And the people of the United States have the same training as their army; they do not look back, they go only one way.

"The doubt as to whether some superior authority to our own Congress could intervene in matters of domestic policy is also removed. The language of the covenant expressly excludes the authorities of the league from taking any action or expressing any judgment with regard to domestic policies like immigration, like naturalization, like the tariff, like all of those things which have lain at the center so often of our political action and of our choice of policy.

"Nobody doubts any longer that the covenant gives explicit, unqualified recognition to the Monroe doctrine. Indeed, it does more than that. It adopts the principle of the Monroe doctrine as the principle of the world. The principle of the Monroe doctrine is that no nation has the right to interfere with the affairs or to impose its own will in any way upon another nation in the Western Hemisphere, and President Monroe said to the Governments of Europe, 'Any attempt of that sort on the part of any Government of Europe will be regarded as an act unfriendly to the United States.' The covenant of the league indorses that. The covenant of the league says that nothing in that document shall be construed as affecting the validity of the Monroe doctrine, which means that if any power seeks to impose its will upon any American State in North America, Central America, or South America, the world now acknowledges the right of the Government of the United States to take the initiative and check that action.

"The forces of objection being driven out of one position after another are now centering upon the heart of the league itself. I have come here to-night, my fellow countrymen, to discuss that critical matter that you constantly see in the newspapers, which we call 'reservations.' I want you to have a very clear idea of what is meant by reservations. Reservations are to all intents and purposes equivalent to amendments. I can say, I believe with confidence, that it is the judgment of the people of the United States that neither the treaty nor the covenant should be amended. Very well, then; look at the character of the reservations. What does a reservation mean? It means a stipulation that this particular Government insists upon interpreting its duty under that covenant in a special way, insists upon interpreting it in a way in which other Governments, it may be, do not interpret it. This thing, when we ratify it, is a contract. You can not alter so much as the words of a contract without the consent of the other parties. Any reservation will have to be carried to all the other signatories, Germany included, and we shall have to get the consent of Germany, among the rest, to read this covenant in some special way in which we prefer to read it in the interest of the safety of America. That, to my mind, is one of the most unacceptable things that could happen. To my mind, to reopen the question of the meaning of this clearly written treaty is to reopen negotiations with Germany, and I do not believe that any part of the world is in the temper to do that. In order to put this matter in such a shape as will lend itself to concrete illustration, let me read you what I understand is a proposed form of reservation:

"The United States assumes no obligation under the provisions of article 10 to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country or to interfere in controversies between other nations, whether members of the league or not, or to employ the military and naval forces of the United States under any article of the treaty for any purpose, unless in any particular case the Congress, which under the Constitution has the sole power to declare war or authorize the employment of the military and naval forces of the United States, shall by act or joint resolution so declare.

"That is a rejection of the covenant. That is an absolute refusal to carry any part of the same responsibility that the other members of the league carry. Does the United States want to be in on that special footing? Does the United States want to say to the nations with whom it stood in this great struggle, 'We have seen you through on the battle field, but now we are done. We are not going to stand by you'? Article 10 is an engagement on the part of all the great fighting nations of the world, because all the great fighting nations are going to be members of the league, that they will respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and the existing political independence of the other members of the league. That is cutting at the heart of all wars. Every war of any consequence that you can cite originated in an attempt to seize the territory or interfere with the political independence of some other nation. We went into this war with the sacred promise that we regarded all nations as having the same rights, whether they were weak or strong, and unless we engage to sustain the weak we have guaranteed that the strong will prevail, we have guaranteed that imperialistic enterprise may revive, we have guaranteed that there is no barrier to the ambition of nations that have the power to dominate, we have abdicated the whole position of right and substituted the principle of might. This is the heart of the covenant, and what are these gentlemen afraid of? Nothing can be done under that article of the treaty without the consent of the United States. I challenge them to draw any other deduction from the provisions of the covenant itself. In every case where the league takes action the unanimous vote of the council of the league is necessary; the United States is a permanent member of the council of the league, and its affirmative vote is in every case necessary for every affirmative, or for that matter every negative, action.

"Let us go into particulars. These gentlemen say, 'We do not want the United States drawn into every little European squabble.' Of course, we do not, and under the league of nations it is entirely within our choice whether we will be or not. The normal processes of the action of the league are certainly to be this: When trouble arises in the Balkans, when somebody sets up a fire somewhere in central Europe among those little nations, which are for the time being looking upon one another with a good deal of jealousy and suspicion, because the passions of the world have not cooled—whenever that happens, the council of the league will confer as to the best methods of putting out the fire. If you want to put out a fire in Utah, you do not send to Oklahoma for the fire engine. If you want to put out a fire in the Balkans, if you want to stamp out the smouldering flame in some part of central Europe, you do not send to the United States for troops. The council of the league selects the powers which are most ready, most available, most suitable, and selects them only at their own consent, so that the United States would in no such circumstances conceivably be drawn in unless the flame spread to the world. And would they then be left out, even if they were not members of the league? You have seen the fire spread to the world once, and did not you go in? If you saw it spread again, if you saw human liberty again imperiled, would you wait to be a member of the league to go in?

My fellow citizens, the whole thing goes directly to the conscience of the Nation. If the fight is big enough to draw the United States in, I predict that they will be drawn in anyhow, and if it is not big enough to bring them in inevitably, they can go in or stay out according to their own decision. Why are these gentlemen afraid? There is no force to oblige the United States to do anything except moral force. Is any man, any proud American, afraid that the United States will resist the duress of duty? I am intensely conscious of the great conscience of this Nation. I see the inevitableness, as well as the dignity and the greatness, of such declarations as President Grant has made aligning all the great organized moral forces of the world on the same side. It is inconceivable they should be on different sides.

"There is no necessity for the last part of this reservation. Every public man, every statesman, in the world knows, and I say that advisedly, that in order that the United States should go to war it is necessary for the Congress to act. They do not have to be told that, but that is not what this resolution says. This resolution says the United States assumes no obligation under the provisions of article 10 to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country—washes its hands of the whole business; says 'We do not want even to create the presumption that we will do the right thing. We do not want to be committed even to a great principle, but we want to say that every time a case arises the Congress will independently take it up as if there were no covenant and determine whether there is any moral obligation; and after determining that, determining whether it will act upon that moral obligation or not, it will act.' In other words, that is an absolute withdrawal from the obligations of article 10. That is why I say that it would be a rejection of the covenant and thereby a rejection of the treaty, for the treaty can not be executed without the covenant.

"I appeal, and I appeal with confidence, my fellow countrymen, to the men whose judgment I am told has approved of reservations of this sort. I appeal to them to look into the matter again. I know some of the gentlemen who are quoted as approving a reservation of that sort; I know them to be high-minded and patriotic Americans, and I know them to be men whose character and judgment I entirely respect, and whose motives I respect as much as I respect the motives of any man, but they have not looked into the matter. Are they willing to ask the rest of the world to go into this covenant and to let the United States assume none of its obligations? Let us have all the advantages of it and none of the responsibilities? Are they willing that proud America should ask for special exemptions, should show a special timidity, should ask to go into an arrangement depending upon a judgment when its own judgment is a different judgment? I confidently believe, my fellow citizens, that they will do no such thing. This is not an interpretation of the covenant. I have been trying to interpret it to you. This is a rejection of the covenant, and if this is adopted, the whole treaty falls to the ground, for, my fellow citizens, we must realize that a great and final choice is between this people. Either we are going to guarantee civilization or we are going to abandon it. I use the word with perhaps the admission that it may carry a slight exaggeration, but nevertheless advisedly, when I say abandon civilization, for what is the present condition of civilization? Everywhere, even in the United States, there is an attitude of antagonism toward the ordered processes of government. We feel the evil influence on this side of the Atlantic, and on the other side of the Atlantic every public man knows that it is knocking at the door of his government.

"While this unrest is assuming this menacing form of rebellion against authority, of determination to cut roads of force through the regular processes of government, the world is waiting on America, for—I say it with entire respect for the representatives of other governments, but I say it with knowledge—the Government of the United States is the only government in the world that the rest of the world trusts. It knows that the Government of the United States speaks for the people of the United States, that it is not anybody's master, but the servant of a great people. It knows that that people can always oblige its governors to be its servants. It knows that nobody has ever dared defy the public judgment of the people of the United States, and it knows that that public judgment is on the side of right and justice and of peace. It has seen the United States do what no other nation ever did. When we fought the war with Spain there was many a cynical smile on the other side of the water when we said that we were going to win freedom for Cuba and then present it to her. They said, 'Ah, yes; under the control of the United States. They will never let go of that rich island which they can exploit so much to their own advantage.' When we kept that promise and proved our absolute disinterestedness, and, notwithstanding the fact that we had beaten Spain until she had to accept anything that we dictated, paid her $20,000,000 for something that we could have taken, namely, the Philippine Islands, all the world stood at amaze and said, 'Is it true, after all, that this people believes and means what it says? Is it true, after all, that this is a great altruistic force in the world?'

"And now look what has happened, my fellow citizens. Poland, Bohemia, the released parts of Roumania, Jugo-Slavia—there are kinsmen, I dare say, of these people in this audience—these could, none of them, have won their own independence any more than Cuba could have won hers, and they were under an authority just as reckless in the exercise of its force, just as regardless of the people and of humanity, as the Spanish Government ever was in Cuba and the Philippines; and by the force of the world these people have been liberated. Now the world is waiting to hear whether the United States will join in doing for them what it sanely did for Cuba, guaranteeing their freedom and saying to them, 'What we have given to you no man shall take way.' It is our final heroic test of character, and I for one have not the slightest doubt as to what the result of the test is going to be, because I know that at heart this people loves freedom and right and justice more than it loves money and material prosperity or any of the things that anybody can get but nobody can keep unless they have elevation of spirit enough to see the horizons of the destiny of man.

"Instead of wishing to ask to stand aside, get the benefits of the league, but share none of its burdens or responsibilities, I for my part want to go in and accept what is offered to us, the leadership of the world. A leadership of what sort, my fellow citizens? Not a leadership that leads men along the lines by which great nations can profit out of weak nations, not an exploiting power, but a liberating power, a power to show the world that when America was born it was indeed a finger pointed towards those lands into which men could deploy some of these days and live in happy freedom, look each other in the eyes as equals, see that no man was put upon, that no people were forced to accept authority which was not of their own choice, and that out of the general generous impulse of the human genius and the human spirit we were lifted along the levels of civilization to days when there should be wars no more, but men should govern themselves in peace and amity and quiet. That is the leadership we said we wanted, and now the world offers it to us. It is inconceivable that we should reject it. It is inconceivable that men should put any conditions upon accepting it, particularly—for I speak this with a certain hurt pride, my fellow citizens, as an American—particularly when we are so safeguarded that the world under the covenant can not do a thing that we do not consent to being done. Other nations, other governments, were just as jealous of their sovereignty as we have been, and this guarantees the sovereignty of all the equal members of this great union of nations. There is only one nation for the time being excluded. That is Germany, and Germany is excluded only in order that she may go through a period of probation, only in order that she may prove to the world that she has made a real and permanent change in her constitution, and that hereafter, not Wilhelmstrasse but the votes of the German people will determine the policy of the German Government.

"If I may say so without even by implication involving great public men whom I entirely respect, I want to say that the only popular forces back of serious reservations, the only popular forces back of the impulse to reject any part of this treaty, proceed from exactly the same sources that the pro-German propaganda proceeded from. I ask the honorable and enlightened men who I believe thoughtlessly favor reservations such as I have read to reflect upon that and examine into the truth of it, and to reflect upon this proposition: We, by holding off from this league, serve the purposes of Germany, for what Germany has sought throughout the war was, first, to prevent our going in, and then to separate us in interest and purpose from the other Governments with which we were associated. Now, shall we by the vote of the United States Senate do for Germany what she could not do with her arms? We shall be doing it, whether we intend it or not. I exculpate the men I am thinking of entirely from the purpose of doing it; it would be unworthy of me to suggest such a purpose; but I do suggest, I do state with confidence, that that is the only end that would be gained, because Germany is isolated from the other nations, and she desires nothing so much as that we should be isolated, because she knows that then the same kind of suspicion, the same kind of hostility, the same kind of unfriendliness—that subtle poison that brings every trouble that comes between nations—will center on the United States as well as upon Germany. Her isolation will be broken; she will have a comrade, whether that nation wants to be her comrade or not, and what the lads did on the fields of France will be undone. We will allow Germany to do in 1919 what she failed to do in 1918!

"It would be unworthy of me, my fellow citizens, in the responsible position into which you have put me, if I were to overstate any of these things. I have searched my conscience with regard to them. I believe I am telling you the sober truth, and I am telling you what I get, not by intuition, but through those many voices that inevitably reach the Government and do not always reach you from over sea. We know what the leading men of Germany are thinking and saying, and they are praying that the United States may stand off from the league. I call upon you, therefore, my fellow citizens, to look at this thing in a new aspect, to look upon it not with calculations of interest, not with fear of responsibility, but with a consciousness of the great moral issue which the United States must now decide and which, having decided, it can not reverse. If we keep out of this league now, we can never enter it except alongside of Germany. We can either go in now or come in later with our recent enemies, and to adopt a reservation such as I have read, which explicitly renounces responsibility under the central engagement of the covenant, is to do nothing less than that.

"I hope that in order to strengthen this impression on your minds you will take pains to read the treaty of peace. You need not read all of it; a lot of it is technical and you can skip that; but I want you to get a picture of what is in this great document. It is most too narrow a view of it to think of it as a treaty of peace with Germany. It is that, but it is very much more than a treaty of peace with Germany; it is a treaty in which an attempt is made to set up the rights of peoples everywhere, for exactly the lines of this treaty are going to be projected—have been projected—into the treaty with Austria, into the treaty with Bulgaria, into the treaty with Hungary, into the treaty with Turkey. Everywhere the same principle is adopted, that the men who wrote the treaties at Versailles were not at liberty to give anybody's property to anybody else. It is the first great international agreement in the history of civilization that was not based on the opposite principle. Every other great international arrangement has been a division of spoils, and this is an absolute renunciation of spoils, even with regard to the helpless parts of the world, even with regard to those poor benighted people in Africa, over whom Germany had exercised a selfish authority which exploited them and did not help them. Even they are not handed over to anybody else. The principle of annexation, the principle of extending sovereignty to territories that are not occupied by your own people, is rejected in this treaty. All of those regions are put under the trust of the league of nations, to be administered for the benefit of their inhabitants—the greatest humane arrangement that has ever been attempted—and the rules are laid down in the covenant itself which forbid any form of selfish exploitation of these helpless people by the agents of the league who will exercise authority over them during the period of their development.

"Then see how free course is given to our sympathies. I believe that there is no region of the world toward which the sympathies of the United States have gone out so abundantly as to the poor people of Armenia, those people infinitely terrified and infinitely persecuted. We have poured out money, we have sent agents of all sorts to relieve their distress, and at every turn we have known that every dollar we spent upon them might be rendered useless by the cruel power which had authority over them, that under pretense of not being able to control its own forces in those parts of the empire, the Turkish Government might say that it was unable to restrain the horrible massacres which have made that country a graveyard. Armenia is one of the regions that are to be under trust of the league of nations. Armenia is to be redeemed. The Turk is to be forbidden to exercise his authority there, and Christian people are not only to be allowed to aid Armenia but they are to be allowed to protect Armenia. At last this great people, struggling through night after night of terror, knowing not what day would see their land stained with blood, are now given a promise of safety, a promise of justice, a possibility that they may come out into a time when they can enjoy their own rights as free people, as they never dreamed they would be able to exercise them before. All of the great humane impulses of the human heart are expressed in this treaty, and we would be recreant to every humane obligation if we did not lend our whole force and, if necessary, make our utmost sacrifice to maintain its provisions. We are approaching the time in the discussions of the Senate when it will be determined what we are going to say about it, and I am here making this public appeal to you and, through you, to gentlemen who have favored such utterances as I have read to you to-night, to take a second thought upon the matter, to realize that what they are after is already accomplished. The United States can not be drawn into anything it does not wish to be drawn into, but the United States ought not to be itself in the position of saying, 'You need not expect of us that we assume the same moral obligations that you assume. You need not expect of us that we will respect and preserve the territorial integrity and political independence of other nations.'

"Let me remove another misapprehension about that clause, my fellow citizens. Almost every time it is quoted the words 'external aggression' are left out of it. There was not a member of that conference with whom I conferred who wanted to put the least restraint upon the right of self-determination by any portion of the human family, who wished to put the slightest obstacle in the way of throwing off the yoke of any Government if that yoke should become intolerable. This does not guarantee any country, any Government, against an attempt on the part of its own subjects to throw off its authority. The United States could not keep its countenance and make a promise like that, because it began by doing that very thing. The glory of the United States is that when we were a little body of 3,000,000 people strung along the Atlantic coast we threw off the power of a great empire because it was not a power chosen by or consented to by ourselves. We hold that principle. We never will guarantee any Government against the exercise of that right, and no suggestion was made in the conference that we should. We merely ourselves promised to respect the territorial integrity and existing political independence of the other members of the league and to assist in preserving them against external aggression.

"And if we do not do that the taproot of war is still sunk deep into the fertile soil of human passion. I am for cutting the taproot of war. I am for making an insurance against war, and I am prudent enough to take 10 per cent insurance if I can not get any more. I would be very pleased to get 25 per cent. I would be delighted to get 50 per cent, and here, in conscience, I believe we are getting 99 per cent. No man, no body of men, can give you absolute 100 per cent insurance against war any more than they can give you 100 per cent insurance against losing your temper. You can not insure men against human passion, but notice what this covenant does. It provides nine months as a minimum for the cooling off of human passion. It is pretty hard to be crazy mad for nine months. If you stay crazy mad, or crazy anything else, for nine months, it will be wise to segregate you from your fellow citizens. The heart of this covenant, to which very few opponents ever draw attention, is this, that every great fighting nation in the world engages never to go to war without first having done one or the other of two things, without having either submitted the point in controversy to arbitration, in which case it promises absolutely to abide by the verdict or submit it to the council of the league of nations, not for decision but for discussion; it agrees to lay all the documents and all the pertinent facts before the council and agrees that the council shall publish the documents and the facts to mankind, that it will give six months to the council for the consideration of the matter and that, even if it does not accept the result, it will not go to war for three months after the opinion is rendered. You have nine months in which to accomplish all the gentle work of mediation, all the same work of discussion, all the quieting work of a full comprehension of what the result of bringing the matter to the issue of war would be upon the nations immediately concerned and upon the nations of the world. And in article 11, which follows article 10, it is made the right of any member of the league to call attention to anything, anywhere, which is likely to affect the peace of the world or the good understanding between nations upon which the peace of the world depends. So that, after the storm begins to gather, you can call the attention of the world to it, and the cleansing, purifying, cooling processes of public opinion will at once begin to operate.

"When a very important part of Shantung Province was ceded by China to Germany in March, 1898, the Government of the United States uttered not a single protest. One of the most enlightened and humane men that have ever sat in the executive chair was President of the United States, William McKinley. One of the ablest Secretaries of State in the long list of distinguished men who have occupied that office was associated with him as Secretary of State, the Hon. John Hay. They made not a single intimation of protest. Why? Because under international law as it was, and as it is until this covenant is adopted, it would have been a hostile act for them to do any such thing unless they could show that the material or political interest of the United States was directly affected. The only ground which they insisted upon was that Germany should not close Shantung Province to the trade of the United States. They could not lift a little finger to help China. They could only try to help the trade of the United States. Immediately after that cession China made similar cessions to England, to Russia, to France, and again no protest, only an insistence that the door should be kept open to our goods—not to our moral ideas, not to our sympathy with China, not to our sense of right violated, but to our merchandise. You do not hear anything about the cessions in that year to Great Britain or to France, because, unhappily, they were not unprecedented, as the cession to Germany was not unprecedented. Poor China had done the like, not once but many times before. What happened afterwards? In the treaty between Japan and Russia, after the Japanese-Russian war, a treaty signed on our own territory—in Portsmouth, N. H.—Port Arthur, the Chinese territory ceded to Russia, was transferred to Japan. Here were our own people sitting about, here was our own Government that had invited these gentlemen to sit at Portsmouth—did they object to Port Arthur being, not handed back to China, but handed to Japan?

"I am not going to stop, my fellow citizens, to discuss the Shantung provision in all its aspects, but what I want to call your attention to is that just so soon as this covenant is ratified every nation in the world will have the right to speak out for China. And I want to say very frankly, and I ought to add that the representatives of those great nations themselves admit, that Great Britain and France and the other powers which have insisted upon similar concessions in China will be put in a position where they will have to reconsider them. This is the only way to serve and redeem China, unless, indeed, you want to start a war for the purpose. At the beginning of the war and during the war Great Britain and France engaged by solemn treaty with Japan that if she would come into the war and continue in the war, she could have, provided she in the meantime took it by force of arms, what Germany had in China. Those are treaties already in force. They are not waiting for ratification. France and England can not withdraw from those obligations, and it will serve China not one iota if we should dissent from the Shantung arrangement; but by being parties to that arrangement we can insist upon the promise of Japan—the promise which the other Governments have not matched—that she will return to China immediately all sovereign rights within the Province of Shantung. We have got that for her now, and under the operations of article 11 and of article 10 it will be impossible for any nation to make any further inroads either upon the territorial integrity or upon the political independence of China. I for one want to say that my heart goes out to that great people, that learned people, that accomplished people, that honest people, hundreds of millions strong but never adequately organized for the exercise of force, therefore always at the mercy of anyone who has effective armies or navies, always subject to be commanded, and never in a position unassisted by the world to insist upon its own rights.

"It is a test—an acid test: Are you willing to go into the great adventure of liberating hundreds of millions of human beings from the threat of foreign power? If you are timid, I can assure you you can do it without shedding a drop of human blood. If you are squeamish about fighting, I will tell you you will not have to fight. The only force that outlasts all others and is finally triumphant is the moral judgment of mankind. Why is it that when a man tells a lie about you you do not wince, but when he tells the truth about you, if it is not creditable, then you wince? The only thing you are afraid of is the truth. The only thing you dare not face is the truth. The only thing that will get you sooner or later, no matter how you sneak or dodge, is the truth; and the only thing that will conquer nations is the truth. No nation is going to look the calm judgment of mankind in the face for nine months and then go to war. You can illustrate the great by the little. I dare say you have taken time to cool off sometimes. I know I have. It is very useful for a person, particularly with a Scotch disposition like mine, to withdraw from human society when he is mad all through and just think about the situation and reflect upon the consequences of making a conspicuous ass of himself. It is for that reason that I have always said that if you have an acquaintance whom you suspect of being a fool, encourage him to hire a hall. There is nothing that tests a man's good sense like exposure to the air. We are applying this great healing, sanitary influence to the affairs of nations and of men, and we can apply it only by the processes of peace which are offered to us after a conference, which I can testify was taken part in in the knowledge and in the spirit that never obtained before in any such conference; that we were not at liberty to work out the policy and ambition of any nation, but that our single duty and our single opportunity was to put the peoples of the world in possession of their own affairs.

"So, as much of the case, my fellow citizens, as I can lay before you on a single occasion—as much of this varied and diversified theme—is laid before you, and I ask your assistance to redeem the reputation of the United States. I ask you to make felt everywhere that it is useful to make it felt, not by way of threat, not by way of menace of any sort, but by way of compelling judgment, that the thing for us to do is to redeem the promises of America made in solemn presence of mankind when we entered this war, for I see a happy vision before the world, my fellow countrymen. Every previous international conference was based upon the authority of governments. This, for the first time, was based upon the authority of peoples. It is, therefore, the triumphant establishment of the principle of democracy throughout the world, but only the establishment of the principle of political democracy. What the world now insists upon—order and peace in order to consider and in order to achieve—is the establishment of industrial democracy, is the establishment of such relationships between those who direct labor and those who perform labor as shall make a real community of interest, as shall make a real community of purpose, as shall lift the whole level of industrial achievement above bargain and sale, into a great method of cooperation by which men, purposing the same thing and justly organizing the same thing, may bring about a state of happiness and of prosperity such as the world has never known before. We want to be friends of each other as well as friends of mankind. We want America to be united in spirit as well as the world. We want America to be a body of brethren, and if America is a body of brethren, then you may be sure that its leadership will bring the same sort of comradeship and intimacy of spirit and purity of purpose to the counsels and achievements of mankind."

THE PRESIDENT AT CHEYENNE, WYO., SEPTEMBER 24, 1919.

"Gov. Carey, my fellow countrymen, it is with genuine satisfaction that I find myself in this great State, which I have only too seldom visited, and I appreciate this close contact with a body of its citizens in order that I may make clear some of the matters which have emerged in the discussion in the midst of which we now find ourselves. Gov. Carey is quite right in saying that no document ever drew upon it more widespread discussion than the great treaty of peace with which your representatives returned from Paris. It is not to be wondered at, my fellow citizens, because that treaty is a unique document. It is the most remarkable document, I venture to say, in human history, because in it is recorded a complete reversal of the processes of government which had gone on throughout practically the whole history of mankind. The example that we set in 1776, which some statesmen in Europe affected to disregard and others presumed to ridicule, nevertheless set fires going in the hearts of men which no influence was able to quench, and one after another the Governments of the world have yielded to the influences of democracy. No man has been able to stay the tide, and there came a day when there was only one bulwark standing against it. That was in Berlin and Vienna—standing in the only territory which had not been conquered by the liberal forces of the opinion of the world, continued to stand fast where there was planted a pair of Governments that could use their people as they pleased, as pawns and instruments in a game of ambition, send them to the battle field without condescending to explain to them why they were sent, send them to the battle field to work out a dominion over free peoples on the part of a Government that had never been liberalized and made free.

"The world did not realize in 1914 that it had come to the final grapple of principle. It was only by slow degrees that we realized that we had any part in the war. We started the forces in 1776, as I have said, that made this war inevitable, but we were a long time realizing that, after all, that was what was at issue. We had been accustomed to regarding Europe as a field of intriguing, of rival ambitions, and of attempts to establish empire, and at first we merely got the impression that this was one of the usual European wars, to which, unhappily, mankind had become only too accustomed. You know how unwilling we were to go into it. I can speak for myself. I made every effort to keep this country out of the war, until it came to my conscience, as it came to yours, that after all it was our war as well as Europe's war, that the ambition of these central empires was directed against nothing less than the liberty of the world, and that if we were indeed what we had always professed to be, champions of the liberty of the world, it was not within our choice to keep out of the great enterprise. We went in just in time. I can testify, my fellow countrymen, that the hope of Europe had sunk very low when the American troops began to throng overseas. I can testify that they had begun to fear that the terror would be realized and that the German power would be established. At first they were incredulous that our men could come in force enough to assist them. At first they thought that it was only a moral encouragement they would get from seeing that gallant emblem of the Stars and Stripes upon their fields. Presently they realized that the tide was real, that here came men by the thousands, by the hundreds of thousands, by the millions; that there was no end to the force which would now be asserted to rescue the free peoples of the world from the terror of autocracy; and America had the infinite privilege of fulfilling her destiny and saving the world. I do not hesitate to say, as a sober interpretation of history, that American soldiers saved the liberties of the world.

"I want to remind you of all this, my fellow citizens, because it is pertinent to the discussion that is now going on. We saved the liberties of the world, and we must stand by the liberties of the world. We can not draw back. You remember what happened in that fateful battle in which our men first took part. You remember how the French lines had been beaten and separated and broken at Chateau-Thierry, and you remember how the gates seemed open for the advancement of the Germans upon Paris. Then a body of men, a little body of men—American soldiers and American marines—against the protests of French officers, against the command of the remote commanders, nevertheless dared to fill that breach, stopped that advance, turned the Germans back, and never allowed them to turn their faces forward again. They were advised to go back, and they asked the naïve American question, 'What did we come over here for? We did not come over here to go back; we came over here to go forward.' And they never went in any other direction. The men who went to Chateau-Thierry, the men who went into Balleau Wood, the men who did what no other troops had been able to do in the Argonne, never thought of turning back, not only, but they never thought of making any reservations on their service. They never thought of saying, 'We are going to do this much of the job and then scuttle and leave you to do the rest.' I am here, I am on this journey, to help this Nation, if I can by my counsel, to fulfill and complete the task which the men who died upon the battle fields of France began, and I am not going to turn back any more than they did. I am going to keep my face just as they kept their face—forward toward the enemy.

"My friends—I use the words advisedly—the only organized forces in this country, outside of Congressional Halls, against this treaty are the forces of hyphenated Americans. I beg you to observe that I say the only organized forces, because I would not include many individuals whom I know in any such characterization, but I do repeat that it is the pro-German forces and the other forces that showed their hyphen during the war that are now organized against this treaty. We can please nobody in America except these people by rejecting it or qualifying it in our acceptance of it. I want you to recall the circumstances of this Great War lest we forget. We must not forget to redeem absolutely and without qualification the promises of America in this great enterprise. I have crossed the continent now, my friends, and am a part of my way back. I can testify to the sentiment of the American people. It is unmistakable. The overwhelming majority of them demand the ratification of this treaty, and they demand it because, whether they have analyzed it or not, they have a consciousness of what it is that we are fighting for. We said that this was a people's war—I have explained to you that it was, though you did not need the explanation—and we said that it must be a people's peace. It is a people's peace. I challenge any man to find a contradiction to that statement in the terms of the great document with which I returned from Paris. It is so much of a people's peace that in every portion of its settlement every thought of aggrandizement, of territorial or political aggrandizement, on the part of the great powers was brushed aside, brushed aside by their own representatives. They declined to take the colonies of Germany in sovereignty, and said they would consent and demand that they be administered in trust by a concert of the nations through the instrumentality of a league of nations. They did not claim a single piece of territory. On the contrary, every territory that had been under the dominion of the Central Powers, unjustly and against its own consent, is by that treaty and the treaties which accompany it absolutely turned over in fee simple to the people who live in it. The principle is adopted without qualification upon which America was founded, that all just government proceeds from the consent of the governed. No nation that could be reached by the conclusions of this conference was obliged to accept the authority of a government by which it did not wish to be controlled. It is a peace of liberation. It is a peace in which the rights of peoples are realized, and when objection is made to the treaty, is any objection made to the substance of the treaty? There is only one thing in the substance of the treaty that has been debated seriously, and that is the arrangement by which Japan gets the rights that Germany had in Shantung Province in China. I wish I had time to go through the story of that fully. It was an unavoidable settlement, and nothing can be done for China without the league of nations.

"Perhaps you will bear with me if I take time to tell you what I am talking about. You know that China has been the common prey of the great European powers. Perhaps I should apologize to the representatives of those powers for using such a word, but I think they would admit that the word is justified. Nation after nation has demanded rights, semisovereign rights, and concessions with regard to mines and railways and every other resource that China could put at their disposition, and China has never been able to say 'No'—a great learned, patient, diligent people, numbering hundreds of millions; has had no organized force with which to resist, and has yielded again and again and again to unjust demands. One of these demands was made upon her in March, 1898, by Germany—unjustly made. I will not go into the particulars, but I could justify that word 'unjustly.' A concession was demanded of her of the control of the whole district around Kiaochow Bay, one of the open doors to the trade and resources of China. She was obliged to yield to Germany practically sovereign control over that great region by the sea, and into the interior of the Province Germany was privileged to extend a railway and to exploit all the deposits of ore that might be found for 30 miles on either side of the railway which she was to build. The Government of the United States at that time, presided over by one of the most enlightened and beloved of our Presidents—I mean William McKinley—and the Department of State, guided by that able and high-minded man, John Hay, did not make the slightest protest. Why? Not because they would not if they could have aided China, but because under international law as it then stood no nation had the right to protest against anything that other nations did that did not directly affect its own rights. Mr. McKinley and Mr. Hay did insist that if Germany took control of Kiaochow Bay, she should not close those approaches to China against the trade of the United States. How pitiful, when you go into the court of right, you can not protect China, you can only protect your own merchandise! You can not say, 'You have done a great wrong to these people.' You have got to say, 'We yield to the wrong, but we insist that you should admit our goods to be sold in those markets!' Pitiful, but nevertheless it was international law. All nations acted in that way at that time. Immediately following these concessions to Germany, Russia insisted upon concessions and got Port Arthur and other territories. England insisted, though she had had similar concessions in the past, upon an additional concession and got Weihaiwai. France came into the game and got a port and its territory lying behind it for the same period of time that Germany had got her concession, namely, 99 years.

"Then came the war between Russia and Japan, and what happened? In a treaty signed on our own sacred territory, at Porthmouth in New Hampshire, Japan was allowed to take from Russia what had belonged to China, the concession of Port Arthur and of Talienwan, the territory in that neighborhood. The treaty was written here; it was written under the auspices, so to say, of our own public opinion, but the Government of the United States was not at liberty to protest and did not protest; it acquiesced in the very thing which is being done in this treaty. What is being done in this treaty is not that Shantung is being taken from China. China did not have it. It is being taken from Germany, just as Port Arthur was not taken from China but taken from Russia and transferred to Japan. Before we got into the war, Great Britain and France had entered into solemn covenant by treaty with Japan that if she would take what Germany had in Shantung by force of arms, and also the islands lying north of the Equator which had been under German dominion in the Pacific, she could keep them when the peace came and its settlements were made. They were bound by a treaty of which we knew nothing, but which, notwithstanding our ignorance of it, bound them as much as any treaty binds. This war was fought to maintain the sacredness of treaties. Great Britain and France, therefore, can not consent to a change of the treaty in respect of the cession of Shantung, and we have no precedent in our history which permits us even to protest against it until we become members of the league of nations.

"I want this point to sink in, my fellow countrymen: The league of nations changes the international law of the world with regard to matters of this sort. You have heard a great deal about article 10 of the covenant of the league, and I will speak of it presently, but read article 11 in conjunction with article 10. Every member of the league, in article 10, agrees never to impair the territorial integrity of any other member of the league or to interfere with its existing political independence. Both of those things were done in all these concessions. There was a very serious impairment of the territorial integrity of China in every one of them, and a very serious interference with the political independence of that great but helpless kingdom. Article 10 stops that for good and all. Then, in article 11, it is provided that it shall be the friendly right of any member of the league at any time to call attention to anything anywhere that is likely to disturb the peace of the world or the good understanding between nations upon which the peace of the world depends, so that the ban would have been lifted from Mr. McKinley and Mr. Roosevelt in the matter of these things if we had had the covenant of the league; they could have gone in and said, 'Here is your promise to preserve the territorial integrity and political independence of this great people. We have the friendly right to protest. We have the right to call your attention to the fact that this will breed wars and not peace, and that you have not the right to do this thing.' Henceforth, for the first time, we shall have the opportunity to play effective friends to the great people of China, and I for one feel my pulses quicken and my heart rejoice at such a prospect. We, a free people, have hitherto been dumb in the presence of the invasion of the freedom of other free peoples, and now restraint is taken away. I say it is taken away, for we will be members of the covenant. Restraint is taken away, and, like the men that we profess to be, we can speak out in the interest of free people everywhere.

"But that is not all. America, as I have said, was not bound by the agreements of Great Britain and France, on the one hand, and Japan on the other. We were free to insist upon a prospect of a different settlement, and at the instance of the United States Japan has already promised that she will relinquish to China immediately after the ratification of this treaty all the sovereign rights that Germany had in Shantung Province—the only promise of that kind ever made, the only relinquishment of that sort ever achieved—and that she will retain only what foreign corporations have all over China—unfortunately but as a matter of fact—the right to run the railroad and the right to work the mines under the usual conditions of Chinese sovereignty and as economic concessionaires, with no political rights or military power of any kind. It is really an emancipation of China, so far as that Province is concerned, from what is imposed upon her by other nations in other Provinces equally rich and equally important to the independence of China herself. So that inside the league of nations we now have a foothold by which we can play the friend to China.

"And the alternative? If you insist upon cutting out the Shantung arrangement, that merely severs us from the treaty. It does not give Shantung back to China. The only way you can give Shantung back to China is by arms in your hands, armed ships and armed men, sent against Japan and France and Great Britain. A fratricidal strife, in view of what we have gone through! We have just redeemed France. We can not with arms in our hands insist that France break a covenant, however ill judged, however unjust; we can not as her brothers in arms commit any such atrocious act against the fraternity of free people. So much for Shantung. Nobody can get that provision out of that treaty and do China any service whatever, and all such professions of friendship for China are empty noise, for the gentlemen who make those professions must know that what they propose will be not of the slightest service to her.

"That is the only point of serious criticism with regard to the substance of the treaty. All the rest refers to the covenant of the league of nations. With regard to that, my fellow citizens, I have this to say: Without the covenant of the league of nations that treaty can not be executed. Without the adherence of the United States to that covenant, the covenant can not be made effective. To state it another way, the maintenance of the peace of the world and the execution of the treaty depend upon the whole-hearted participation of the people of the United States. I am not stating it as a matter of power. I am not stating it with the thought that the United States has greater material wealth and greater physical power than any other nation. The point that I want you to get is a very profound point; the point is that the United States is the only nation of the world that has sufficient moral force with the rest of the world. It is the only Nation which has proved its disinterestedness. It is the only Nation which is not suspected by the other nations of the world of ulterior purposes. There is not a Province in Europe in which American troops would not at this moment be welcomed with open arms, because the population would know that they had come as friends and would go so soon as their errand was fulfilled. I have had delegations come to me, delegations from countries where disorder made the presence of troops necessary, and beg me to order American troops there. They said, 'We trust them; we want them. They are our friends.' And all the world, provided we do not betray them by rejecting this treaty, will continue to regard us as their friends and follow us as their friends and serve us as their friends. It is the noblest opportunity ever offered to a great people, and we will not turn away from it.

"We are coming now to the grapple, because one question at a time is being cleared away. We are presently going to have a show-down, a show-down on a very definite issue, and I want to bring your minds to that definite issue. A number of objections have been made to the covenant of the league of nations, but they have been disposed of in candid minds. The first was the question whether we could withdraw when we pleased. That is no longer a question in the mind of anybody who has studied the language and real meaning of the covenant. We can withdraw, upon two years' notice, when we please. I state that with absolutely no qualification. Then there was the question as to whether it interfered with self-determination; that is to say, whether there was anything in the guarantee of article 10 about territorial integrity and political independence which would interfere with the assertion of the right of great populations anywhere to change their governments, to throw off the yoke of sovereignties which they did not desire to live under. There is absolutely no such restraint. I was present and can testify that when article 10 was debated the most significant words in it were the words 'against external aggression.' We do not guarantee any government against anything that may happen within its own borders or within its own sovereignty. We merely say that we will not impair its territorial integrity or interfere with its political independence, and we will not countenance other nations outside of it making prey of it in the one way or the other. Every man who sat around that table, and at the table where the conference on the league of nations sat there were 14 free peoples represented, believed in the sacred right of self-determination, would not have dared to go back and face his own people if he had done or said anything that stood in the way of it. That is out of the way. There was some doubt as to whether the Monroe doctrine was properly recognized, though I do not see how anybody who could read the English language could have raised the doubt. The covenant says that nothing contained in it shall be construed as affecting the validity of the Monroe doctrine, so that by a sudden turn in the whole judgment of the world the Monroe doctrine was accepted by all the great powers of the world. I know what their first impressions were about it. I know the history of their change of mind, and I know the heartiness and unanimity of the conclusion. Nothing can henceforth embarrass the policy of the United States in applying the Monroe doctrine according to her own judgment. But there was apprehension that some kind of a supergovernment had been set up which could some day interfere in our domestic affairs, say that our immigration laws were too rigorous and wrong; that our laws of naturalization were too strict and severe; that our tariff policy did not suit the rest of the world. The covenant expressly excludes interference with domestic questions, expressly states that it shall not be the right of any authority of the league to interfere in matters of that sort. That matter is cleared away by everybody who can understand the clauses in question.

"There is another matter in that connection I want to speak of. The constitution of the league of nations is not often enough explained. It is made up of two bodies. One body, which is a comparatively large body, is called the assembly. The assembly is not an originative body. The assembly is, so to say, the court of the public opinion of the world. It is where you can broach questions, but not decide them. It is where you can debate anything that affects the peace of the world, but not determine upon a course of action upon anything that affects the peace of the world. The whole direction of the action of the league is vested in another body known as the council, and nothing in the form of an active measure, no policy, no recommendation with regard to the action of the governments composing the league, can proceed except upon a unanimous vote of the council. Mark you, a unanimous vote of the council. In brief, inasmuch as the United States of America is to be a permanent member of the council of the league, the league can take no step whatever without the consent of the United States of America. My fellow citizens, think of the significance of that in view of the debates you have been listening to. There is not a single active step that the league can take unless we vote aye. The whole matter is, in that negative sense, in the ability to stop any action, in our hands. I am sometimes inclined to think that that weakens the league, that it has not freedom of action enough, notwithstanding that I share with all of my fellow countrymen a very great jealousy with regard to setting up any power that could tell us to do anything, but no such power is set up. Whenever a question of any kind with regard to active policy—and there are only three or four of them—is referred to the assembly for its vote, its vote in the affirmative must include the representatives of all the nations which are represented on the council. In the assembly, as in the council, any single nation that is a member of the council has a veto upon active conclusions. That is my comment upon what you have been told about Great Britain having six votes and our having one. I am perfectly content with the arrangement, since our one offsets the British six. I do not want to be a repeater; if my one vote goes, I do not want to repeat it five times.

"And is it not just that in this debating body, from which without the unanimous concurrence of the council no active proceeding can originate, that these votes should have been given to the self-governing powers of the British Empire? I am ready to maintain that position. Is it not just that those stout little Republics out in the Pacific, of New Zealand and Australia, should be able to stand up in the councils of the world and say something? Do you not know how Australia has led the free peoples of the world in many matters that have led to social and industrial reform? It is one of the most enlightened communities in the world and absolutely free to choose its own way of life independent of the British authority, except in matters of foreign relationship. Do you not think that it is natural that that stout little body of men whom we so long watched with admiration in their contest with the British Crown in South Africa should have the right to stand up and talk before the world? They talked once with their arms and, if I may judge by my contact with them, they can talk with their minds. They know what the interests of South Africa are, and they are independent in their control of the interests of South Africa. Two of the most impressive and influential men I met in Paris were representatives of South Africa, both of them members of the British peace delegation in Paris, and yet both of them generals who had made British generals take notice through many months of their power to fight—the men whom Great Britain had fought and beaten and felt obliged to hand over their own government to, and say, 'It is yours and not ours.' They were men who spoke counsel, who spoke frank counsel. And take our neighbor on the north—do you not think Canada is entitled to a speaking part? I have pointed out to you that her voting part is offset, but do you not think she is entitled to a speaking part? Do you not think that that fine dominion has been a very good neighbor? Do you not think she is a good deal more like the United States than she is like Great Britain? Do you not feel that probably you think alike? The only other vote given to the British Empire is given to that hitherto voiceless mass of humanity that lives in that region of romance and pity that we know as India. I am willing that India should stand up in the councils of the world and say something. I am willing that speaking parts should be assigned to these self-governing, self-respecting, energetic portions of the great body of humanity.

"I take leave to say that the deck is cleared of these bugaboos. We can get out if we want to. I am not interested in getting out. I am interested in getting on. But we can get out. The door is not locked. You can sit on the edge of your chair and scuttle any time you want to. There are so many who are interested first of all in knowing that they are not in for anything that can possibly impose anything on them. Well, we are not in for anythng that we do not want to continue to carry. We can help in the matters of self-determination, as we never helped before. The six votes of the British Empire are offset by our own, if we choose to offset them. I dare say we shall often agree with them; but if we do not, they can not do anything that we do not consent to. The Monroe doctrine is taken care of. There is no danger of interference with domestic questions.

"Well, what remains? Nothing except article 10, and that is the heart of the whole covenant. Anybody who proposes to cut out article 10 proposes to cut all the supports from under the peace and security of the world, and we must face the question in that light; we must draw the issue as sharply as that; we must see it through as distinctly as that. Let me repeat article 10. I do not know that I can do it literally, but I can come very near it. Under article 10 every member of the league engages to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of the other members of the league. That cuts at the taproot of war. The wars of the past have been leveled against the liberties of peoples and territories of those who could not defend them, and if you do not cut at that taproot, that upas tree is going to grow again; and I tell you, my fellow countrymen, that if you do not cut it up now it will be harder to cut it up next time. The next time will come; it will come while this generation is living, and the children that crowd about our car as we move from station to station will be sacrificed upon the altar of that war. It will be the last war. Humanity will never suffer another, if humanity survives. My fellow countrymen, do you realize that at the end of the war that has just closed new instruments of destruction had been invented and were about to be used that exceeded in terrible force and destructive power any that had been used before in this war? You have heard with wonder of those great cannon from which the Germans sent shells 70 miles into Paris. Just before the war closed shells had been invented that could be made to steer themselves and carry immense bodies of explosives a hundred miles into the interior of countries, no matter how great the serried ranks of their soldiers were at the border. This war will be child's play as compared with another war. You have got to cut the root of that upas tree now or betray all future generations.

"And we can not without our vote in the council, even in support of article 10, be drawn into wars that we do not wish to be drawn into. The second sentence of article 10 is that the council shall advise as to the method of fulfilling this guaranty, that the council, which must vote by unanimous vote, must advise—can not direct—what is to be done for the maintenance of the honor of its members and for the maintenance of the peace of the world. Is there anything that can frighten a man or a woman or a child, with just thought or red blood, in those provisions? And yet listen. I understand that this reservation is under consideration. I ask your very attentive ear.

"The United States assumes no obligation under the provisions of article 10 to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country or to interfere in controversies between other nations, whether members of the league or not, or to employ the military and naval forces of the United States under any article of the treaty for any purpose, unless in any particular case the Congress, which under the Constitution has the sole power to declare war or authorize the employment of the military and naval forces of the United States, shall by act or joint resolution so declare.

"In other words, my fellow citizens, what this proposes is this: That we should make no general promise, but leave the nations associated with us to guess in each instance what we were going to consider ourselves bound to do and what we were not going to consider ourselves bound to do. It is as if you said, 'We will not join the league definitely, but we will join it occasionally. We will not promise anything, but from time to time we may cooperate. We will not assume any obligations.' Observe, my fellow citizens, as I have repeatedly said to you and can not say too often, the council of the league can not oblige us to take military action without the consent of Congress. There is no possibility of that. But this reservation proposes that we should not acknowledge any moral obligation in the matter; that we should stand off and say, 'We will see, from time to time; consult us when you get into trouble, and then we will have a debate, and after two or three months we will tell you what we are going to do.' The thing is unworthy and ridiculous, and I want to say distinctly that, as I read this, it would change the entire meaning of the treaty and exempt the United States from all responsibility for the preservation of peace. It means the rejection of the treaty, my fellow countrymen, nothing less. It means that the United States would take from under the structure its very foundations and support.

"I happen to know that there are some men in favor of that reservation who do not in the least degree realize its meaning, men whom I greatly respect, men who have just as much ardor to carry out the promises of the United States as I have, and I am not indicting their purpose, but I am calling their attention to the fact that if any such reservation as that should be adopted I would be obliged as the Executive of the United States to regard it as a rejection of the treaty. I ask them, therefore, to consider this matter very carefully, for I want you to realize, and I hope they realize, what the rejection of the treaty means—two isolated and suspected people, the people of Germany and the people of the United States. Germany is not admitted to respectable company yet. She is not permitted to enter the league until such time as she shall have proved to the satisfaction of the world that her change of government and change of heart is real and permanent. Then she can be admitted. Now, her dearest desire, feeling her isolation, knowing all the consequences that would result, economic and social, is to see the United States also cut off its association with the gallant peoples with whom side by side we fought this war. I am not making this statement by conjecture. We get it directly from the mouths of authoritative persons in Germany that their dearest hope is that America will now accomplish by the rejection of the treaty what Germany was not able to accomplish by her arms. She tried to separate us from the rest of the world. She tried to antagonize the rest of the world against the United States, and she failed so long as American armies were in the field. Shall she succeed now, when only American voters are in the field? The issue is final. We can not avoid it. We have got to make it now, and, once made, there can be no turning back. We either go in with the other free peoples of the world to guarantee the peace of the world now, or we stay out and on some dark and disastrous day seek admission to the league of nations along with Germany. The rejection of this treaty, my fellow citizens, means the necessity of negotiating a separate treaty with Germany. That separate treaty between Germany and the United States could not alter any sentence of this treaty. It could not affect the validity of any sentence of this treaty. It would simply be the Government of the United States going, hat in hand, to the assembly at Weimar and saying, 'May it please you, we have dissociated ourselves from those who were your enemies; we have come to you asking if you will consent to terms of amity and peace which will dissociate us, both of us, from the comradeship of arms and liberty.' There is no other interpretation. There is no other issue. That is the issue, and every American must face it.

"But I talk, my fellow citizens, as if I doubted what the decision would be. I happen to have been born and bred in America. There is not anything in me that is not American. I dare says that I inherit a certain stubbornness from an ancient stock from which I am remotely derived; but, then, all of you are derived, more or less remotely, from other stocks. You remember the exclamation of the Irishman who said when he was called a foreigner, 'You say we are furriners; I'd like to know who sittled this kintry but furriners!' We were all foreigners once, but we have undergone a climatic change, and the marvel of America is its solidarity, is its homogeneity, in the midst of its variety. The marvel about America is that, no matter what a man's stock and origin, you can always tell that he is an American the minute he begins to express an opinion. He may look sometimes like a foreigner, but tap him and you will find that the contents is American. Having been bred in that way myself, I do not have to conjecture what the judgments of America are going to be about a great question like this. I know beforehand, and I am only sorry for the men who do not know. If I did not know the law of custom and of honor against betting on a certainty, I would like to bet with them. But it would not be fair; I would be taking advantage of them.

"If I may close with a word, not of jest but of solemnity, I want to say, my fellow citizens, that there can be no exaggerating the importance of this peace and the importance of its immediate ratification, because the world will not and can not settle down to normal conditions, either in America or anywhere else, until it knows what the future is going to be. If it must know that the future is going to be one of disorder and of rivalry and of the old contests of power, let it know it at once, so it can make its arrangements and its calculations and lay its taxes and recruit its armies and build its ships for the next great fight; but if, on the other hand, it can be told that it will have an insurance against war, that a great body of powerful nations has entered into a solemn covenant to substitute arbitration and discussion for war, for that is the heart of the covenant, that all the great fighting peoples of the world have engaged to forego war and substitute arbitration and discussion—if it can know that the minds will be quieted, the disorders will presently cease; then men will know that we have the opportunity to do that great, that transcendent duty that lies ahead of us, sit quietly down in council chambers and work out the proper reforms of our own industrial and economic life. They have got to be worked out. If this treaty is not ratified, they will be worked out in disorder throughout the world. I am not now intimating, for I do not think, that disorder will shake the foundations of our own affairs, but it will shake the foundations of the world, and these inevitable, indispensable reforms will be worked out amongst disorder and suspicion and hatred and violence, whereas if we can have the healing influences of assured peace they will be worked out in amity and quiet and by the judgment of men rather than by the passions of men. God grant that that day may come, and come soon! Above all, may God grant that it may come under the leadership of America!"

THE PRESIDENT AT AUDITORIUM, DENVER, COLO., SEPTEMBER 25, 1919.

"Mr. Chairman, my fellow countrymen, I always feel a thrill of pride in standing before a great company of my fellow citizens to speak for this great document which we shall always know as the treaty of Versailles. I am proud to speak for it, because for the first time in the history of international consultation men have turned away from the ambitions of governments and have sought to advance the fortunes of peoples. They have turned away from all those older plans of domination and sought to lay anew the foundations for the liberty of mankind. I say without hesitation that this is a great document of liberation. It is a new charter for the liberty of men.

"As we have advanced from week to week and from month to month in the debate of this great document, I think a great many things that we talked about at first have cleared away. A great many difficulties which were at first discovered, or which some fancied that they had discovered, have been removed. The center and heart of this document is that great instrument which is placed at the beginning of it, the covenant of the league of nations. I think everybody now understands that you can not work this treaty without that covenant. Everybody certainly understands that you have no insurance for the continuance of this settlement without the covenant of the league of nations, and you will notice that, with the single exception of the provision with regard to the transfer of the German rights in Shantung in China to Japan, practically nothing in the body of the treaty has seemed to constitute any great obstacle to its adoption. All the controversy, all the talk, has centered on the league of nations, and I am glad to see the issue center; I am glad to see the issue clearly drawn, for now we have to decide, Shall we stand by the settlements of liberty, or shall we not?

"I want, just by way of introduction and clarification, to point out what is not often enough explained to audiences in this country, the actual constitution of the league of nations. It is very simply constituted. It consists of two bodies, a council and an assembly. The assembly is the numerous body. In it every self-governing State that is a member of the league is represented, and not only the self-governing independent States, but the self-governing colonies and dominions, such as Canada, New Zealand, Australia, India, and South Africa, are all represented in the assembly. It is in the assembly that the combined representation of the several parts of the British Empire are assigned six votes, and you are constantly being told that Great Britain has six votes and we have one. I want you to appreciate the full significance of that. They have six votes in the assembly, and the assembly does not vote. That bubble is exploded. There are several matters in which the vote of the assembly must cooperate with the vote of the council, but in every such case an unanimous vote of the council is necessary, and, inasmuch as the United States is a permanent member of the council, her vote is necessary to every active policy of the league. Therefore the single vote of the United States always counts six, so far as the votes of the British Empire are concerned, and if it is a mere question of pride, I would rather be one and count six than six and count six.

"That affords emphasis to the point I wish you to keep distinctly in mind with regard to reservations and all the qualifications of ratification which are being discussed. No active policy can be undertaken by the league without the assenting vote of the United States. I can not understand the anxiety of some gentlemen for fear something is going to be put over on them. I can not understand why, having read the covenant of the league and examined its constitution, they are not satisfied with the fact that every active policy of the league must be concurred in by a unanimous vote of the council, which means that the affirmative vote of the United States is in every instance necessary. That being the case, it becomes sheer nonsense, my fellow citizens, to talk about a supergovernment being set up over the United States; it becomes sheer nonsense to say that any authority is constituted which can order our armies to other parts of the world, which can interfere with our domestic questions, which can direct our international policy even in any matter in which we do not consent to be directed. We would be under our own direction just as much under the covenant of the league of nations as we are now. Of course, I do not mean to say that we do not, so to say, pool our moral issues. We do that. In acquiescing in the covenant of the league we do adopt, and we should adopt, certain fundamental moral principles of right and justice, which, I dare say, we do not need to promise to live up to, but which we are certainly proud to promise to live up to. We are not turning any corner. We always have lived up to them, and we do not intend to change our course of action or our standards of action. And it is American standards of action that are set up in the covenant of the league of nations.

"What is the covenant for? To hear most of the debate, you would think that it was an ingenious contrivance for a subtle interference with the affairs of the United States. On the contrary, it is one of the most solemn covenants ever entered into by all the great fighting powers of the world that they never will resort to war again without first having either submitted the question at issue to arbitration and undertaken to abide by the verdict of the arbitrators or submitted it to discussion by the council of the league of nations, laying all the documents, all the facts, before that council, consenting that that council should lay all those documents and all those facts before the world; they agree to allow six months for that discussion, and, even if they are not satisfied with the opinion, for it is only an opinion in that case, rendered by the council, they agree not to go to war for three months after the opinion has been rendered. There you have nine months' submission to the moral judgment of the world. In my judgment, that is an almost complete assurance against war. If any such covenant as that had existed in 1914, Germany never would have gone to war. The one thing that Germany could not afford to do, and knew that she could not afford to do, was to submit her case to the public opinion of the world. We have now abundant proof of what would have happened, because it was the moral judgment of the world that combined the world against Germany. We were a long time, my fellow citizens, seeing that we belonged in the war, but just so soon as the real issues of it became apparent we knew that we belonged there. And we did an unprecedented thing. We threw the whole power of a great nation into a quarrel with the origination of which it had nothing to do. I think there is nothing that appeals to the imagination more in the history of men than those convoyed fleets crossing the ocean with millions of American soldiers aboard—those crusaders, those men who loved liberty enough to leave their homes and fight for it upon distant fields of battle, those men who swung out into the open as if in fulfillment of the long prophecy of American history. There is nothing finer in the records of public action than the united spirit of the American people behind this great enterprise.

"I ask your close observation to current events, my fellow countrymen. Out of doors, that is to say, that out of legislative halls, there is no organized opposition to this treaty except among the people who tried to defeat the purpose of this Government in the war. Hyphens are the knives that are being stuck into this document. The issue is clearly drawn. Inasmuch as we are masters of our own participation in the action of the league of nations, why do we need reservations? If we can not be obliged to do anything that we do not ourselves vote to do, why qualify our acceptance of a perfectly safe agreement? There can be only one object, my fellow citizens, and that is to give the United States a standing of exceptional advantage in the league, to exempt it from obligations which the other members assume, or to put a special interpretation upon the duties of the United States under the covenant which interpretation is not applied to the duties of other members of the league under the covenant. I, for my part, say that it is unworthy of the United States to ask any special privilege of that kind. I am for going into a body of equals or staying out. That is the very principle we have been fighting for and have been proud to fight for, that the rights of a weak nation were just as sacred as the rights of a great nation. That is what this treaty was drawn to establish. You must not think of this treaty alone. The lines of it are being run out into the Austrian treaty and the Hungarian treaty and the Bulgarian treaty and the Turkish treaty, and in every one of them the principle is this, to deliver peoples who have been living under sovereignties that were alien and unwelcome from the bondage under which they have lived, to turn over to them their own territory, to adopt the American principle that all just government is derived from the consent of the governed. All down through the center of Europe and into the heart of Asia has gone this process of liberation, taking alien yokes off the necks of such peoples and vindicating the American principle that you can not impose upon anybody a sovereignty that is not of its own choice. And if the results of this great liberation are not guaranteed, then they will fall down like a house of cards. What was the program of Pan-Germanism? You know the formula—from Bremen to Bagdad. Very well; that is the very stretch of country over which these people have been liberated. New States, one after another, have been set up by the action of the conference at Paris all along the route that was intended to be the route of German dominion, and if we now merely set them up and leave them in their weakness to take care of themselves, then Germans can at their leisure, by intriguing, by every subtle process of which they are master, accomplish what they could not accomplish by arms, and we will have abandoned the people whom we redeemed. The thing is inconceivable. The thing is impossible.

"We therefore have come to the straight-cut line—adoption or rejection. Qualified adoption is not adoption. It is perfectly legitimate, I admit, to say in what sense we understand certain articles. They are all perfectly obvious in meaning, so far as I can see, but if you want to make the obvious more obvious I do not see any objection to that; if by the multiplication of words you can make simple words speak their meaning more distinctly, I think that that is an interesting rhetorical exercise, but nothing more. Qualification means asking special exemptions and privileges for the United States. We can not ask that. We must either go in or stay out. Now, if we go in what do we get? I am not now confining my view to ourselves. America has shown the world that she does not stop to calculate the lower sort of advantage and disadvantage; that she goes in upon a high plane of principle, and is willing to serve mankind while she is serving herself. What we gain in this treaty is, first of all, the substitution of arbitration and discussion for war. If you got nothing else, it is worth the whole game to get that. My fellow citizens, we fought this war in order that there should not be another like it. I am under bonds, I am under bonds to my fellow citizens of every sort, and I am particularly under bonds to the mothers of this country and to the wives of this country and to the sweethearts, that I will do everything in my power to see to it that their sons and husbands and sweethearts never have to make that supreme sacrifice again. And when I passed your beautiful Capitol Square just now and saw thousands of children there to greet me, I felt a lump in my throat. These are the little people that I am arguing for. These are my clients, these lads coming on and these girls that, staying at home, would suffer more than the lads who died on the battle field, for it is the tears at home that are more bitter than the agony upon the field. I dare not turn away from the straight path I have set myself to redeem this promise that I have made.

"If you say, 'What is there? An absolute insurance against war?' I say, 'Certainly not.' Nobody can give you an insurance against human passion, but if you can get a little insurance against an infinite catastrophe, is it not better than getting none at all? Let us assume that it is only 25 per cent insurance against war. Can any humane man reject that insurance? Let us suppose that it is 50 per cent insurance against war. Why, my friends, my calm judgment is that it is 99 per cent insurance against war. That is what I went over to Europe to get, and that is what I got, and that is what I have brought back.

"Stop for a moment to think about the next war, if there should be one. I do not hesitate to say that the war we have just been through, though it was shot through with terror of every kind, is not to be compared with the war we would have to face next time. There were destructive gases, there were methods of explosive destruction unheard of even during this war, which were just ready for use when the war ended—great projectiles that guided themselves and shot into the heavens went for a hundred miles and more and then burst tons of explosives upon helpless cities, something to which the guns with which the Germans bombarded Paris from a distance were not comparable. What the Germans used were toys as compared with what would be used in the next war. Ask any soldier if he wants to go through a hell like that again. The soldiers know what the next war would be. They know what the inventions were that were just about to be used for the absolute destruction of mankind. I am for any kind of insurance against a barbaric reversal of civilization.

"And by consequence, the adoption of the treaty means disarmament. Think of the economic burden and the restraint of liberty in the development of professional and mechanical life that resulted from the maintenance of great armies, not only in Germany but in France and in Italy and, to some extent, in Great Britain. If the United States should stand off from this thing we would have to have the biggest army in the world. There would be nobody else that cared for our fortunes. We would have to look out for ourselves, and when I hear gentlemen say, 'Yes; that is what we want to do; we want to be independent and look out for ourselves.' I say, 'Well, then, consult your fellow citizens. There will have to be universal conscription. There will have to be taxes such as even yet we have not seen. There will have to be a concentration of authority in the Government capable of using this terrible instrument. You can not conduct a war or command an army by a debating society. You can not determine in community centers what the command of the Commander in Chief is going to be; you will have to have a staff like the German staff, and you will have to center in the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy the right to take instant action for the protection of the Nation.' America will never consent to any such thing.

"Then, if we have this great treaty, we have what the world never had before—a court of public opinion of the world. I do not think that you can exaggerate the significance of that, my fellow countrymen. International law up to this time has been the most singular code of manners. You could not mention to any other Government anything that concerned it unless you could prove that your own interests were immediately involved. Unless you could prove that it was your own material interest that was involved, it was impolite to speak of it. There might be something brooding that threatened the peace of the world, and you could not speak of it unless the interests of the United States were involved. I am going to allude for a moment to a matter so interesting that I wish I could develop it. This cession in Shantung Province in China, which China gave to Germany in 1898, was an iniquitous thing at the outset; but our great President, William McKinley, and our great Secretary of State, John Hay, did not protest against it. It was an outrageous invasion of the rights of China. They not only did not protest, but all they asked was that Germany, after she got what did not belong to her, would please not close the doors against the trade of the United States. I am not saying this by way of criticism. That is all that under international manners they had a right to ask. International law has been the principle of minding your own business, particularly when something outrageous was up; and article 11 of the league of nations makes matters of that sort everybody's business. Under article 11, any member of the league can at any time call attention to anything, anywhere, which is likely to affect the peace of the world or the good understanding between nations upon which the peace of the world depends. The littlest nation, along with the biggest—Panama, to take one of our own near neighbors—can stand up and challenge the right of any nation in the world to do a thing which threatens the peace of the world. It does not have to be a big nation to do it.

"The voice of the world is at last released. The conscience of the world is at last given a forum, and the rights of men not liberated under this treaty are given a place where they can be heard. If there are nations which wish to exercise the power of self-determination but are not liberated by this treaty, they can come into that great forum, they can point out how their demands affect the peace and quiet of the world, they can point out how their demands affect the good understanding between nations. There is a forum here for the rights of mankind which was never before dreamed of, and in that forum any representative has the right to speak his full mind. If that is not a wholesome moral clearing house, I wish somebody would suggest a better. It is just a moral clearing house that the world needs. There have been a great many things unspoken that ought to have been spoken. There have been voiceless multitudes all over the world who had nobody to speak for them in any court of conscience anywhere, and now they are given spokesmen. All forward-looking men may now see their way to the method in which they may help forward the real processes of civilization.

"There is another matter which I am sure will interest a great many within the sound of my voice. If we do not have this treaty of peace, labor will continue to be regarded, not as it ought to be regarded, a human function, but as a purchasable commodity throughout the world. There is inserted in this great treaty a Magna Charta of labor. There is set up here a means of periodic examination of the conditions of labor all over the world, particularly the labor of women and children and those who have not the physical force to handle some of the burdens that are put upon them, and it is made the duty of the nations of the world constantly to study the methods of raising the levels of human labor. You know what that means. We have not done our full duty with regard to the amelioration and betterment of the conditions of labor in America, but the conditions here are better than they are anywhere else. We now have an opportunity to exercise our full influence to raise the levels everywhere to the levels which we have tried to maintain in this country, and then to take them higher into the fields of that sort of association between those who employ labor and those who execute it as will make it a real human relationship and not a mere commercial relationship. The heart of the world has never got into this business yet. The conscience of the world has never been released along lines of action in regard to the improvement of the conditions of labor. And more than that, until we find such methods as I have been alluding to, we are never releasing the real energies of this people. Men are not going to work and produce what they would produce if they feel that they are not justly treated. If you want to realize the real wealth of this country, then bring about the human relationship between employers and employees which will make them colaborers and partners and fellow workers. All of that is open to us through the instrumentality of the league of nations under this great treaty, and still we debate whether we should ratify it or not.

"There is a great deal of pleasure in talking, I admit; and some men, even some men I do not agree with, I admit, talk very well, indeed. It is a pleasure to hear them when they are honest; it is a pleasure to be instructed by them when they know what they are talking about. But we have reached the stage now when all the things that needed to be debated have been debated and all the doubts are cleared up. They are cleared up just as thoroughly as the English language can clear them. The people of the United States are no longer susceptible to being misled as to what is in this covenant, and they now have an exceedingly interesting choice to make. I have said it a great many times, my fellow countrymen, but I must say it again, because it is a pleasant thing to testify about—the fundamental thing that I discovered on the other side of the water was that all the great peoples of the world are looking to America for leadership. There can be no mistaking that. The evidences were too overwhelming, the evidences were too profoundly significant, because what underlay them was this: We are the only Nation which so far has not laid itself open to suspicion of ulterior motives. We are the only Nation which has not made it evident that when we go to anybody's assistance we mean to stay there longer than we are welcome. Day after day I received delegations in Paris asking—what? Credits from the United States? No. Merchandise from the United States? Yes, if possible; but that was not the chief point. They were asking that I send American troops to take the place of other troops, because they said, 'Our people will welcome them with open arms as friends who have come for their sakes and not for anything that America can possibly in the future have in mind.' What an extraordinary tribute to the principles of the United States! What an extraordinary tribute to the sincerity of the people of the United States! I never was so proud in my life as when these evidences began to accumulate. I had been proud always of being an American, but I never before realized fully what it meant. It meant to stand at the front of the moral forces of the world.

"My fellow citizens, I think we must come to sober and immediate conclusions. There is no turning aside from the straight line. We must now either accept this arrangement or reject it. If we accept it, there is no danger either to our safety or to our honor. If we reject it, we will meet with suspicion, with distrust, with dislike, with disillusionment everywhere in the world. This treaty has to be carried out. In order to carry this treaty out, it is necessary to reconstruct Europe economically and industrially. If we do not take part in that reconstruction, we will be shut out from it, and by consequence the markets of Europe will be shut to us. The combinations of European Governments can be formed to exclude us wherever it is possible to exclude us; and if you want to come to the hard and ugly basis of material interest, the United States will everywhere trade at an overwhelming disadvantage just so soon as we have forfeited, and deserved to forfeit, the confidence of the world. I ask merchants, 'Who are good customers, friends or enemies? Who are good customers, those who open their doors to you or those who have made some private arrangement elsewhere which makes it impossible for them to trade with you?' I have heard Europe spoken of as bankrupt. There may be great difficulties in paying the public debts, but there are going to be no insuperable difficulties to rebeginning the economic and industrial life of Europe. The men are there, the materials are there, the energy is there, and the hope is there. The nations are not crushed. They are ready for the great enterprises of the future, and it is for us to choose whether we will enter those great enterprises upon a footing of advantage and of honor or upon a footing of disadvantage and distrust.

"Therefore, from every point of view, I challenge the opponents of this treaty to show cause why it should not be ratified. I challenge them to show cause why there should be any hesitation in ratifying it. I do not understand delays. I do not understand covert processes of opposition. It is time that we knew where we shall stand, for observe, my fellow citizens, the negotiation of treaties rests with the Executive of the United States. When the Senate has acted, it will be for me to determine whether its action constitutes an adoption or a rejection, and I beg the gentlemen who are responsible for the action of the United States Senate to make it perfectly clear whether it is an adoption or a rejection. I do not wish to draw doubtful conclusions. I do not wish to do injustice to the process of any honest mind. But when that treaty is acted upon I must know whether it means that we have ratified it or rejected it, and I feel confident that I am speaking for the people of the United States.

"When it is around election time, my fellow citizens, a man ought to be doubtful of what the meaning of his intercourse with his fellow citizens is, because it is easy for applause to go to the head; it is easy for applause to seem to men more than it does; it is easy for the assurances of individual support to be given a wider implication than can properly be given to them. I thank God that on this occasion the whole issue has nothing to do with me. I did not carry any purpose of my own to Paris. I did not carry any purpose that I did not know from the action of public opinion in the United States was the purpose of the United States. It was not the purpose of a party. It was not the purpose of any section of our fellow citizens. It was a purpose subscribed to by American public opinion and formally adopted by the Governments with which we had to deal on the other side, and I came back with a document embodying the principles insisted upon at the outset and carried by the American delegation to Paris. Therefore I think that I have the right to say that I have the support of the people of the United States. The issue is so big that it transcends all party and personal things. I was a spokesman; I was an instrument. I did not speak any privately conceived idea of my own. I had merely tried to absorb the influences of public opinion in the United States, and that, my fellow citizens, is the function of all of us. We ought not in a great crisis like this to follow any private opinion; we ought not to follow any private purpose; we ought, above all things, to forget that we are ever divided into parties when we vote. We are all democrats—I will not insist upon the large 'D'—we are all democrats because we believe in a people's government, and what I am pleading for is nothing less than a people's peace."

THE PRESIDENT AT PUEBLO, COLO., SEPTEMBER 25, 1919.

"Mr. Chairman and fellow countrymen, it is with a great deal of genuine pleasure that I find myself in Pueblo, and I feel it a compliment that I should be permitted to be the first speaker in this beautiful hall. One of the advantages of this hall, as I look about, is that you are not too far away from me, because there is nothing so reassuring to men who are trying to express the public sentiment as getting into real personal contact with their fellow citizens. I have gained a renewed impression as I have crossed the continent this time of the homogeneity of this great people to whom we belong. They come from many stocks, but they are all of one kind. They come from many origins, but they are all shot through with the same principles and desire the same righteous and honest things. I have received a more inspiring impression this time of the public opinion of the United States than it was ever my privilege to receive before.

"The chief pleasure of my trip has been that it has nothing to do with my personal fortunes, that it has nothing to do with my personal reputation, that it has nothing to do with anything except great principles uttered by Americans of all sorts and of all parties which we are now trying to realize at this crisis of the affairs of the world. But there have been unpleasant impressions as well as pleasant impressions, my fellow citizens, as I have crossed the continent. I have perceived more and more that men have been busy creating an absolutely false impression of what the treaty of peace and the covenant of the league of nations contain and mean. I find, moreover, that there is an organized propaganda against the league of nations and against the treaty proceeding from exactly the same sources that the organized propaganda proceeded from which threatened this country here and there with disloyalty, and I want to say—I can not say too often—any man who carries a hyphen about with him carries a dagger that he is ready to plunge into the vitals of this Republic whenever he gets ready. If I can catch any man with a hyphen in this great contest I will know that I have got an enemy of the Republic. My fellow citizens, it is only certain bodies of foreign sympathies, certain bodies of sympathy with foreign nations that are organized against this great document which the American representatives have brought back from Paris. Therefore, in order to clear away the mists, in order to remove the impressions, in order to check the falsehoods that have clustered around this great subject, I want to tell you a few very simple things about the treaty and the covenant.

"Do not think of this treaty of peace as merely a settlement with Germany. It is that. It is a very severe settlement with Germany, but there is not anything in it that she did not earn. Indeed, she earned more than she can ever be able to pay for, and the punishment exacted of her is not a punishment greater than she can bear, and it is absolutely necessary in order that no other nation may ever plot such a thing against humanity and civilization. But the treaty is so much more than that. It is not merely a settlement with Germany; it is a readjustment of those great injustices which underlie the whole structure of European and Asiatic society. This is only the first of several treaties. They are all constructed upon the same plan. The Austrian treaty follows the same lines. The treaty with Hungary follows the same lines. The treaty with Bulgaria follows the same lines. The treaty with Turkey, when it is formulated, will follow the same lines. What are those lines? They are based upon the purpose to see that every government dealt with in this great settlement is put in the hands of the people and taken out of the hands of coteries and of sovereigns who had no right to rule over the people. It is a people's treaty, that accomplishes by a great sweep of practical justice the liberation of men who never could have liberated themselves, and the power of the most powerful nations has been devoted not to their aggrandizement but to the liberation of people whom they could have put under their control if they had chosen to do so. Not one foot of territory is demanded by the conquerors, not one single item of submission to their authority is demanded by them. The men who sat around that table in Paris knew that the time had come when the people were no longer going to consent to live under masters, but were going to live the lives that they chose themselves, to live under such governments as they chose themselves to erect. That is the fundamental principle of this great settlement.

"And we did not stop with that. We added a great international charter for the rights of labor. Reject this treaty, impair it, and this is the consequence to the laboring men of the world, that there is no international tribunal which can bring the moral judgments of the world to bear upon the great labor questions of the day. What we need to do with regard to the labor questions of the day, my fellow countrymen, is to lift them into the light, is to lift them out of the haze and distraction of passion, of hostility, out into the calm spaces where men look at things without passion. The more men you get into a great discussion the more you exclude passion. Just so soon as the calm judgment of the world is directed upon the question of justice to labor, labor is going to have a forum such as it never was supplied with before, and men everywhere are going to see that the problem of labor is nothing more nor less than the problem of the elevation of humanity. We must see that all the questions which have disturbed the world, all the questions which have eaten into the confidence of men toward their governments, all the questions which have disturbed the processes of industry, shall be brought out where men of all points of view, men of all attitudes of mind, men of all kinds of experience, may contribute their part to the settlement of the great questions which we must settle and can not ignore.

"At the front of this great treaty is put the covenant of the league of nations. It will also be at the front of the Austrian treaty and the Hungarian treaty and the Bulgarian treaty and the treaty with Turkey. Every one of them will contain the covenant of the league of nations, because you can not work any of them without the covenant of the league of nations. Unless you get the united, concerted purpose and power of the great Governments of the world behind this settlement, it will fall down like a house of cards. There is only one power to put behind the liberation of mankind, and that is the power of mankind. It is the power of the united moral forces of the world, and in the covenant of the league of nations the moral forces of the world are mobilized. For what purpose? Reflect, my fellow citizens, that the membership of this great league is going to include all the great fighting nations of the world, as well as the weak ones. It is not for the present going to include Germany, but for the time being Germany is not a great fighting country. All the nations that have power that can be mobilized are going to be members of this league, including the United States. And what do they unite for? They enter into a solemn promise to one another that they will never use their power against one another for aggression; that they never will impair the territorial integrity of a neighbor; that they never will interfere with the political independence of a neighbor; that they will abide by the principle that great populations are entitled to determine their own destiny and that they will not interfere with that destiny; and that no matter what differences arise amongst them they will never resort to war without first having done one or the other of two things—either submitted the matter of controversy to arbitration, in which case they agree to abide by the result without question, or submitted it to the consideration of the council of the league of nations, laying before that council all the documents, all the facts, agreeing that the council can publish the documents and the facts to the whole world, agreeing that there shall be six months allowed for the mature consideration of those facts by the council, and agreeing that at the expiration of the six months, even if they are not then ready to accept the advice of the council with regard to the settlement of the dispute, they will still not go to war for another three months. In other words, they consent, no matter what happens, to submit every matter of difference between them to the judgment of mankind, and just so certainly as they do that, my fellow citizens, war will be in the far background, war will be pushed out of that foreground of terror in which it has kept the world for generation after generation, and men will know that there will be a calm time of deliberate counsel. The most dangerous thing for a bad cause is to expose it to the opinion of the world. The most certain way that you can prove that a man is mistaken is by letting all his neighbors know what he thinks, by letting all his neighbors discuss what he thinks, and if he is in the wrong you will notice that he will stay at home, he will not walk on the street. He will be afraid of the eyes of his neighbors. He will be afraid of their judgment of his character. He will know that his cause is lost unless he can sustain it by the arguments of right and of justice. The same law that applies to individuals applies to nations.

"But, you say, 'we have heard that we might be at a disadvantage in the league of nations.' Well, whoever told you that either was deliberately falsifying or he had not read the covenant of the league of nations. I leave him the choice. I want to give you a very simple account of the organization of the league of nations and let you judge for yourselves. It is a very simple organization. The power of the league, or rather the activities of the league, lie in two bodies. There is the council, which consists of one representatve from each of the principal allied and associated powers—that is to say, the United States, Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan—along with four other representatives of smaller powers chosen out of the general body of the membership of the league. The council is the source of every active policy of the league, and no active policy of the league can be adopted without a unanimous vote of the council. That is explicitly stated in the covenant itself. Does it not evidently follow that the league of nations can adopt no policy whatever without the consent of the United States? The affirmative vote of the representative of the United States is necessary in every case. Now, you have heard of six votes belonging to the British Empire. Those six votes are not in the council. They are in the assembly, and the interesting thing is that the assembly does not vote. I must qualify that statement a litle, but essentially it is absoluely true. In every matter in which the assembly is given a voice, and there are only four or five, its vote does not count unless concurred in by the representatives of all the nations represented on the council, so that there is no validity to any vote of the assembly unless in that vote also the representative of the United States concurs. That one vote of the United States is as big as the six votes of the British Empire. I am not jealous for advantage, my fellow citizens, but I think that is a perfectly safe situation. There is no validity in a vote, either by the council or the assembly, in which we do not concur. So much for the statements about the six votes of the British Empire.

"Look at it in another aspect. The assembly is the talking body. The assembly was created in order that anybody that purposed anything wrong should be subjected to the awkward circumstance that everybody could talk about it. This is the great assembly in which all the things that are likely to disturb the peace of the world or the good understanding between nations are to be exposed to the general view, and I want to ask you if you think it was unjust, unjust to the United States, that speaking parts should be assigned to the several portions of the British Empire? Do you think it unjust that there should be some spokesman in debate for that fine little stout Republic down in the Pacific, New Zealand? Do you think it was unjust that Australia should be allowed to stand up and take part in the debate—Australia, from which we have learned some of the most useful progressive policies of modern time, a little nation only five million in a great continent, but counting for several times five in its activities and in its interest in liberal reform? Do you think it unjust that that little Republic down in South Africa, whose gallant resistance to being subjected to any outside authority at all we admired for so many months and whose fortunes we followed with such interest, should have a speaking part? Great Britain obliged South Africa to submit to her sovereignty, but she immediately after that felt that it was convenient and right to hand the whole self-government of that colony over to the very men whom she had beaten. The representatives of South Africa in Paris were two of the most distinguished generals of the Boer Army, two of the realest men I ever met, two men that could talk sober counsel and wise advice, along with the best statesmen in Europe. To exclude Gen. Botha and Gen. Smuts from the right to stand up in the parliament of the world and say something concerning the affairs of mankind would be absurd. And what about Canada? Is not Canada a good neighbor? I ask you, Is not Canada more likely to agree with the United States than with Great Britain? Canada has a speaking part. And then, for the first time in the history of the world, that great voiceless multitude, that throng hundreds of millions strong in India, has a voice, and I want to testify that some of the wisest and most dignified figures in the peace conference at Paris came from India, men who seemed to carry in their minds an older wisdom than the rest of us had, whose traditions ran back into so many of the unhappy fortunes of mankind that they seemed very useful counselors as to how some ray of hope and some prospect of happiness could be opened to its people. I for my part have no jealousy whatever of those five speaking parts in the assembly. Those speaking parts can not translate themselves into five votes that can in any matter override the voice and purpose of the United States.

"Let us sweep aside all this language of jealousy. Let us be big enough to know the facts and to welcome the facts, because the facts are based upon the principle that America has always fought for, namely, the equality of self-governing peoples, whether they were big or little—not counting men, but counting rights, not counting representation, but counting the purpose of that representation. When you hear an opinion quoted, you do not count the number of persons who hold it; you ask, 'Who said that?' You weigh opinions, you do not count them, and the beauty of all democracies is that every voice can be heard, every voice can have its effect, every voice can contribute to the general judgment that is finally arrived at. That is the object of democracy. Let us accept what America has always fought for, and accept it with pride that America showed the way and made the proposal. I do not mean that America made the proposal in this particular instance; I mean that the principle was an American principle, proposed by America.

"When you come to the heart of the covenant, my fellow citizens, you will find it in article 10, and I am very much interested to know that the other things have been blown away like bubbles. There is nothing in the other contentions with regard to the league of nations, but there is something in article 10 that you ought to realize and ought to accept or reject. Article 10 is the heart of the whole matter. What is article 10? I never am certain that I can from memory give a literal repetition of its language, but I am sure that I can give an exact interpretation of its meaning. Article 10 provides that every member of the league covenants to respect and preserve the territorial integrity and existing political independence of every other member of the league as against external aggression. Not against internal disturbance. There was not a man at that table who did not admit the sacredness of the right of self-determination, the sacredness of the right of any body of people to say that they would not continue to live under the Government they were then living under, and under article 11 of the covenant they are given a place to say whether they will live under it or not. For following article 10 is article 11, which makes it the right of any member of the league at any time to call attention to anything, anywhere, that is likely to disturb the peace of the world or the good understanding between nations upon which the peace of the world depends. I want to give you an illustration of what that would mean.

"You have heard a great deal—something that was true and a great deal that was false—about that provision of the treaty which hands over to Japan the rights which Germany enjoyed in the Province of Shantung in China. In the first place, Germany did not enjoy any rights there that other nations had not already claimed. For my part, my judgment, my moral judgment, is against the whole set of concessions. They were all of them unjust to China, they ought never to have been exacted, they were all exacted by duress from a great body of thoughtful and ancient and helpless people. There never was any right in any of them. Thank God, America never asked for any, never dreamed of asking for any. But when Germany got this concession in 1898, the Government of the United States made no protest whatever. That was not because the Government of the United States was not in the hands of high-minded and conscientious men. It was. William McKinley was President and John Hay was Secretary of State—as safe hands to leave the honor of the United States in as any that you can cite. They made no protest because the state of international law at that time was that it was none of their business unless they could show that the interests of the United States were affected, and the only thing that they could show with regard to the interests of the United States was that Germany might close the doors of Shantung Province against the trade of the United States. They, therefore, demanded and obtained promises that we could continue to sell merchandise in Shantung. Immediately following that concession to Germany there was a concession to Russia of the same sort, of Port Arthur, and Port Arthur was handed over subsequently to Japan on the very territory of the United States. Don't you remember that when Russia and Japan got into war with one another the war was brought to a conclusion by a treaty written at Portsmouth, N. H., and in that treaty, without the slightest intimation from any authoritative sources in America that the Government of the United States had any objection, Port Arthur, Chinese territory, was turned over to Japan? I want you distinctly to understand that there is no thought of criticism in my mind. I am expounding to you a state of international law. Now, read articles 10 and 11. You will see that international law is revolutionized by putting morals into it. Article 10 says that no member of the league, and that includes all these nations that have demanded these things unjustly of China, shall impair the territorial integrity or the political independence of any other member of the league. China is going to be a member of the league. Article 11 says that any member of the league can call attention to anything that is likely to disturb the peace of the world or the good understanding between nations, and China is for the first time in the history of mankind afforded a standing before the jury of the world. I, for my part, have a profound sympathy for China, and I am proud to have taken part in an arrangement which promises the protection of the world to the rights of China. The whole atmosphere of the world is changed by a thing like that, my fellow citizens. The whole international practice of the world is revolutionized.

"But you will say, 'What is the second sentence of article 10? That is what gives very disturbing thoughts.' The second sentence is that the council of the league shall advise what steps, if any, are necessary to carry out the guaranty of the first sentence, namely, that the members will respect and preserve the territorial integrity and political independence of the other members. I do not know any other meaning for the word 'advise' except 'advise.' The council advises, and it can not advise without the vote of the United States. Why gentlemen should fear that the Congress of the United States would be advised to do something that it did not want to do I frankly can not imagine, because they can not even be advised to do anything unless their own representative has participated in the advice. It may be that that will impair somewhat the vigor of the league, but, nevertheless, the fact is so, that we are not obliged to take any advice except our own, which to any man who wants to go his own course is a very satisfactory state of affairs. Every man regards his own advice as best, and I dare say every man mixes his own advice with some thought of his own interest. Whether we use it wisely or unwisely, we can use the vote of the United States to make impossible drawing the United States into any enterprise that she does not care to be drawn into.

"Yet article 10 strikes at the taproot of war. Article 10 is a statement that the very things that have always been sought in imperialistic wars are henceforth forgone by every ambitious nation in the world. I would have felt very lonely, my fellow countrymen, and I would have felt very much disturbed if, sitting at the peace table in Paris, I had supposed that I was expounding my own ideas. Whether you believe it or not. I know the relative size of my own ideas; I know how they stand related in bulk and proportion to the moral judgments of my fellow countrymen, and I proposed nothing whatever at the peace table at Paris that I had not sufficiently certain knowledge embodied the moral judgment of the citizens of the United States. I had gone over there with, so to say, explicit instructions. Don't you remember that we laid down 14 points which should contain the principles of the settlement? They were not my points. In every one of them I was conscientiously trying to read the thought of the people of the United States, and after I uttered those points I had every assurance given me that could be given me that they did speak the moral judgment of the United States and not my single judgment. Then when it came to that critical period just a little less than a year ago, when it was evident that the war was coming to its critical end, all the nations engaged in the war accepted those 14 principles explicitly as the basis of the armistice and the basis of the peace. In those circumstances I crossed the ocean under bond to my own people and to the other governments with which I was dealing. The whole specification of the method of settlement was written down and accepted beforehand, and we were architects building on those specifications. It reassures me and fortifies my position to find how before I went over men whose judgment the United States has often trusted were of exactly the same opinion that I went abroad to express. Here is something I want to read from Theodore Roosevelt:

"'The one effective move for obtaining peace is by an agreement among all the great powers in which each should pledge itself not only to abide by the decisions of a common tribunal but to back its decisions by force. The great civilized nations should combine by solemn agreement in a great world league for the peace of righteousness; a court should be established. A changed and amplified Hague court would meet the requirements, composed of representatives from each nation, whose representatives are sworn to act as judges in each case and not in a representative capacity.' Now there is article 10. He goes on and says this: 'The nations should agree on certain rights that should not be questioned, such as territorial integrity, their right to deal with their domestic affairs, and with such matters as whom they should admit to citizenship. All such guarantee each of their number in possession of these rights.'

"Now, the other specification is in the covenant. The covenant in another portion guarantees to the members the independent control of their domestic questions. There is not a leg for these gentlemen to stand on when they say that the interests of the United States are not safeguarded in the very points where we are most sensitive. You do not need to be told again that the covenant expressly says that nothing in this covenant shall be construed as affecting the validity of the Monroe doctrine, for example. You could not be more explicit than that. And every point of interest is covered, partly for one very interesting reason. This is not the first time that the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate of the United States has read and considered this covenant. I brought it to this country in March last in a tentative, provisional form, in practically the form that it now has, with the exception of certain additions which I shall mention immediately. I asked the Foreign Relations Committees of both Houses to come to the White House and we spent a long evening in the frankest discussion of every portion that they wished to discuss. They made certain specific suggestions as to what should be contained in this document when it was to be revised. I carried those suggestions to Paris, and every one of them was adopted. What more could I have done? What more could have been obtained? The very matters upon which these gentlemen were most concerned were, the right of withdrawal, which is now expressly stated; the safeguarding of the Monroe doctrine, which is now accomplished; the exclusion from action by the league of domestic questions, which is now accomplished. All along the line, every suggestion of the United States was adopted after the covenant had been drawn up in its first form and had been published for the criticism of the world. There is a very true sense in which I can say this is a tested American document.

"I am dwelling upon these points, my fellow citizens, in spite of the fact that I dare say to most of you they are perfectly well known, because in order to meet the present situation we have got to know what we are dealing with. We are not dealing with the kind of document which this is represented by some gentlemen to be; and inasmuch as we are dealing with a document simon-pure in respect of the very principles we have professed and lived up to, we have got to do one or other of two things—we have got to adopt it or reject it. There is no middle course. You can not go in on a special-privilege basis of your own. I take it that you are too proud to ask to be exempted from responsibilities which the other members of the league will carry. We go in upon equal terms or we do not go in at all; and if we do not go in, my fellow citizens, think of the tragedy of that result—the only sufficient guaranty to the peace of the world withheld! Ourselves drawn apart with that dangerous pride which means that we shall be ready to take care of ourselves, and that means that we shall maintain great standing armies and an irresistible navy; that means we shall have the organization of a military nation; that means we shall have a general staff, with the kind of power that the general staff of Germany had, to mobilize this great manhood of the Nation when it pleases, all the energy of our young men drawn into the thought and preparation for war. What of our pledges to the men that lie dead in France? We said that they went over there, not to prove the prowess of America or her readiness for another war but to see to it that there never was such a war again. It always seems to make it difficult for me to say anything, my fellow citizens, when I think of my clients in this case. My clients are the children; my clients are the next generation. They do not know what promises and bonds I undertook when I ordered the armies of the United States to the soil of France, but I know, and I intend to redeem my pledges to the children; they shall not be sent upon a similar errand.

"Again and again, my fellow citizens, mothers who lost their sons in France have come to me and, taking my hand, have shed tears upon it not only, but they have added, 'God bless you, Mr. President!' Why, my fellow citizens, should they pray God to bless me? I advised the Congress of the United States to create the situation that led to the death of their sons. I ordered their sons oversea. I consented to their sons being put in the most difficult parts of the battle line, where death was certain, as in the impenetrable difficulties of the forest of Argonne. Why should they weep upon my hand and call down the blessings of God upon me? Because they believe that their boys died for something that vastly transcends any of the immediate and palpable objects of the war. They believe, and they rightly believe, that their sons saved the liberty of the world. They believe that wrapped up with the liberty of the world is the continuous protection of that liberty by the concerted powers of all civilized people. They believe that this sacrifice was made in order that other sons should not be called upon for a similar gift—the gift of life, the gift of all that died—and if we did not see this thing through, if we fulfilled the dearest present wish of Germany and now dissociated ourselves from those alongside whom we fought in the war, would not something of the halo go away from the gun over the mantelpiece, or the sword? Would not the old uniform lose something of its significance? These men were crusaders. They were not going forth to prove the might of the United States. They were going forth to prove the might of justice and right, and all the world accepted them as crusaders, and their transcendent achievement has made all the world believe in America as it believes in no other nation organized in the modern world. There seems to me to stand between us and the rejection or qualification of this treaty the serried ranks of those boys in khaki, not only these boys who came home, but those dear ghosts that still deploy upon the fields of France.

"My friends, on last Decoration Day I went to a beautiful hillside near Paris, where was located the cemetery of Suresnes, a cemetery given over to the burial of the American dead. Behind me on the slopes was rank upon rank of living American soldiers, and lying before me upon the levels of the plain was rank upon rank of departed American soldiers. Right by the side of the stand where I spoke there was a little group of French women who had adopted those graves, had made themselves mothers of those dear ghosts by putting flowers every day upon those graves, taking them as their own sons, their own beloved, because they had died in the same cause—France was free and the world was free because America had come! I wish some men in public life who are now opposing the settlement for which these men died could visit such a spot as that. I wish that the thought that comes out of those graves could penetrate their consciousness. I wish that they could feel the moral obligation that rests upon us not to go back on those boys, but to see the thing through, to see it through to the end and make good their redemption of the world. For nothing less depends upon this decision, nothing less than the liberation and salvation of the world.

"You will say, 'Is the league an absolute guaranty against war?' No; I do not know any absolute guaranty against the errors of human judgment or the violence of human passion, but I tell you this: With a cooling space of nine months for human passion, not much of it will keep hot. I had a couple of friends who were in the habit of losing their tempers, and when they lost their tempers they were in the habit of using very unparliamentary language. Some of their friends induced them to make a promise that they never would swear inside the town limits. When the impulse next came upon them, they took a street car to go out of town to swear, and by the time they got out of town they did not want to swear. They came back convinced that they were just what they were, a couple of unspeakable fools, and the habit of getting angry and of swearing suffered great inroads upon it by that experience. Now, illustrating the great by the small, that is true of the passions of nations. It is true of the passions of men however you combine them. Give them space to cool off. I ask you this: If it is not an absolute insurance against war, do you want no insurance at all? Do you want nothing? Do you want not only no probability that war will not recur, but the probability that it will recur? The arrangements of justice do not stand of themselves, my fellow citizens. The arrangements of this treaty are just, but they need the support of the combined power of the great nations of the world. And they will have that support. Now that the mists of this great question have cleared away, I believe that men will see the truth, eye to eye and face to face. There is one thing that the American people always rise to and extend their hand to, and that is the truth of justice and of liberty and of peace. We have accepted that truth and we are going to be led by it, and it is going to lead us, and through us the world, out into pastures of quietness and peace such as the world never dreamed of before."

SCANDINAVIAN-AMERICAN BANK, FARGO, N. DAK.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I present a press report taken from the Washington Post of October 3, 1919, under the date line of October 2, from Fargo, N. Dak., relating to the affairs of the Scandinavian-American Bank of Fargo, interwoven with which is a league of another kind which enthusiastically indorsed a large quantity of collateral. The bank examiners, however, did not receive it as valid for the loan, and they declared it necessary to put the bank into the hands of a receiver. The collateral was indorsed by the Nonpartisan League, not by the league of nations.

[From the Washington Post, Oct. 3, 1919.]

FARGO, N. DAK., BANK HELD INSOLVENT—LOANS TO NONPARTISAN LEAGUE SAID TO BE UNSATISFACTORY.

FARGO, N. DAK., October 2.

The Scandinavian-American Bank of Fargo, with liabilities aggregating more than $1,600,000, was to-day declared insolvent by the banking board of North Dakota. It was ordered closed and placed in the hands of a temporary receiver.

The bank has an authorized capital of $50,000 and surplus of $10,000.

Citing a list of loans, mostly to the Nonpartisan League, aggregating $734,194.82, the report to the banking board by the examiners says:

"The above represents the excess loans carried by the bank and constitute more than 60 per cent of the total loans. Their general character is extremely unsatisfactory. The security in almost every case is entirely inadequate, and, in most instances, constitutes second liens on the property held as collateral. Total lack of judgment and unwarranted optimism is responsible for the extension of credit displayed by the list of 20 excess loans, which appears in each instance to be increasing rather than decreasing. In every case neither the financial standing of the makers nor the collateral held by the bank for the loans justifies the credit extended."

The list in question includes the following loans: Nonpartisan League, $148,824.26; Consumers Stores Co., $170,000; league exchanges, $66,182.28; Publishers National Service Bureau, $47,950.06. The last three are classed as subsidiary corporations of the Nonpartisan League, and the report cites that the collateral is largely post-dated checks and notes given by farmers, which, the report says, are controlled by an agent of the Consumers United Stores Co. and the Nonpartisan League.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I have studiously avoided presenting petitions either for or against this important measure, and I ask unanimous consent at this time, for a minute or two, to make a few remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, during the last two or three months I have received, both for and against the ratification of the covenant for a league of nations, a number of letters and some petitions. As these letters and petitions have been addressed to me personally, asking me to vote either for the covenant or against it, without making any argument or giving any particular reasons why I should support or oppose this measure, I have not deemed it of sufficient importance to the Members of this body to have them printed in the RECORD.

I think it is fair to say that most of the letters that I have received in favor of the proposed pending covenant have come from professors of our educational institutions and from some of the preachers in the State.

I would assume that a minister, whose duty it is to preach the gospel of Christ, would naturally advocate treaties and covenants of peace, and no criticisms or comments would be warranted if such were the case, but the singular fact is that some of these ministers preached war with such vehemence and eagerness that one who abhors war would feel justified in at least commenting in a friendly way whether or not universal brotherhood and peace is desired or a one-sided made-to-order agreement shall be ratified.

About the time that Congress adjourned last March I commented upon the attitude of some of the preachers, and especially mentioned that some of the Lutheran ministers seemed to favor the proposed covenant for a league of nations. What I said at that time was greatly amplified and was considered by some of the Lutheran preachers to be an unjust criticism of their position. At that time I received a number of letters from prominent men who are members of the Lutheran Church, asking for an explanation as to why this criticism was made. I did not consider that I would be warranted in entering into a controversy—which, of course, would be printed in the newspapers—with the ministers of any particular church, and for that reason I purposely declined to answer the letters addressed to me upon this subject.

I might say in passing that I belong to the Lutheran Church, and I felt that it was not only a privilege but my duty to call to the attention of the preachers of that denomination the fact that I believed it was an unwarranted interference and that they should withhold their judgment until they had carefully considered this important measure. I did not say that all the preachers of that denomination favored it, and I explicitly stated that I had received letters from only a few.

I am in receipt of a letter dated Valley City, N. Dak., September 28, 1919, calling my attention to the fact that at a conference held at Valley City on the 24th day of September resolutions were passed asking me to use my influence against the league of nations in its present form and asking me to vote against it in its present form.

I want to state most emphatically that it was surely not my purpose to misrepresent or misquote the men who occupy the responsible position of preaching the true gospel of the Immaculate Master, and it is for that reason that I am making these few remarks. The letter is very brief, and I will read it.

VALLEY CITY, N. DAK., September 29, 1919.

Hon. A. J. GRONNA,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR FRIEND: A conference of 30 ministers, as representatives of the Lutheran Church of this State and of different parts of the State, were in conference at Valley City the 24th and 25th of September. They passed a resolution asking that you use all your influence so that the league of nations will not be passed in its present form, as we believe in America first and Americanism only. The league of nations in its present form is not in harmony with our forefathers, and it only means that we will be entangled with European affairs. It seems to us that some authority in Washington cares more for Great Britain than they do for our country. From what I can learn, as I travel throughout the State and from what these representatives heard and saw, the people in North Dakota are not in favor of the league of nations in its present form; and as we believe in a representative government, the wish of the people should be law.

Hoping that you see your way clear to serve the people, I am,
Yours, with regards,

J. F. L. BOHNHOFF.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a letter which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

LAKE VIEW, OHIO, October 2, 1919.

THOMAS R. MARSHALL, Vice President,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR FRIEND: I will ask you to do me a favor. I had a big, fine baby boy to come at my house last Monday morning, September 29. He weighed 12 pounds 8 ounces. I have no name for him. He is a big, fine-looking baby, and I want some bright man to name him. Will you please put this to the Senate and the House of Congress? The man who will give the baby the biggest prize can have the name. Dr. Barrett attended; E. L. Van Horn, Gusty Wales, and Martha Griffin present when the baby was born. This is no fraud. I said before the baby was born if it should be a boy, I would ask some Member of Congress to name him.

This is our first baby, Mr. Marshall. See what you can do for me in regard to getting the biggest prize for naming the baby. I will close for this time. Please let me know soon.

Yours, respectfully,

ANDERSON T. THOMAS.
NANCY J. THOMAS.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have received some petitions from merchants engaged in the grocery business and in general merchandise along the east coast of Florida, several at the following points: De Land, Sanford, New Smyrna, Titusville, City Point, Cocoa, Indian River City, Oak Hill, Lake Helen, De Leon, Mims, Hobe Sound, Salerno, Stuart, Fort Pierce, Vero, Melbourne, Malabar, Okeechobee, Jupiter, and Deerfield. I ask that one of the petitions be printed in the RECORD, it being brief, and that all be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

There being no objection, the petitions were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and one was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To our Senators:

We, the undersigned merchants of Florida, favor a measure to subject the big meat packers to regulation similar to that provided by the Kenyon bill. We are opposed to the existing monopoly of meat products, cheese, etc., and we believe that this monopoly should be regulated. We understand that the Kenyon bill provides for Government regulation, but not ownership or operation; that it allows the present owners to operate their plants so long as their operations are fair, nondiscriminatory, and competitive; that it provides for the separate operation of stockyards; and that it puts private refrigerator car lines on a common-carrier basis. We desire hereby to withdraw any petitions, letters, or telegrams in opposition to the Kenyon bill to which our names may have been affixed, for the reason that our former action was taken without an understanding of the contents of the bill and at the request of the packers.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I present a resolution adopted by the Federated Trades Council of Milwaukee, Wis., protesting against the dismissal from the public service of 11 members of the Postal Employees' Union for alleged activities within their union. I ask to have it printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MILWAUKEE, WIS., October, 1919.

Whereas it has come to our notice that 11 members of the Postal Employees' Union, Minneapolis, Minn., have been notified of their dismissal from the Postal Service for their activities in the labor movement; and

Whereas this is only another example of the autocratic attitude of Postmaster General Burleson in depriving employees of the Postal Service of their individual rights of citizenship, and if this practice is to go unheeded and unchallenged no Government employee in the future will be safe from persecution nor free to enjoy the liberties guaranteed them by the Constitution of these United States: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Federated Trades Council of Milwaukee, Wis., protests against the dismissal of these 11 employees, which dismissal is additional proof that in the person of Postmaster General Burleson the Government has an official whose very acts belie the fundamental principles of democracy and freedom of thought and speech upon which our Government is founded: And be it further

Resolved, That we herewith demand the reinstatement of these 11 postal employees, and that copies of these resolutions be forwarded to President Wilson and each of the United States Senators and Congressmen from Wisconsin, to the press, and the Postal Employees' Union.

[SEAL.] THE MILWAUKEE FEDERATED TRADES COUNCIL,
By FRANK J. WEBER, Corresponding Secretary.

Mr. SIMMONS presented a telegram in the nature of a petition from sundry citizens of Gastonia, N. C., praying for the adoption of the so-called league of nations treaty, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CURTIS presented memorials of sundry citizens of Northbranch, Moundridge, Buhler, and Inman, all in the State of Kansas, remonstrating against universal military training, which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a memorial of the International Farm Congress, of Kansas City, Mo., remonstrating against the present policy adopted by strikers and labor leaders and requesting of the farmers more production and demanding of its members less production, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Wea Township, Miami County, Kans., remonstrating against the adoption of the proposed league of nations treaty, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Herkimer County Pomona Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, of Herkimer, N. Y., praying for the passage of the so-called Capper-Hersman bill granting collective-bargaining privileges to farmers and producers, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a memorial of Local Lodge No. 751, Brotherhood of Railway Carmen of America, of Topeka, Kans., and a memorial of Local Lodge No. 231, Brotherhood of Railway Carmen, of Wichita, Kans., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Cummins bill providing for private ownership and control of railroads, which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Wichita, Kans., praying for an increase in the salaries of postal employees, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. COLT presented a petition of the Board of Aldermen of Providence, R. I., praying that Italy be allowed to settle the Fiume question without interference, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. BRANDEGEE presented a petition of the Lithuanian Dramatic Society, of Waterbury, Conn., praying for the recognition by the United States of the independence of Lithuania, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I desire to announce that on Wednesday next, at the close of the morning business, if the convenience of the Senate will permit, I shall discuss the league of nations.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I gave notice the other day that immediately after the close of the morning business to-day I would ask the Senate for the privilege of discussing the Johnson amendments to the treaty, but I have been informed this morning that there are a number of Senators who wish to call up from now until 2 o'clock bills on the calendar. I therefore will wait until the expiration of the morning hour before proceeding with the discussion of those amendments.

STOLEN MOTOR VEHICLES.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Calendar No. 171.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, before we get to that, have we had reports of committees? That is the next order, I believe. We have not reached the calendar yet.

The VICE PRESIDENT. We are on petitions yet.

Mr. CUMMINS. I withdraw my request, but will renew it. I will say it is a bill to provide for the punishment of persons stealing automobiles and other motor vehicles. I think everyone in the Chamber will agree that something ought to be done in this respect. It is a House bill and we ought to pass it.

Mr. FLETCHER. I shall not object to the consideration of the bill when it is in order to call it up.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. FLETCHER, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 575) to establish load lines for certain vessels, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 246) thereon.

Mr. SMOOT, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 46) for the protection of the water supply of the town of Sunnyside, Utah (Rept. No. 247);

A bill (S. 2189) to provide for agricultural entries on coal lands in Alaska (Rept. No. 248); and

A bill (S. 2789) for the consolidation of forest lands in the Sierra National Forest, Calif., and for other purposes (Rept. No. 249).

Mr. WADSWORTH, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to which was referred the bill (S. 2444) to create the Commission on Rural and Urban Home Settlement, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 250) thereon.

Mr. McCUMBER, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the bill (S. 2300) for the relief of the estate of Henry A. V. Post, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 245) thereon.

FRANCES SCOVILLE-MUMM.

Mr. STERLING. From the Committee on Immigration I report back favorably, without amendment, the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 90) to readmit Frances Scoville-Mumm to the character and privileges of a citizen of the United States, and I submit a report (No. 243) thereon. I call the attention of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] to the joint resolution.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read as follows:

Whereas Frances Scoville-Mumm, daughter of C. C. K. Scoville, a citizen of the United States residing in the State of Kansas, being a native-born citizen of the United States, married in 1913 Walter Mumm, a subject of the then Emperor of Germany, and emigrated to Germany, becoming thereby, under the laws of Germany, a naturalized German subject, to be recognized as such by the United States, according to the provisions of the then existing treaties relating to naturalization between the United States and Germany; and

Whereas the said Frances Scoville-Mumm has since returned to the United States and renewed her residence therein and petitioned Congress to be readmitted to the character and privileges of a citizen of the United States under and by virtue of the power and laws of the United States of America: Therefore Resolved, etc., That Frances Scoville-Mumm, daughter of the said C. C. K. Scoville, be, and she is hereby, on her own application, unconditionally readmitted to the character and privileges of a citizen of the United States.

Mr. KIRBY. I should like to know why a joint resolution has been introduced for this purpose?

Mr. CURTIS. The beneficiary married a man who had lived in France for about 20 years, but he had never taken out citizenship papers in France, and when the war broke out he was ordered back to Germany, and the French Government took possession of his property and also the property of his wife, who had never lived in Germany. This resolution should pass in order to protect her property rights.

Mrs. Mumm refused to live in Germany, and has since brought a suit for divorce against her husband in Germany, but because of the condition of the courts there she is unable to get any action. The husband and wife have entered into an agreement under which she is free to take any action she may please, go to any country she may please, and take up her residence in any country she may desire; and they entered into an agreement in regard to the property.

Mr. KIRBY. How long has she lived here?

Mr. CURTIS. She was born in the State of Kansas, lived there all her life until she married this man, and following her application for a divorce returned to her home.

Mr. KIRBY. Did the Senator say that she lived for 20 years in France?

Mr. CURTIS. No; she was in France and Switzerland for only about six years. I hope the resolution may pass in order that Mrs. Mumm's property rights may be protected.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was reported from the Committee on Immigration with an amendment to strike out "a subject of the then Emperor of Germany, and emigrated to Germany, becoming thereby, under the laws of Germany, a naturalized German subject, to be recognized as such by the United States, according to the provisions of the then existing treaties relating to naturalization between the United States and Germany," so as to make the preamble read:

Whereas Frances Scoville-Mumm, daughter of C. C. K. Scoville, a citizen of the United States residing in the State of Kansas, being a native-born citizen of the United States, married in 1913 Walter Mumm, an alien of German birth and parentage but at the time of, and for many years prior to, said marriage a resident of France; and

Whereas the said Frances Scoville-Mumm has since returned to the United States and renewed her residence therein and petitioned Congress to be readmitted to the character and privileges of a citizen of the United States under and by virtue of the power and laws of the United States of America.

The amendment to the preamble was agreed to.

The preamble as amended was agreed to.

RESTORATION OF EXCESS DUTIES.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the bill (S. 495) for the relief of Walston H. Brown, sole surviving partner of the firm of Brown, Howard & Co., and of the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co., to report it back favorably without amendment, and I submit a report (No. 244) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill. I would not do that, Mr. President, if I thought it would meet with objection or provoke any debate. If I may be permitted, I will make a brief statement as to the nature and character of the bill pending my request for unanimous consent. I will say that this bill is for the payment of a claim amounting to $92,192.83, as found by the Court of Claims. It is to reimburse the claimants for duties exacted from them by the Treasury Department many years ago in excess of the amount of duty which legally they should have been required to pay. The bill has been reported favorably and has passed the Senate four times. It has also been reported favorably from the Committee on Claims of the House. It has been referred to the Treasury Department, and I have incorporated in the report the approval of the Treasury Department for the payment of the claim. It was also sent to the Court of Claims to report the facts, which it did fully. Upon the question of laches on the part of the claimants, the Court of Claims found that they had paid the money into the Treasury under duress and fully acquitted them of any laches.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Walston H. Brown, sole surviving partner of the firm of Brown, Howard & Co., the sum of $65,792.53, and to the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co. the sum of $26,400.30, these being the amounts severally found due the said Walston H. Brown & Co. and the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co. by the Court of Claims, and transmitted to Congress on the 7th day of February, 1914.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ESTATE OF HENRY A. V. POST.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 2300, which was just reported by me from the Committee on Finance. It is one of three bills of similar nature to that which the Senate has just passed. A similar bill has passed the Senate the same number of times as the bill reported by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] that has just been passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the estate of the late Henry A. V. Post the sum of $50,359.35 for a refund of import duties paid by Henry A. V. Post, Archer N. Martin, Clarence H. Clark, and others, who composed the late firm of Clark, Post & Martin, in excess of the duties imposed by law on steel blooms imported by them, in accordance with Senate Document No. 406, Sixty-third Congress, second session.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS INTRODUCED.

Bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. MYERS:

A bill (S. 3163) to validate certain declarations of intention to become citizens of the United States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. KENDRICK:

A bill (S. 3164) authorizing the Northern Arapahoe Tribe and the Northern Cheyenne Tribe of Indians to submit claims to the Court of Claims; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. KELLOGG:

A bill (S. 3165) for the relief of the widow of Bernard Cavanaugh; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. PHELAN:

A bill (S. 3166) for the relief of E. J. Hendrycks; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. CURTIS:

A bill (S. 3167) granting a pension to Caldona Vaughn (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 3168) granting a pension to Alice P. Knapp (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 3169) granting a pension to Anderson Hogue (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. MYERS:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 113) to appropriate money to the Fort Peck Indians, in the State of Montana, on behalf of delinquent homesteaders, and providing for reimbursement by such homesteaders; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. CURTIS:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 114) defining what shall constitute a crop failure under the rules and regulations issued by the departments of the Government in making loans of seed wheat to farmers for crop purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

FOREIGN TRADE ZONES.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I introduce a bill by request. I will simply say that there is a bill known as the free-zone bill which has been prepared and introduced by those interested in the proposition. The bill has been changed to a considerable extent, and it has been introduced in the House. Hearings are desired in the Senate, and they are very hopeful that the bill as introduced in the House would also be presented in the Senate, and I am glad to introduce it so that it may be before the committee when the hearings are held.

The bill (S. 3170) to provide for the establishment, operation, and maintenance of foreign-trade zones in ports of entry of the United States, to expedite and encourage foreign commerce, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

ANGLO-PERSIAN TREATY.

Mr. McCORMICK. I offer the following resolution, and ask that it may be read and lie on the table.

The resolution (S. Res. 205) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be requested to inform the Senate, if not incompatible with the public interest, what representations, if any, have been made to the British Government relative to the Anglo-Persian treaty and what reply, if any, the British Government has made thereto.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over under the rule and be printed.

EMPLOYMENT OF ASSISTANT CLERK.

Mr. PENROSE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 207), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be, and is hereby, authorized to employ an assistant clerk at the rate of $1,800 per annum, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate until otherwise provided by law.

EMMA GOLDMAN.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I offer a Senate resolution, and ask that it be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 206), as follows:

Whereas the following Associated Press dispatch appeared in the Washington Post of the issue of October 4, 1919, to wit:

"GOLDMAN CASE POSTPONED.

"NEW YORK, October 3.

"Emma Goldman, anarchist writer and lecturer, recently released from Missouri penitentiary, who was to have appeared to-day before United States immigration officials on Ellis Island to answer to the charge of being 'an undesirable citizen,' has had her case indefinitely postponed upon orders from Washington, it was stated here to-day at the offices of the commissioner of immigration."

Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of Labor be, and he is, requested, if not incompatible with the public good, to inform the Senate: (1) If it be true that, as reported, a case against Emma Goldman, as an undesirable citizen, has been indefinitely postponed upon orders from Washington; and if so, (2) for what purpose and cause and (3) by whose orders.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution. I have no remarks to make. I think it should be adopted without debate.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

ROBERT MINOR.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in connection with the resolution which has just been adopted, I desire to inquire whether the War Department has answered a resolution which was adopted here many weeks ago inquiring as to the reasons why the charges against Robert Minor were withdrawn, why he was not prosecuted, or what steps were taken by the authorities of the War Department in Europe which led to the abandonment of the prosecution and the release of Robert Minor.

I am prompted to make the inquiry because, as I am advised, the War Department has treated with silence the resolution, and I see that Mr. Minor is now in the United States, appearing in various parts of the Union, carrying on a radical propaganda, of course in favor of Bolshevism and the radical elements of this and other lands. May I make bold to inquire whether any reply has been submitted by the War Department?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair always speaks with great hesitancy about such inquiries. When the replies come they are immediately handed down. The Chair has no recollection of any reply ever having come, or having been handed down.

Mr. KING. I would be very glad to call the attention of the War Department to their dereliction of duty. If a reply is not submitted within the next day or two, I shall present another resolution and ask that the Secretary of War be directed to immediately comply with the request involved in the first resolution.

CONTROL OF FOOD PRODUCTS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8624) to amend an act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel, approved August 10, 1917, and requesting a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. GRONNA. I move that the Senate further insist upon its amendments, agree to the further conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to, and the Vice President appointed Mr. GRONNA, Mr. NORRIS, and Mr. SMITH of Georgia conferees at the further conference on the part of the Senate.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Claims:

H. R. 685. An act for the relief of Frank S. Ingalls;

H. R. 974. An act for the relief of W. T. Dingler;

H. R. 1761. An act for the relief of the Farmers' National Bank of Wilkinson, Ind.;

H. R. 1812. An act making an appropriation to compensate James M. Moore for damages sustained while in the service of the Government of the United States;

H. R. 1853. An act to reimburse E. T. Thing and S. A. Thing for losses and damages sustained by them by the negligent dipping of their cattle by the Bureau of Animal Industry, Department of Agriculture;

H. R. 5348. An act for the relief of Mrs. Thomas McGovern;

H. R. 5665. An act for the relief of Carlow Avellina; and

H. R. 6413. An act granting the sum of $549.12 to Clara Kane, dependent parent, by reason of the death of William A. Yenser, late civil employee, killed as a result of an accident at the Philadelphia Navy Yard.

The following bills were each read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs:

H. R. 396. An act to authorize the payment of certain amounts for damages sustained by prairie fire on the Rosebud Indian Reservation, in South Dakota; and

H. R. 400. An act authorizing the Sioux Tribe of Indians to submit claims to the Court of Claims.

NATIONAL PROHIBITION—CONFERENCE REPORT (S. DOC. NO. 118).

Mr. STERLING. I submit the report of the committee of conference on House bill 6810, being the national prohibition bill, which I ask to have printed as a document, printed in the RECORD, and lie on the table to be called up later for consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6810) to prohibit intoxicating beverages and to regulate the manufacture, production, use, and sale of high-proof spirits for other than beverage purposes, and to insure an ample supply of alcohol and promote its use in scientific research and in the development of fuel, dye, and other lawful industries, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 20, 25, 46, 47, 61, 66, 72, 90, 118, 123, 127, 133, 134, 164, 178, 184, 219, 232, and 233.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 21, 23, 24, 26, 27, 29, 30, 32, 33, 34, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 48, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 64, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 73, 75, 76, 78, 79, 82, 83, 84, 86, 87, 88, 89, 92, 93, 94, 96, 97, 98, 100, 101, 103, 104, 105, 106, 107, 108, 109, 110, 112, 113, 114, 115, 116, 117, 119, 120, 121, 122, 124, 125, 126, 128, 131, 132, 135, 136, 138, 139, 140, 141, 143, 144, 145, 146, 147, 148, 149, 150, 151, 152, 153, 154, 155, 156, 158, 159, 160, 161, 162, 167, 168, 169, 170, 171, 172, 173, 174, 175, 176, 177, 179, 180, 181, 182, 183, 186, 187, 188, 189, 190, 191, 192, 193, 194, 196, 197, 198, 199, 200, 201, 202, 203, 204, 205, 207, 208, 209, 210, 211, 213, 214, 215, 216, 217, 220, 221, 222, 223, 224, 227, 228, 229, 230, 235, 236, 237, 238, 239, 240, 241, 242, 243, 244, 245, 246, 247, 248, 249, 250, 251, 252, 253, 254, 255, 256, 258, 259, 260, 261, 262, 263, 264, 265, 266, 267, 268, 269, 270, 271, 272, 273, 274, 275, 276, 277, 278, 279, 280, 282, 283, 284, and 285, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following:

" : Provided, That the foregoing definition shall not extend to dealcoholized wine nor to any beverage or liquid produced by the process by which beer, ale, porter or wine is produced, if it contains less than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume, and is made as prescribed in section 37 of Title II of this act, and is otherwise denominated than as beer, ale, or porter, and is contained and sold in, or from, such sealed and labeled bottles, casks, or containers as the commissioner may by regulation prescribe."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 22, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following:

" : Provided, That the foregoing definition shall not extend to dealcoholized wine nor to any beverage or liquid produced by the process by which beer, ale, porter or wine is produced, if it contains less than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume, and is made as prescribed in section 37 of this title, and is otherwise denominated than as beer, ale, or porter, and is contained and sold in, or from, such sealed and labeled bottles, casks, or containers as the commissioner may by regulation prescribe."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 28, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be stricken out by the Senate amendment insert the following: ", and the commissioner is authorized to make such regulations"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 31, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following: "Officers mentioned in said section 1014 are authorized to issue search warrants under the limitations provided in Title XI of the act approved June 15, 1917 (40 Stat. L., p. 217, et seq.)"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 35, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following: "to the end that the use of intoxicating liquor as a beverage may be prevented.

"Liquor for nonbeverage purposes and wine for sacramental purposes may be manufactured, purchased, sold, bartered, transported, imported, exported, delivered, furnished, and possessed, but only as herein provided, and the commissioner may, upon application, issue permits therefor: Provided, That nothing in this act shall prohibit the purchase and sale of warehouse receipts covering distilled spirits on deposit in Government bonded warehouses, and no special tax liability shall attach to the business of purchasing and selling such warehouse receipts."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 43, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate insert the following: " use as a beverage, or for intoxicating beverage purposes"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 44, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following: "and preserved sweet cider"; and on page 11, line 15, of the engrossed bill strike out the words "other article"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 45, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following: "the articles named in paragrapns b, c, and d of this section which may be"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 49, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following: "29"; and on page 12, line 7, of the engrossed bill strike out the words "the person"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 50, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following: "any known principal for"; and, on page 12, line 8, of the engrossed bill strike out the words "if any"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 58, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following: "and except that any person who in the opinion of the commissioner is conducting a bona fide hospital or sanatorium engaged in the treatment of persons suffering from alcoholism, may, under such rules, regulations, and conditions as the commissioner shall prescribe, purchase and use, in accordance with the methods in use in such institution, liquor, to be administered to the patients of such institution under the direction of a duly qualified physician employed by such institution"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 59, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following: "transport liquor, may be issued for one year, and"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 60, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following: "Provided, That the commissioner may without formal application or new bond extend any permit granted under this act or laws now in force after August 31 in any year to December 31 of the succeeding year: Provided further, That permits to purchase liquor for the purpose of manufacturing or selling as provided in this act shall not be in force to exceed 90 days from the day of issuance. A permit to purchase liquor for any other purpose shall not be in force to exceed 30 days. Permits"; and on page 13, line 22, of the engrossed bill strike out the words "Every permit"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 62, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In addition to the words proposed to be stricken out by the Senate amendment, strike out, on page 13, line 25, of the engrossed bill the words "and shall not be in force more than"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 65, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following: ", unless the sale is to be made through a pharmacist designated in the permit and"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 74, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"Nothing in this title shall be held to apply to the manufacture, sale, transportation, importation, possession, or distribution of wine for sacramental purposes, or like religious rites, except section 6 (save as the same requires a permit to purchase) and section 10 hereof, and the provisions of this act prescribing penalties for the violation of either of said sections. No person to whom a permit may be issued to manufacture, transport, import, or sell wines for sacramental purposes or like religious rites shall sell, barter, exchange, or furnish any such to any person not a rabbi, minister of the gospel, priest, or an officer duly authorized for the purpose by any church or congregation, nor to any such except upon an application duly subscribed by him, which application, authenticated as regulations may prescribe, shall be filed and preserved by the seller. The head of any conference or diocese or other ecclesiastical jurisdiction may designate any rabbi, minister, or priest to supervise the manufacture of wine to be used for the purposes and rites in this section mentioned, and the person so designated may, in the discretion of the commissioner, be granted a permit to supervise such manufacture."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 77, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following: "liquor. And no"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 80, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate insert the following: "unless after careful physical examination of the person for whose use such prescription is sought, or if such examination is found impracticable, then upon the best information obtainable, he"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 81, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In addition to the matter proposed to be stricken out by the Senate amendment strike out, on page 15, lines 11 and 12 of the engrossed bill, the words "its use as a medicine by the one for whom he prescribes" and insert "the use of such liquor as a medicine by such person"; also on page 15, line 13, after the word "some," of the engrossed bill, insert the word "known"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 85 and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate insert the following: "the purpose or ailment for which it is to be used and"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 91, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate insert the following: "holding permits to prescribe"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 95, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate insert the following: "prescription blanks have been"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 99, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following: "except in cases of emergency, in which event a record and report shall be made and kept as in other cases"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 102, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following: "the judicial district and within"; and on page 17, line 16 of the engrossed bill, after the word "occurred," insert ", unless the parties agree on another place"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 111, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate insert the following: ", which shall at all times be open to inspection as in this act provided"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 129, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following: "of the"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 130, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following: "to purchase or ship the same, together with the name and address of the person using the permit"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 137, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be stricken out by the Senate amendment insert the following: "No one shall permit any sign or billboard containing such advertisement to remain upon one's premises"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 142, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following: "No"; and on page 22, line 12, after the word "receive" of the engrossed bill, insert the following: ", nor knowingly permit his employee to solicit or receive"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 157, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"SEC. 23. That any person who shall, with intent to effect a sale of liquor, by himself, his employee, servant, or agent, for himself or any person, company or corporation, keep or carry around on his person, or in a vehicle, or other conveyance whatever, or leave in a place for another to secure, any liquor, or who shall travel to solicit, or solicit, or take, or accept orders for the sale, shipment, or delivery of liquor in violation of this title is guilty of a nuisance and may be restrained by injunction, temporary and permanent, from doing or continuing to do any of said acts or things.

"In such proceedings it shall not be necessary to show any intention on the part of the accused to continue such violation if the action is brought within 60 days following any such violation of the law."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 163, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be stricken out by the Senate amendment insert the following: "the containers thereof"; and, on page 27, line 17, of the engrossed bill, strike out the words "other property" and insert "such property so"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 165, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following: "unless the court shall otherwise order"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 166, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"The term 'private dwelling' shall be construed to include the room or rooms used and occupied not transiently but solely as a residence in an apartment house, hotel, or boarding house. The property seized on any such warrant shall not be taken from the officer seizing the same on any writ of replevin or other like process."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 185, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following: "brought for violation of law," and on page 30, line 13, after the word "of" in the engrossed bill, insert ", if not claimed within 60 days from the date this section takes effect"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 195, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"The penalties provided in this act against the manufacture of liquor without a permit shall not apply to a person for manufacturing nonintoxicating cider and fruit juices exclusively for use in his home, but such cider and fruit juices shall not be sold or delivered except to persons having permits to manufacture vinegar."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 206, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following: "reported, provided"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 212, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following: "the commissioner or any of his agents or by any public prosecutor or by any person designated by him, or by any peace officer in the State where the record is kept, and copies of such records and reports duly certified by the person with whom kept or filed may be introduced in evidence with like effect as the originals thereof, and verified copies of such records shall be furnished to the commissioner when called for"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 218, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be stricken out by the Senate amendment insert the following: "shall be assessed against, and collected from, the person responsible for such illegal manufacture or sale"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 225, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following:

": Provided, That such liquid may be removed and transported, under bond and under such regulations as the commissioner may prescribe, from one bonded plant or warehouse to another for the purpose of having the alcohol extracted therefrom. And such liquids may be developed, under permit, by persons other than the manufacturers of beverages containing less than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume, and sold to such manufacturers for conversion into such beverages."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 226, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"Credit shall be allowed on the tax due on any alcohol so saved to the amount of any tax paid upon distilled spirits or brandy used in the fortification of the liquor from which the same is saved.

"When fortified wines are made and used for the production of nonbeverage alcohol, and dealcoholized wines containing less than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume, no tax shall be assessed or paid on the spirits used in such fortification, and such dealcoholized wines produced under the provisions of this act, whether carbonated or not, shall not be subject to the tax on artificially carbonated or sparkling wines, but shall be subject to the tax on still wines only.

"In any case where the manufacturer is charged with manufacturing or selling for beverage purposes any malt, vinous, or fermented liquids containing one-half of 1 per cent or more of alcohol by volume, or in any case where the manufacturer, having been permitted by the commissioner to develop a liquid such as ale, beer, porter, or wine containing more than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume in the manner and for the purpose herein provided, is charged with failure to reduce the alcoholic content of any such liquid below such one-half of 1 per cent before withdrawing the same from the factory, then in either such case the burden of proof shall be on such manufacturer to show that such liquid so manufactured, sold, or withdrawn contains less than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume. In any suit or proceeding involving the alcoholic content of any beverage, the reasonable expense of analysis of such beverage shall be taxed as costs in the case."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 231, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following: ", except such executive officers as may be appointed by the commissioner or the Attorney General to have immediate direction of the enforcement of the provisions of this act, and persons authorized to issue permits, and agents and inspectors in the field service,"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 234, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following: "required"; and on page 37, line 5, after the word "act," in the engrossed bill, insert "including personal services in the District of Columbia, and for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,000,000 for the use of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and $100,000 for the use of the Department of Justice for the enforcement of the provisions of this act, including personal services in the District of Columbia and necessary printing and binding"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 257, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following: "the use of any scientific university or college of learning, any laboratory for use exclusively in scientific research, or for use in any hospital or sanatorium"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 281, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"SEC. 20. That it shall be unlawful to import or introduce into the Canal Zone, or to manufacture, sell, give away, dispose of, transport, or have in one's possession or under one's control within the Canal Zone, any alcoholic, fermented, brewed, distilled, vinous, malt, or spirituous liquors, except for sacramental, scientific, pharmaceutical, industrial, or medicinal purposes, under regulations to be made by the President, and any such liquors within the Canal Zone in violation hereof shall be forfeited to the United States and seized: Provided, That this section shall not apply to liquor in transit through the Panama Canal or on the Panama Railroad.

"That each and every violation of any of the provisions of this section shall be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000 or imprisonment not exceeding six months for a first offense, and by a fine not less than $200 nor more than $2,000 and imprisonment not less than one month nor more than five years for a second or subsequent offense.

"That all offenses heretofore committed within the Canal Zone may be prosecuted and all penalties therefor enforced in the same manner and to the same extent as if this act had not been passed."

And the Senate agree to the same.

PREVENTION OF INFLUENZA.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 76) for the investigation of influenza and allied diseases, in order to determine their cause and methods of prevention. It is a joint resolution which must be passed immediately if benefits are to be derived from it. It proposes to appropriate $1,000,000 for use of the Public Health Service in investigating the cause and methods for the prevention of the spread of influenza. I believe it to be imperative that the joint resolution should be passed at once.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the joint resolution be read.

Mr. KING. Reserving the right to object, I should like to have the joint resolution read.

The Secretary read the joint resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. I object to the present consideration of the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over. Morning business is closed.

STOLEN MOTOR VEHICLES.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 9203) to punish the transportation of stolen motor vehicles in interstate or foreign commerce.

Mr. SMOOT. Let the bill be read.

Mr. CUMMINS. I want Senators to know what the bill is. The favorite place for such thefts is near a State line, where vehicles are carried quickly across the State line, and there is very great difficulty in securing the punishment of the offender. The bill is for the purpose of giving the Federal courts jurisdiction for the punishment of such an offender.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I inquire of the Senator on what ground he bases the right of Federal authorities to prosecute for theft?

Mr. CUMMINS. It is found in section 3 of the bill, as follows:

That whoever shall transport or cause to be transported in interstate or foreign commerce a motor vehicle, knowing the same to have been stolen, shall be punished by a fine.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah has requested that the bill be read. The Secretary will read.

The Secretary read the bill; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. The bill had been reported from the Committee on Interstate Commerce with an amendment, on page 2, line 18, after the word "offender," to strike out the remainder of the bill in the following words: "A judgment of conviction or acquittal upon the merits under the laws of any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, of any defendant charged with stealing any motor vehicle shall, as against any such defendant, be a bar to a prosecution hereunder for transporting such motor vehicle in interstate commerce," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That this act may be cited as the national motor vehicle theft act.

SEC. 2. That when used in this act:

(a) The term "motor vehicle" shall include an automobile, automobile truck, automobile wagon, motor cycle, or any other self-propelled vehicle not designed for running on rails;

(b) The term "interstate or foreign commerce" as used in this act shall include transportation from one State, Territory, or the District of Columbia to another State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, or to a foreign country, or from a foreign country to any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia.

SEC. 3. That whoever shall transport or cause to be transported in interstate or foreign commerce a motor vehicle, knowing the same to have been stolen, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000, or by imprisonment of not more than five years, or both.

SEC. 4. That whoever shall, with the intent to deprive the owner of the possession thereof, receive, conceal, store, barter, sell, or dispose of any motor vehicle, moving as, or which is a part of, or which constitutes interstate or foreign commerce, knowing the same to have been stolen, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000, or by imprisonment of not more than five years, or both.

SEC. 5. That any person violating this act may be punished in any district in or through which such motor vehicle has been transported or removed by such offender.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I am heartily in accord with the object to be accomplished by the passage of such a statute. I notice in section 4, on page 2, the bill provides—

That whoever shall, with the intent to deprive the owner of the possession thereof, receive, conceal, store, barter, sell, or dispose of any motor vehicle, moving as, or which is a part of, or which constitutes interstate or foreign commerce, knowing the same to have been stolen, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000, or by imprisonment of not more than five years, or both.

The previous section, 3, penalizing the transportation of such a vehicle by anybody knowing the same to have been stolen, does not contain the clause providing that the same must have been done "with the intent to deprive the owner of the possession thereof." I have no familiarity with the bill or with the testimony that was given in connection with the hearings, but I wondered, if you prove that a person knows the vehicle to have been stolen, why the Government also has to prove that it was stored or received with the intent to deprive the owner of the possession of it. I think that language might possibly be eliminated and strengthen the statute a little without conferring any hardship upon the thief or the receiver of the stolen goods.

Mr. CUMMINS. This is a House bill, and the Senate committee accepted in the main the work of the House. I see no substantial objection, however, to the point made by the Senator from Connecticut. The practice is to steal an automobile close to a State line and run it across the State line. The first section is intended to punish anyone who does that thing, knowing the vehicle to have been stolen. The further practice is, if possible, to dispose of the vehicle to some other party, confederate or otherwise, when it gets across the State line, and section 4 is for the purpose of punishing a man who barters or sells or disposes of the property with intent to deprive the owner of the possession thereof, or if he conceals it knowing it to have been stolen. I think that would probably embrace every case that could be reached.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not know that I would propose an amendment, if an amendment has not already been recommended by the committee which necessitates further action by the House. My first impression would be that a man who receives and stores or helps to transport goods he knows to have been stolen ought not to be able to require the Government to prove that he rendered this assistance with intent to deprive the owner of the possession thereof, because, I think, it would be very difficult to prove that a garage keeper, when he knew an automobile had been stolen and he was requested to receive it overnight and equip it and repair it and furnish it with gasoline to continue its flight, did it with intent to deprive the owner of the possession. He might well say that although he knew the automobile was stolen, he sheltered it to prevent it from being damaged, and if there was any chance for its recovery, it was certainly a benefit to the owner to have it restored to him in good condition rather than in the condition which would have resulted if he had not afforded it shelter. In other words, I think the insertion of the language to which I have called attention in section 4 throws a burden upon the Government which it is not necessary, in the interest of justice, to cast upon it, and provides a loophole for the accessory to the theft to escape penalty; and I wonder if the Senator would not agree to a suggestion to strike out those words for the purpose of letting the matter go to conference.

Mr. CUMMINS. We can at least let it go to conference.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That was all I was going to suggest. In section 4, page 2, line 9, I suggest that there be stricken out the words "with the intent to deprive the owner of the possession thereof." I do that simply for the purpose of giving the conferees an opportunity to consider the advisability of striking that language out.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the language would have to be changed a little further, for we could not very well make a criminal of a person who received the stolen vehicle, even though he knew it to be stolen, if he were holding it in order to enable the owner to recover it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No; but the language is——

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator from Iowa will allow me, I desire to say that if he will examine the authorities he will find that one of the elements of the offense of stealing is the deprivation of the owner of the thing stolen without his consent, and the words referred to by the Senator from Connecticut do no harm, though they are really surplusage. Their meaning is implied in the word "theft" or in the stealing. If the Senator will look at the textbooks he will find that a part of the element of the offense is depriving the owner thereof without his consent.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the Senator from Minnesota is entirely right about that, although the section covers persons other than those who commit the theft. That is the reason, I presume, the language referred to by the Senator from Connecticut is found in the bill.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If there is a reason for the language being used there at all, I suggest for the consideration of the Senator from Iowa whether the section ought not to be so modified as not simply to provide as to depriving the owner of the possession but depriving the party who is entitled to the possession of the vehicle of such possession, for many of these vehicles are leased by the month.

Mr. CUMMINS. That probably is a case that may arise; and I am willing to accept an amendment along the line of that proposed by the Senator from Connecticut in order to bring the matter into conference.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I would not offer an amendment if the matter could be brought into conference without an amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. But it could not be.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No. Therefore, in section 4, page 2, line 9, I move to strike out the words "with the intent to deprive the owner of the possession thereof," simply for the purpose of bringing the subject before the conference committee.

Mr. CUMMINS. With that idea in mind, I shall not oppose the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 4, page 2, line 9, after the word "shall," it is proposed to strike out the words "with the intent to deprive the owner of the possession thereof."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the committee amendment to section 5 is agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. KING. I desire to inquire of the Senator from Iowa whether there was any amendment made to section 5 of the bill?

Mr. CUMMINS. Such an amendment to that section as the Senator has in mind, I think, was not thought necessary; and I do not think it would be wise if it were necessary.

Mr. KING. I desire to make an inquiry of the Senator. I have but hastily read the bill and was not present in committee when it was considered.

Mr. CUMMINS. This bill was considered by the Committee on Interstate Commerce. It was not considered by the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. KING. The language of the bill would indicate that the prosecution might be instituted in a State or district other than that in which the defendant, who is charged with the reception and concealment of the automobile, resided.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not catch the Senator's point.

Mr. KING. As I have hastily read the bill, section 5 would seem to indicate that if an automobile, for instance, were stolen in Maryland and were concealed by some person in New York, knowing it to have been stolen, if it passed through the State of Pennsylvania or Delaware en route to New York, the prosecution of the defendant who concealed the automobile in the State of New York might be instituted in Pennsylvania or in Delaware.

Mr. CUMMINS. It would only be a question of priority of jurisdiction. If a person steals an automobile or is alleged to have stolen an automobile and is prosecuted for that offense and is acquitted upon the merits, of course, he could not be convicted of transporting the stolen vehicle into any other jurisdiction. I think the Senator from Utah will agree with me upon that.

Mr. KING. I agree with the Senator as to that; but I do not think he comprehends the point I am trying to make. The question is, where would the action be brought against an offender where the vehicle had been taken from one State through a number of States and had finally reached the State in which the offender concealed it? Where would he be prosecuted?

Mr. CUMMINS. That question is answered by the first part of section 5, which reads:

That any person violating this act may be punished in any district in or through which such motor vehicle has been transported or removed by such offender.

Mr. KING. That is the thing of which I am complaining. If I read that language aright, it would seem to indicate that some person who concealed an automobile in the State in which he resided might be punished in any one of the half dozen States through which the vehicle was conveyed after it had been stolen. If that is true, it seems to me it is very dangerous legislation. I think the venue in which the prosecution may be had ought to be where the defendant resides.

Mr. CUMMINS. Of course, that would destroy the bill entirely. I can not conceive how anyone could be unduly punished or punished in a jurisdiction in which he ought not to be punished under the provision—

That any person violating this act may be punished in any district in or through which such motor vehicle has been transported or removed by such offender.

The person who takes an automobile or vehicle in his garage contrary to the provisions of section 4 and does not assist in the transportation of the vehicle into some other jurisdiction can not be punished save in his own jurisdiction, because the vehicle must be transported or removed by the offender in order to bring him within section 5.

Mr. KING. If that is the interpretation, I think that the section is all right.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think that is the interpretation that should be placed upon it.

Mr. KING. But I had in mind a person who merely received an automobile which had been conveyed through a half dozen States and concealed it in the State in which he resided and in the State where it was delivered to him, in which event it is obvious to me that he ought not to be prosecuted in some other State through which the automobile was carried.

Mr. CUMMINS. That would be objectionable, but I do not think that could happen under this provision because of the words I have just read, namely, "in or through which such motor vehicle has been transported or removed." If we stop there, the objection of the Senator from Utah would be sound, but it says further, "by such offender." Therefore, it can not reach the case suggested by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. If Senators on the committee are clear that this would not permit the prosecution of a person who merely received, knowing it to be stolen, a stolen automobile, in some State through which it had passed rather than in the State where he resided, I would have no objection to the provision.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think that is the understanding of the committee.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Would it not be possible to prevent the theft of automobiles by a method of Federal taxation? Suppose the Federal Government levies a tax upon the sale of every automobile and requires every sale, even of a second-hand vehicle, to be registered, say, with the postmaster of the community or with the internal-revenue officer, so that anyone in possession of an automobile must also be in possession of the certificate of purchase upon which a tax of a small amount has been paid, would not that, while it would raise perhaps a moderate amount of money, make it impossible for any person to operate an automobile without being in possession of the certificate of purchase?

Mr. CUMMINS. I can see that that might be a means of detection and possibly a great protection to the owners of automobiles; but, unfortunately, the House has not proposed a measure of that kind, and the Senate can not propose a measure of that kind.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I realize that what the Senator says is true; but it seems to me a large number of automobile thefts are chiefly for the purpose of sale; most of the men who steal automobiles sell them; it is a regular business. If every sale must be under a certificate and must be registered, without any regard to interstate commerce or passing from one State to another, it seems to me it might be possible to put a stop to that illegitimate business.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is a thought well worthy of consideration; but I am just advised by two members of the Finance Committee, who sit near me, that that has been found impracticable; that it has been considered and been rejected.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

RETIREMENT AS LIEUTENANT GENERAL.

Mr. KNOX. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Calendar No. 173, being the bill (S. 2867) to authorize the President, when Maj. Gen. Crowder retires, to place him on the retired list of the Army as a lieutenant general.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will not at this time object to the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania, but I am going to ask as soon as the bill to which he has referred is considered that we go on with the calendar regularly, as this is Calendar Monday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments on page 2, line 1, after the word "pay," to strike out "and emoluments," and in the same line, after the word "grade," to insert "as fixed by section 24 of the act of Congress approved July 15, 1870," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That in view of the long and faithful services of Maj. Gen. E. H. Crowder, Judge Advocate General of the United States Army, and especially his conspicuous services as Provost Marshal General in conjunction with the various State and Territorial executives and the local and district boards, in the execution of the selective-service law, the President is hereby authorized, when that officer retires, to place him on the retired list of the Army as a lieutenant general, with the pay of that grade as fixed by section 24 of the act of Congress approved July 15, 1870; and to grant him a commission in accordance with such advanced rank.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, the purpose of this bill may be expressed in a sentence. It would permit Gen. Crowder to be placed upon the retired list of the Army as a lieutenant general. This is in recognition of his long and faithful service of 42 years in the Army, and especially of his conspicuous services as Provost Marshal General in the execution of the selective-service law.

When we entered suddenly, all unprepared, into the Great World War the Nation was confronted with a thousand problems, none simple and many of such magnitude as to appear appalling and almost impossible of timely solution. Of all of these problems none was of greater magnitude than that one which involved the raising of armies. It was not a mere question of raising a sufficient number of brave and able men, however great that number might be. We doubted neither the courageous patriotism of American manhood nor the self-sacrificing encouragement of American womanhood.

But our experience in former wars, and particularly the experience of Great Britain in this war, had proven the great danger of permitting the volunteer system to strip the fields, to cripple the factories, and to deprive the wife and children of protector and breadwinner, while the slacker, the drone, and the unessential, failing in their paramount duty to their country, skulked behind to fatten on the profits of war. On the other hand, our own experience in the War between the States made most of us fearful of forcible conscription.

There was urgent and instant need, if we were to reach a correct and timely solution of this problem, for a man of almost unheard of qualifications, amounting, indeed, to those of genius. We must have not only a military man of exhaustive learning and experience in that field but a man so thoroughly trained in municipal and international law as to be able to propose, to draft, to interpret, and to administer laws; a man of such social and economic learning as to protect and preserve our social and economic institutions; a man of such broad knowledge, such rich imagination, and such prescient vision as to foresee every danger and avoid every pitfall.

The question has American genius produced such a man had already been answered. Early in 1913, before war or the rumor of war had begun to convulse the world, the then President of the United States, about to retire from the White House, was impelled to spread upon the official and public records of the War Department his official estimate of a man whose service to the Nation had, for many years and in many climes, been performed under his personal observation. In a letter addressed on January 9, 1913, to Secretary of War Stimson, President Taft, after relating the long and brilliant military, governmental, and international career of an officer of the United States Army, said of that officer:

Whenever contingency arises in which it is necessary to have a man of great experience, a law administrator and a lawgiver, Gen. Crowder would be peculiarly fitted to satisfy the governmental need. I regard him as the best Judge Advocate General we have had in a long time. He is a real lawyer; his opinions are based on his own judgment and do not respond merely to the wishes of the man who asks his opinion. He is a student of law and politics and economics, and therefore makes a rare combination in that reserve of useful men available for governmental exigency which fits a nation to meet any crisis.

In placing upon the public records of the War Department this official recognition of Gen. Crowder's efficiency, Secretary Stimson also placed himself on record by writing to the President:

All that you say of his ability and efficiency has been confirmed by what I have seen of him during the year and a half that I have been in this department. In the many acute questions of Army reorganization which have come up in connection with the legislation of last year, as well as in connection with the number of bills of proposed legislation which have as yet not become law, he has evinced a sound judgment, a capacity, and a reliability which are beyond all praise. Upon him have fallen the legal problems of a very difficult period, and his opinions have been thoroughly independent as well as sound and broad. I quite concur with your view of his possession of a combination of rare qualities which place him "in that reserve of useful men available for governmental exigency which fits a nation to meet any crisis."

And so when the crisis arose the present Secretary of War turned to Enoch H. Crowder to solve the great problem of the day. Without an instant's hesitation Gen. Crowder, with an exhaustive and all-inclusive knowledge of our own experience and that of the British, declared himself for selective conscription as against the volunteer system; and before the ink was well set upon our declaration of war the Secretary of War and the President had approved Gen. Crowder's plan and forwarded to the Congress his draft of an act destined to achieve complete success and perfect popularity, and now come by common and universal consent to be known by its true name, the selective-service law.

It has been well and truly said that Enoch H. Crowder was the architect of this law and the genius of its execution. I shall not endeavor to relate the brilliant history of this superb accomplishment. Let me rather read to you the expressions of the mature judgment of those men best fitted to speak of it because of their intimate knowledge and broad vision. On June 7, 1917, two days after the first registration, the Secretary of War, in a public letter, said to Gen. Crowder:

You have done the biggest thing of its kind we have ever been called upon to try and you have surrounded it with an atmosphere which not only created the success but made of it a stimulating demonstration of our national solidarity and patriotism.

A little more than a month later the Secretary of War again expressed in a public letter to Gen. Crowder official recognition and appreciation of his great work. He said:

When this letter reaches you the actual drawing of the numbers selecting the men for the first National Army of 500,000 men will have been completed and the third stage in your great task brought to a successful conclusion. First, you drafted the law for this great undertaking; second, you perfected with extraordinary accuracy the registration; and third, you worked out with infinite patience and zeal the arrangements for the great choice which affects the careers and lives of so many of the young men of our country.

It is not necessary for me to recount the embarrassments and difficulties which you have had to face; they would have discouraged, if not appalled, one having less devotion or less clear and serviceable knowledge.

There remain, of course, the difficulties of applying the exemptions provided by the statute, and to this task I know you will give the same splendid service; but I can not allow this epoch-making achievement to pass even this stage of its accomplishment without tendering you my personal and official thanks and expressing my judgment that the country owes to you the success which has attended the steps so far taken.

And a month later, on August 19, 1917, when the task of selecting the first increment of our armies had begun to show tangible results, only three months after the passage of the law, that great American, Theodore Roosevelt, speaking for all Americans, said:

I regard Gen. Crowder's work with the draft as one of the best specific bits of work our Army has done in my time. I knew he would do it well, but I had no idea of how very well it would be. Of all our people in the first six months of the war, he is the man who has actually accomplished most, the man to whom all good Americans should be most grateful. I respect—and I fear that I envy—the man who has earned the right to have this said of him.

Three months later, when the first half million selected Americans had been mobilized, the Secretary of War, in a public address in New York, again gave Gen. Crowder ungrudging and unstinted credit for the great work he was accomplishing.

As the civilian head of the War Department—

He said—

I have had an intimate, a most intimate, opportunity to observe the writing and working out of the selective-service law. I know better than anybody else who wrote it, who interpreted it, and who accomplished in the main its success. There are in the lives of all men some moments which, above all others, are supreme, and this moment is justly entitled to be a supreme moment in the life of Gen. Crowder.

From the first moment when this matter was considered it absorbed his attention. It was a period of labor most abundant, of devotion most complete and entire, bringing a long and brilliant military career and a wide, intimate acquaintance with military law and a deep knowledge of human nature to the perfection of a task believed to be impossible, and perhaps in anybody else's hands many times more difficult. And the United States has achieved this great victory, for this is a victory in this war. We are entitled to-night to lay the credit where it belongs and to salute the draftsman of this law and its interpreter as our guide, our counselor, and our helper in the entire matter.

Mr. President, allow me to quote one other man who, as a former Secretary of State, as a former Secretary of War, and as a great citizen, has the right to speak for the American people.

At the end of August of last year, when our great endeavor was reaching fruition, in an address to the American Bar Association, Elihu Root said:

It was a fortunate circumstance that the President placed in the hands of the head of the law department of the Army the application of the law for conscription and for the raising of the vast army already in France and the still greater army which is about to follow, for, in the first place, the Judge Advocate General, Gen. Crowder, when he became Provost Marshal General, applied the new law under the war power of the Constitution to the people of the country with a just sense of their legal rights and the legal principles to which they were accustomed. I do not want to pass his name without expressing a sense of satisfaction and doing honor to that admirable and able and effective officer, Gen. Crowder. We have had much criticism, many things have necessarily gone wrong, many things have made us unhappy, but we could always turn to him and to his work as proof that virtue still remained in the American people. Whatever has gone wrong it has not gone wrong with him, and the result of his work is a million and a half of American soldiers in France to-day, and a million and more that are yet to go. Gen. Crowder, as I say, applied the new law under war powers to the American people with a just sense of their legal rights. The result is that the draft has taken its place throughout America with the good will and the satisfaction and the undiminished patriotism and the enthusiasm of the entire people, and the boys who have been drafted and have gone into the National Army are as full of patriotism as any man that ever marched in any army.

If we look abroad, Mr. President, for unbiased estimates of America's accomplishments, we are immediately confronted with unhesitating recognition of the great work of this great soldier and citizen. When the end of the fighting came and the world paused to measure results, Lord Northcliffe, with the keen insight of a skilled journalist and the impartial judgment of an outside observer, spontaneously proclaimed to all the world that America had performed the two greatest miracles of modern days—the one, the raising by scientific selection of her gigantic and invincible armies without a disastrous effect upon her social or economic life; the other, the safe and speedy transportation of those armies to the far-flung lines of battle.

Mr. President, little remains for me to say. I have called the witnesses and they have made the case. My personal and official acquaintance with Gen. Crowder began when, as Secretary of State, I had the pleasure of conferring with him about those grave and intricate questions upon whose correct solution depended the fate and fortune of the young Republic of Cuba. I then formed the same opinion of his great ability, of his broad learning, of his superior wisdom, and of his disinterested loyalty and patriotism as that expressed by those whom I have quoted. As the years have passed and those characteristics have led him from great to greater accomplishment so has my high opinion grown higher.

His long and brilliant military career of 42 years, succinctly set out in the report furnished to the committee by the War Department, shows his full and rich experience as a soldier, as a lawyer, as a diplomat, and as an executive. From the young lieutenant of the early eighties, with long and active service in the Indian wars, he ran the gamut until he became a member of the General Staff, whence he went to Manchuria to serve as our military observer for a year with the first army of Kuroki in the Russo-Japanese War; after which he was chief of the first division of the General Staff. From the position of military instructor at the University of Missouri, where he studied law upon his native heath, he went through all the legal experience of the Army officer, including service as an associate justice of the Supreme Court of the Philippine Islands, until he became Judge Advocate General.

Time forbids further reference to this bald but extensive record of his career, and I shall ask that it be printed as part of these remarks.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

C., to date.

By direction of the President awarded distinguished-service medal for especially meritorious and conspicuous service as Provost Marshal General in the preparation and operation of the draft laws of the Nation during the war by General Orders, No. 144, War Department, December, 1918.

Mr. KNOX. In transmitting this record the Secretary of War has written:

MY DEAR SENATOR WADSWORTH: The clerk of the Senate Military Affairs Committee has brought to my attention Senate bill 2867, by Mr. KNOX, "to authorize the President, when Maj. Gen. Crowder retires, to place him on the retired list as lieutenant general."

I beg leave to inclose herewith a copy of the record of Gen. Crowder from September 1, 1877, when he entered the United States Military Academy as a cadet, to the present date. It would be idle for me to attempt to illustrate a record of service so long, so zealous, and so distinguished.

My own contact with Gen. Crowder, of course, began when I became Secretary of War in March, 1916, from which time until America's entry into the World War he continued actively in charge of the duties of Judge Advocate General and was in daily conference with me about difficult legal problems. I then conceived an admiration, which has daily increased, for his great range of knowledge and experience in questions of law, military and civil, and the detailed history of the Military Establishment of the United States. In 1917 Gen. Crowder prepared in consultation with me the selective-service law, and I appointed him Provost Marshal General to execute that law, a service delicate and intricate, requiring the institution of Nation-wide machinery which would function harmoniously and with such visible and obvious justice as to commend both the law and its execution to public favor. This service he performed with conspicuous ability, and it is one of the outstanding features of America's military mobilization that although we resorted to conscription there is a general consensus of opinion to the effect that the law was executed without fear or favor, and that justice and wisdom characterized its interpretations and applications.

I am very happy to be able to assure the committee of my belief that the services rendered by Gen. Crowder merit the recognition of Congress, and the bill proposed by Mr. KNOX seems to me a suitable reward for a great service rendered self-sacrificingly by a soldier as the latest act of a life devoted to the service of his country.

Cordially, yours,

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

Even now, after 42 years of splendid service, and hardly free from the most arduous and most successful work of his long career, he has just concluded for the Cuban Republic a revision and amplification of its electoral laws, for which the Cuban Congress voted him the thanks of that Republic, and the University of Cuba conferred upon him the degree of doctor of laws, as have also the leading universities of this country.

Will the Congress of his own country fail to honor and reward him? It can not be so. Republics are not always ungrateful. Therefore I have no doubt that this bill will pass, and I hope it may pass without a dissenting voice, because I believe it is the universal desire of the American people that this honor and reward, at least, should be bestowed upon the man who has served them so long, so faithfully, and so well.

It has been asked why Gen. Crowder's case should be acted on now and in advance of taking up the rewards due to other officers for distinguished service. The answer is twofold: First, and least important, because the bill does not propose to promote the general while he is on the active list, in which case he would receive the pay and emoluments of the advanced rank, whereas under the bill he would receive but two-thirds of the pay and no emoluments upon retirement. I do not understand that there is any case which in this particular is like Gen. Crowder's case. The other promotions suggested have been for men who will remain in active service and receive the full benefits of their advanced rank.

But the real reason that justifies considering this case by itself and on its own merits is the nature of the duties Gen. Crowder performed in the construction of the Army, which has been so much appreciated by the distinguished men I have quoted and by the people at large. In this work the general officers whose claims rest upon distinguished service in the field had no part. They, as individuals, commanded fractions of the great organization which Gen. Crowder was charged with the onerous duty of constructing. His labors began long before theirs. The draft act was passed May 18, 1917, and this was weeks after Gen. Crowder began to prepare it and the machinery for its enforcement. Our first troops under Gen. Pershing landed in France June 27, 1917. Gen. Pershing has received his reward, and properly enough, without connecting it with or making it dependent upon what is to be done for others. His relation to the war was likewise distinctive and different from that of any others. Gen. Crowder's is equally distinctive and perhaps more fundamental. There was no one else in his class and no one else except those whom he had gathered around him for his assistance that were connected with the vast subject with which he was charged with responsibility.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I understand that the Senate gave unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of this bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It did.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I desire to offer two amendments to the bill. I send to the desk the first of them, and ask to have it stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 1, page 2, it is proposed to insert the word "retired" before the word "pay," so that, if amended, it will read "with the retired pay of that grade."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It may be that the Senator from Pennsylvania will accept that amendment, because in his statement to the Senate he said that the officer was to receive retired pay in case the bill takes effect. My reason for offering it is that as a matter of fact there is a distinction between pay of a soldier and retired pay, and I wanted to cure that.

Mr. KNOX. My recollection is that we discussed that in committee, and I thought there had been an amendment inserted.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not think it was quite broad enough.

Mr. KNOX. I accept that amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I now present the second amendment, and upon this and other phases of the bill I desire to make some observations. I ask that it be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That these officers of the Army who now hold or previously during the present war held the rank herein set before their respective names, to wit, Lieut. Gens. Hunter Liggett and Robert L. Bullard and Maj. Gens. James W. McAndrew, James G. Harbord, Ernest Hinds, Merritte W. Ireland, Harry L. Rogers, William C. Langfitt, William L. Kenly, Henry P. McCain, Charles P. Summerall, and Leonard Wood, shall, when retired from active service, have the rank of lieutenant general and the pay hereinbefore provided for an officer retired with said rank.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN addressed the Senate. After having spoken for a few minutes,

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I ask the Senator, if he will be kind enough to permit me to do so, in view of the fact that we have been in the habit of proceeding to the consideration of executive business at 2 o'clock for the purpose of taking up the treaty, whether he has any suggestion to make as to whether action can be had upon this bill before that time? Does the Senator wish to conclude his remarks, or what will be the course of procedure? I do not want in any way to defeat action upon the pending bill, if it can be passed within a reasonably short time.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I believe that it is customary, unless the rule is invoked, when a bill is taken up by unanimous consent, to conclude the debate on it before any other business is taken up, even when there is unfinished business pending. But I do not want to invade the rule of the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The only rule I am aware of covering this situation is that the morning hour expires two hours after the Senate has convened, which to-day will be at 2 o'clock. I was not here when the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] called up this measure, and I do not know its parliamentary situation. Is it before the Senate by unanimous consent?

Mr. KNOX. It is before the Senate by unanimous consent. I have always understood the rule to be as stated by the Senator from Oregon, that if a matter is taken up by unanimous consent it shall be disposed of before any other business is taken up.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. There is no unfinished business, strictly speaking; it is simply a course of procedure we have been pursuing, to take up the treaty at 2 o'clock. Of course, a motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business, while a privileged motion, can not be made unless a Senator has the floor to make it, and the Senator from Oregon would have to yield for that purpose, I assume.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have no disposition at all, I may say to the Senator from Connecticut, to claim any such privilege as that, but I shall yield to the wishes of the Senate. I made no objection to taking up the bill, because the Senator from Pennsylvania was anxious to have it disposed of, although I reserved the right to object to it. I readily assented to the request for unanimous consent. I am willing now to yield the floor for the purpose of going into executive session, but I reserve the right still to conclude my argument on this measure.

Mr. KNOX. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President. Referring to the statement I made a moment ago, what is the rule if a bill is taken up by unanimous consent? Is it superseded at the end of the morning hour by anything but unfinished business?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question before the Senate at the present time is the amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN]. The bill, of course, was taken up by unanimous consent.

When a question is pending, no motion shall be received but—
To adjourn.
To adjourn to a day certain, or that when the Senate adjourn it shall be to a day certain.
To take a recess.
To proceed to the consideration of executive business.

A motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business will be in order at any time.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. But the Senator who makes the motion must have the floor, I assume.

The VICE PRESIDENT. He must get the eye of the Chair.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator who has the floor, I understand, can not be swept off his feet by some one rising and shouting out that he moves to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I understand the Senator from Oregon has already expressed a willingness to yield for the purpose of allowing the Senator from Connecticut to make the motion if he can continue his address, as he undoubtedly has the right to do.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. He has so stated, Mr. President. As far as I am concerned, that is perfectly satisfactory; but when the Senate has gone into executive session, I do not see how this bill could be passed except by unanimous consent and as in legislative session. I simply wanted to submit these views to the Senate for its consideration, to see if we could, by unanimous consent, arrive at any understanding.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Now, let the Chair express his view, which I feel compelled to restate. This must be the rule. There is no unfinished business. This bill has been taken up by unanimous consent. There is a pending question before the Senate, to which the Senator from Oregon is addressing himself. If he yields to a Senator to make a motion to go into open executive session, the motion is in order, and the Senate would probably go into open executive session; but the Chair would be compelled to rule, unless I have additional light on the subject, that when the German treaty is laid before the Senate, it being an executive session and this being a legislative matter, the Senator from Oregon can not discuss a legislative matter in an executive session of the Senate without unanimous consent.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I presume the Senator from Oregon could undoubtedly say he was discussing the German treaty and continue his observations on whatever view he took of that instrument. My only point is that I do not think the Senator from Pennsylvania could secure action upon the bill, if that course were taken, without the unanimous consent of the Senate to do it as in legislative session, in which case the Senator from Oregon could exercise his prerogatives in such line as he saw fit.

Mr. KNOX. I would have very little doubt about the action of the Senate. This is going to be a very short matter, anyhow. The Senator from Oregon told me he was going to speak only a short time, and I have nothing further to say. I think that when the Senate gave its unanimous consent to have it heard at all it could certainly renew that consent, even though it was in executive session, and allow it to be heard as in legislative session.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business in open executive session for the purpose of considering the treaty of peace with Germany, if the Senator from Oregon will yield to me for that purpose.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield for that purpose. I am yielding because I realize the importance of the treaty. I know how anxious the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] is to dispose of this bill, and I consented to have it taken up for that reason, but I am willing to yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I inquire what the motion is?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion is to proceed to the consideration of executive business in open executive session.

Mr. McCUMBER. For the consideration of the treaty?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Have I the floor when the treaty is before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oregon has the floor and, in the judgment of the Chair, has the right to proceed unless there is objection. If there is objection, the Chair does not think he has a right to discuss the bill in open executive session.

Mr. McCUMBER. Inasmuch as notice has been given to take up a certain phase of the treaty at this time, and inasmuch as the Senator is desirous of going on with the discussion of another matter, may I be bold enough to ask how long he expects to discuss it?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will say to the Senator from North Dakota that I am willing to resume my discussion of the bill after his discussion of the peace treaty. I do not want to interfere with that at all. Or I assume that the Senate will permit me, in the morning hour to-morrow, to resume my address on this subject. I am perfectly willing for that reason to suspend now.

Mr. McCUMBER. I rather assume that the address of the Senator from Oregon will take some little time yet?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Probably an hour.

Mr. McCUMBER. If that be true, it would seem to me that we ought to go on with the treaty at this time.

Mr. KNOX. As the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] has given notice that at 2 o'clock he would begin discussion of one phase of the treaty, and as I know of no one else who has given notice of an intention to speak this afternoon on the treaty, I ask unanimous consent that upon the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from North Dakota we may proceed as in legislative session with the consideration of the bill.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I shall be compelled to object to that. It is a short enough time that has been allotted for the consideration of the treaty, from 2 o'clock on. My own judgment is that we ought to begin the consideration of the treaty earlier in the day. I do think it would be a very simple matter for the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] to continue his remarks in the morning hour to-morrow if the Senator from Pennsylvania will call up the bill. So far as I am concerned, there will be no objection to its consideration at that time.

Mr. KNOX. If the parliamentary situation is such that I may call it up before 2 o'clock to-morrow, that is quite satisfactory, though I was afraid I might run into a similar situation to-morrow.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That might possibly be true to-morrow, but other bills have been considered and passed within the morning hour recently, and I think the Senator, no doubt, can accomplish the same result within the next two or three days.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That course will be perfectly satisfactory to me.

Mr. KNOX. If the Senator from Nebraska has that thought about the matter, I will consent. It would do no good if I felt otherwise, because objection would no doubt be made. I give notice that to-morrow morning, at the conclusion of morning business or during the morning hour, I shall call up this measure.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield the floor then, and will conclude to-morrow what I have to say.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I shall confine these remarks exclusively to the so-called Johnson amendments to the peace treaty, and I purpose to demonstrate not only the lack of necessity for such amendments to balance any supposed inequality in the voting strength of any power but also the great injustice, the gross wrong, such proposed amendments would do to Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa.

Mr. President, of all the many false declarations that have been made concerning the league of nations covenant, none has been so persistently indulged in as the one concerning the voting power of Great Britain. And from the letters I have received and the press reports I have read, these unfounded assertions concerning this voting power have taken a deeper root in the mind of the public than any other criticism aimed at the league. The press of the country publishes the bald declaration of the enemies of peace by concord of nations that Great Britain will have upon every dispute between nations six votes and the United States but one, without ever informing their readers of the real truth concerning this matter. Even Senators who in private conversation would never dream of attempting to deceive one another seem unable to resist the temptation to take advantage of a prejudice created by this deception and, with studied avoidance of the real and full truth, give this prejudice another boost.

The public, Mr. President, can not be blamed if it draws false conclusions from false premises. If any one of us had not read the treaty, and a Senator should declare, as has been declared again and again on this floor, that in any dispute between the United States and Great Britain, or between the United States and Canada or Australia, the United States would have one vote and Great Britain would have six votes, he would very naturally be misled. And he would most naturally say: "That is unfair and we will not stand for it." So, Mr. President, a misled public would say the same thing. The difference, however, between the position of the Senator and that of the public is that the Senator has the treaty on his desk before him and can readily correct any misstatement of the terms of that treaty. The public has not the treaty and can not refute the assertion.

I know the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is too voluminous to be of much use in overcoming the prejudice created by speakers throughout the United States in thus unfairly presenting this phase of the subject. Though one had the greatest amount of leisure, he could not read the one-hundredth part of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and the number who ever see the RECORD are infinitesimal.

But slight as is this opportunity for publicity through the medium of the RECORD, the questions involved in the treaty are so momentous that I am impelled to adopt this meager opportunity to place the truth of this question of the voting strength of the several nations before the American people.

Mr. President, the average man, busy with the perplexing problem of how to make his income—or what is left of it after the tax collector has taken his share—square with the present cost of living, has little time to apply even first principles of his reasoning powers to the subject. If he did so, this question would immediately present itself to his contemplative mind: Why did France agree that Great Britain should have six votes and France only one? France has been the most persistent stickler for her rights and her safety of all the nations which signed this compact. This average citizen would be compelled to say to himself: Is it not strange that France should have consented to this great disparity in voting strength without even a dissent? Next to France comes Italy, a country with a population as great as that of Great Britain, and partially surrounded by about as disorderly and eruptive a set of States as there are on the face of the earth. Is it not strange that Italy, represented by one of the most able statesmen in Europe, never said one word about being outvoted 6 to 1 by Great Britain? Is it not equally strange that Spain and Portugal made no protest? Is it not wonderfully strange that in a matter of such transcendent importance it never occurred to any one of these old astute nations that they were giving to Great Britain a power in their councils six times as great as any one of them would have? Is it not wonderfully strange that nations which have seen alliances and friendships change almost annually during the last century—nations that have seen their allied friends change to allied enemies in a single day—nations which live in this hotbed of international broils—never gave a thought to the fact that they were putting their heads into the lion's mouth, that they were giving in some instances to another power with which they had been in death grips time and again a voting strength six to their one in all their future disputes?

Well, Mr. President, the conclusion of this average citizen, after cogitating over the awful and dire results that would follow this disparity in voting strength, would be that there must be some mistake—that it could not be true that such extraordinary favors should have been granted to one nation without protest—that it was too absurd to be true. And, Mr. President, his conclusion would be correct. It is not true. If it had been true that this covenant gave Great Britain six votes to one given each of the other members in disputes with her, or in fact in any dispute, the other members to this compact never would have signed it.

What are the real facts in relation to this voting strength? To clearly understand them we must first understand just what powers the council or the assembly has. We must understand:

First. That neither the council nor the assembly is a board of arbitration.

Second. That neither of them decides international disputes at all.

I wish those two simple propositions could be understood by all the American people.

Third. That the only jurisdiction which either the council or the assembly can have over a dispute between nations is the right to investigate and report what the true facts are concerning the dispute and make recommendations in regard thereto.

Fourth. That even in the matter of determining what these true facts are and what the recommendations should be for a peaceful settlement, both parties to the dispute are excluded.

Fifth. That a dispute with a part of a nation or an empire is a dispute with the whole, and a dispute with the whole must necessarily be a dispute with each part. Therefore, a dispute between one country and another country composed of a dominant power and its dominions or possessions is a dispute with each and every part of such country, and, hence, that in a dispute between the British Empire or any member thereof and any other country, all parties to the dispute would be excluded even in determining the facts of the dispute under article 15.

Sixth. That the British Empire, being a member of the council which consists of nine nations, has but one vote in such council; that as neither Canada nor any other British dominion or possession has a separate membership in such council, of course neither could have a vote therein.

Seventh. That if the investigation of the facts concerning the dispute should be transferred to the assembly, then Canada, Australia, and other British dominions would still have no vote if either the British Empire or any one of its constituent parts was a party to the controversy.

Eighth. Here is the only kind of a case in which Canada or other self-governing dominion of the British Empire would be entitled to a vote: If the case is transferred from the council to the assembly, and if neither the British Empire nor any one of its dominions or possessions is a party to the dispute, as, for instance, if the dispute were between Serbia and Roumania, then Canada and these other self-governing dominions mentioned could vote, not in settlement of the dispute, but on the question of what are the true facts bearing on the dispute, and also on what should be recommended to the disputants as a basis of settlement of the dispute.

In such case Canada, Australia, or other wholly self-governing dominion would have a right to have a voice in the ascertainment of those facts and the making of such recommendation equal to that of Haiti, or Liberia, or Hejaz, or Cuba, or Panama. Can anyone see any possible danger to the United States in according to Canada such equal right in the investigation and report? On the contrary would we not select Canada in preference to any of these mentioned nations?

Ninth. Great Britain can not and will not control the vote of Canada on any question on which Canada would be entitled to vote. As Canada controls her own foreign as well as domestic affairs, by her own parliament, and wholly independently of Great Britain, she will cast her vote with equal independence on any subject on which she would have a right to vote. And as she would have no right to vote on any question in the council, not being a member of that body, and no right to vote in the assembly on any question in which the British Empire or any of its dominions or possessions would be a party, and as the only dispute she could vote on at all would be limited to disputes between other nations, and further limited to the mere ascertainment of the facts of the dispute and recommendations for its settlement, it is worse than idle, it is absolutely false, to say that she will not control her own vote. In such case Great Britain would be no more liable to control the vote of Canada than would the United States. And what is true of Canada is equally true of Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa. Great Britain would have no voice in appointing the representatives of these dominions and the appointees would be responsible only to their own governments. In the case of India the relation may be more close, but I am certain that this relation will not be more close than that which exists between the United States and Cuba, or Panama, or Haiti, or Honduras.

I purpose to make a very short explanation and elucidation of these declarations.

What is the procedure under this league of nations in case of a dispute between nations which would be liable to lead to war?

First. Members agree to submit the dispute either to arbitration or to an inquiry by the council (article 12). Mark you, they do not agree to submit the matter to arbitration by the council, but merely either to submit the case to arbitration by arbitrators entirely outside the council, or to submit it to an inquiry by the council. If the matter is submitted to arbitration, that takes it out of the council and out of the league of nations, and it remains out unless a party against whom an award is made by these outside arbitrators fails to abide by the award, which would again raise another dispute, which dispute could not be submitted to the council except for the purpose of investigating the facts as to why the award was not complied with.

Second. They agree that if they recognize that a dispute is suitable for arbitration they will arbitrate it. That arbitration, however, is to be by such method as shall be agreed upon by the parties and entirely outside and independent of the council or league of nations.

Nearly every nation now has by treaty with other nations made provision to arbitrate such differences, and they will remain outside of the jurisdiction of the council or the assembly.

Third. They further agree that if the matter is not suitable for arbitration—and each nation must itself determine whether the matter is suitable for arbitration—they will first attempt to settle the dispute by diplomacy; that is, through their own diplomatic officials. That is an agreement which they make with each other.

So, Mr. President, up to this time neither the council nor the assembly has acquired any jurisdiction over the dispute. The members themselves have mutually agreed that they will make these efforts on their own part without submitting anything to the council or assembly. In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred the disputes will be so settled. Their agreement, faithfully observed, that they will attempt the settlement by diplomacy, will bring about the settlement.

Fourth. But there may arise a dispute where the disputants, through stubbornness or selfishness, have failed to settle by diplomacy and where one or both claim that the matter is not suitable for arbitration; that is, that it is not a justiciable question. What then is to be done? The parties then agree, under article 12, that they will submit the matter for inquiry only to the council. Here the council obtains its right to act; but to act how? To what end and to what extent is the matter submitted? It is submitted to the end that (a) the council may endeavor to bring about a settlement through the friendly offices of the council; (b) that if the persuasive powers of all these nations in the council can not induce the parties to come to an agreement, a report containing a statement of the real facts of the dispute shall be published so that the people of each country, understanding what the real facts are, would not permit their country to wage war for a wrongful purpose; and that as one side or the other must be wrong the wrongfully inclined Government would be compelled to back down by the force of public opinion. This, in my opinion, would take care of the other one case out of the hundreds of national disputes.

To effectuate such peaceful settlement, the members agree among themselves, that if the council fails through persuasion to effect a settlement of the dispute, it may either unanimously or by a majority vote make and publish a statement of the facts of the dispute and recommendations which it deems just and proper. (Art. 15, 3d paragraph.)

This report has no binding effect on any party. Its purpose is simply to apprise the people of both disputing countries what the real facts are, and to trust to the sense of justice of the people themselves to prevent a wrongful war.

That if all the members of the council, other than the disputants, join in the report on the facts and the recommendations for its just settlement, then all the members agree that none of them will go to war against the disputant that complies with the recommendations. (Ib., 5th paragraph.)

That if the council fails to reach a unanimous agreement, exclusive of the disputants, as to what are the true facts of the dispute or what ought to be done in settlement, then again no one is bound, and the members of the league—not the council or the assembly but the members of the league themselves separately—can take such steps as they deem necessary for the maintenance of right and justice. (Ib., 6th paragraph.) That means that the several nations through diplomatic channels will make still another attempt to compose their disputes when the council and the assembly of the league of nations shall have failed to do so.

Mr. President, almost every argument made on the floor of the Senate, and every one without exception made to the public by Senators opposed to any league of nations, has given the impression to the people of the world that the council or the assembly, as the case might be, is a sort of court or tribunal that decides the disputes between nations, and it is because of these misstatements of the facts and the misapprehension of many of our people arising therefrom that the ground is made fertile for the development of about all the animosities toward this league and especially toward the claimed voting power of Great Britain. I have no doubt the letter read by my colleague [Mr. GRONNA] this morning from the State of North Dakota was entirely founded upon that general misapprehension.

I wish the public could just once fully understand, first, that not one case of dispute out of a hundred would ever go to the council or assembly; second, that even if all other efforts provided for the settlement of disputes should fail, the only thing submitted to the council or assembly is the right to investigate and report the facts to the public. If, despite all these efforts, a nation, criminally inclined, insists upon making war of aggression on another country, all the council or all the assembly can do is to report that fact and recommend to the other countries the military or naval force the other members ought to furnish to prevent one country from destroying another. And, Mr. President, that will prevent war, because no country will ever attempt to fight the world. The league compact simply applies to world relations the same rules that govern individual relations in every community.

To illustrate: Suppose a community should consist of 100 families of different physical power and strength, and, like nations at the present time, each is perfectly independent of any of the others and may commit any act of aggression it has the power to commit. If driven by the exigencies of self-protection, three of these stronger families should ally themselves for offense and defense against three other strong families, that might check offenses for a time against any one of these six families, but it would allow the families which had thus prepared themselves for aggression toward each other to direct their war machinery against the weaker families, and through annexations disturb the balance of power and thereby bring about the very thing the alliance sought to prevent. But, on the other hand, if all these 100 families enter into a compact, each one with the 99 others, that they will join to prevent any one family from doing a wrong to another, any family inclined to do such a wrong would desist from so doing, not through inclination, perhaps, but perhaps because it would know it would be defeated and ultimately punished for the attempt.

Now, every community, large and small, in every civilized country is governed entirely by such a compact. Every man in every city and county and State is under a legal obligation, by the very form of the government of his community, to protect the life, liberty, and property of every other citizen. Is he ever called upon to do this? Why, there is not one man in a thousand that would be called upon once in a thousand years to use his physical efforts to accomplish this result. The fact that he is ready to do it, the fact that he is bound to do it, and the would-be offender knows that he is ready and bound to do it, is what maintains peace throughout every civilized community on the face of the earth. The same rule will work exactly the same way between nations, which are but bigger collections of individuals, and if we will have the courage just once to establish the rule, there will be no calling upon the soldiery of all nations to carry on distant war. That is the key to the whole situation—national courage to do what individual courage has done in every community. I have never been summoned to Denver or San Francisco to quell a disturbance, and I will never be summoned to Pittsburgh or Cleveland for such purpose.

So, Mr. President, you will see that even if it were true that Canada had a vote in the assembly, the only thing on earth the Canadian representative could vote on would be the question of what are the facts in any given dispute, and he could not even exercise his judgment on that if the dispute were one in which Canada or any other part of the British Empire had an interest.

What awful danger, therefore, is there or would there be in allowing this fully self-governing country to exercise a vote on this simple proposition of what are the facts in a given dispute, or what ought in fairness to be done to secure peace and tranquillity?

But you say Canada might be added to the council. Mr. President, that is an impossibility under any reasonable construction of this compact. The power to admit new members to the council is contained in the second paragraph of article 4, which reads:

> With the approval of the majority of the assembly, the council may name additional members of the league—

Keep that in mind—

> whose representatives shall always be members of the council; the council with like approval may increase the number of members of the league to be selected by the assembly for representation on the council.

I call special attention to the fact that the countries whose representatives shall be so selected by members of the council are to be "additional members of the league." As these self-governing dominions are, by the terms of the instrument itself, already made members of the league, they could not be included in the phrase "additional members of the league." Therefore, neither Canada nor any other British dominion could, by any possibility, be made members of the council.

It is clearly evident that the purpose of the framers of this instrument was to permit the inclusion of Germany and Russia as soon as they should become fit for membership in the council. But, Mr. President, there seem to be those who claim that Canada or other British dominions could be voted into the council. They can only adopt that construction by insisting that the word "additional" related to the council and not to membership in the league when it speaks of "additional members of the league," a meaning that would grossly violate the true meaning of the language used.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BALL in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. McCUMBER. I have stated that I would rather not yield until I get through, because I wish to make my remarks as compact as possible. Then I will gladly yield.

Mr. McCORMICK. Very well.

Mr. McCUMBER. But even if that could be done, it would still require a unanimous vote on the part of every member of the council, including the United States.

Let us look a moment to see how any new member can be placed on this select committee of nine constituting the council.

The first five can never be removed. They are the United States, the British Empire—not Great Britain—France, Italy, and Japan. Article 4, relating to the other four members of the council, whose membership in this important body is not quite absolute, says:

> These four members—

That is, the four to be selected for membership in the council—> shall be selected by the assembly from time to time in its discretion.

That discretion can be exercised only by a unanimous vote, because article 5 provides that—

> Except where otherwise expressly provided in this covenant or by the terms of this treaty, decisions at any meeting of the assembly or of the council shall require the agreement of all the members of the league represented at the meeting.

And this is not one of the cases where it is "otherwise expressly provided."

Suppose, now, Canada wishes to secure this place, even giving it that wrong construction, and that Spain or Brazil or Belgium or Greece must be removed. Then the member which must be displaced must vote for its own displacement, and the United States must also vote that Canada must come in, and Brazil or some other nation must go out. Such a thing never can and never will take place, even if that construction were possible.

But, it is said, you may add to the membership of the league and thereby give those additional members a place on the council without displacing an old one. Yes; but I insist that this selection can be only from additional members of the league, and not from those who are upon the original membership roll, because it always speaks of "additional members of the league." But here again, even adopting the contrary construction, you are up against the requirement for unanimity of vote in the council. The second paragraph of article 4 provides:

> With the approval of a majority of the assembly the council may name additional members of the league, whose representatives shall always be members of the council.

You will observe here, again, that two steps are necessary to name additional members of the league who shall always be members of the council: First, a majority of the assembly must approve the addition. This is one of the cases "otherwise expressly provided," where less than a unanimous vote is required. Second, the council must also name such approved additional members and the vote of the council is not "otherwise expressly provided," and must, therefore, be unanimous to become effective. Therefore, such newly proposed member can obtain admission to the council only by unanimous vote of that council. That relates to those who are to have a permanent place in the council.

This same second paragraph of article 4 also provides:

> The council with like approval may increase the number of members of the league to be selected by the assembly for representation on the council.

Undoubtedly this last provision means the possible addition to the four transient members of the council. The vote of the council in admitting additional members to the transient class, for the same reason, must also be unanimous.

Mr. President, though I have never heard the paragraph explained I can see the unexpressed purpose, the expectation that Germany and Russia shall soon be added to the class of unremovable members of the council. And this is as it should be. The Germans are a great as well as a powerful people, numerically and otherwise. And when that nation shall have renounced its diabolical doctrine that a State can commit no wrong except the offense of failure, justice as well as world peace demands that she should hold her place among the nations, not as a disturber but as a protector of world tranquillity.

Is there a case in which a dominion of the British Empire could have a vote separately from the Empire itself? Of course it could not in the council because it is not a member of the council and can not become a member. But could Canada vote in the assembly, and if so under what circumstances?

Once more I must caution Senators, as well as the American public, that neither council nor assembly is constituted a board of arbitration. Neither ever enters a judgment or an award. All that either can do under the covenant, so far as disputes are concerned, is to say what the facts are concerning those disputes.

Every member of the league is a member of the assembly. Therefore, the British Empire is a member of the assembly, as well as of the council. Canada is also a member of the league (see article 1 and Annex). Therefore Canada is a member of the assembly. Article 3 provides that each member of the assembly shall have one vote. Therefore Canada has a vote in the assembly. But on what has she that one vote? Mr. President, if the assembly is deciding what the facts are between Czechoslovakia and Turkey, both the British Empire and Canada would, I think, have a vote. If the question were one in arriving at the facts pertaining to a dispute between any member of the British Empire and any other nation, neither that nation nor any member of the British Empire would have a vote. Why? Because the parties to a dispute are eliminated from the decision by the provisions of article 15, and the dispute with a part of an empire, as I have stated, is a dispute with the whole empire, and a dispute with a dominant member is necessarily a dispute with each part. I do not think anyone seriously questions that conclusion on that proposition.

But to eliminate any possibility of doubt, I have suggested a reservation which reads as follows:

Sixth. That the United States understands and construes the words "dispute between members" and the words "dispute between parties" in article 15 to mean that a dispute with a self-governing dominion, colony, or dependency represented in the assembly is a dispute with the dominant or principal member represented therein and that a dispute with such dominant or principal member is a dispute with all of its self-governing dominions, colonies, or dependencies; and that the exclusion of the parties to the dispute provided in the last paragraph of said article will cover not only the dominant or principal member but also its dominions, colonies, and dependencies.

Mr. President, that proposed reservation does not change the true intent of article 15, which excludes representatives of the parties to the dispute. It simply makes certain that construction which everyone has given to this section, except a few opponents who would prefer the other construction in order to bolster up their opposition, namely, that a dispute with a part is a dispute with the whole, and a dispute with the whole is necessarily a dispute with every part. It is intended to make absolutely certain that in a dispute with any member of the British Empire every part of that Empire would be excluded from participation.

But the opponents of any league of nations are not satisfied with this exclusion. They wish to obtain for the United States a power on every occasion six times as great as that of any other country. If there should be a dispute between Great Britain and Austria, neither Great Britain nor her colonies nor her dependencies could cast a vote in the assembly. They, together with Austria, would be excluded in the findings of fact. But the United States, France, Italy, and Spain, and every other country would each have one vote as the league provisions now stand. They would be absolutely equal.

And now comes the Johnson amendment and demands that the United States shall have six votes on every dispute and each of these other countries but one vote. And, Mr. President, the very Senators who are making this most selfish demand are shouting from the housetops that Great Britain has packed the jury because Canada and Australia, not as a part of Great Britain but as wholly self-governing nations, who fought this grim war to a finish, demand and receive a recognition on matters to which Great Britain is not a party, a recognition equal to that of a score of other little insignificant states that never turned a hand to safeguard the world when all that civilization holds dear was at stake. The only nation that would hold a real advantage over the other nations in this league is the United States of America.

By virtue of our peculiar situation we would have an advantage over not only Great Britain but over every other nation in the world. We not only enter this league with special reservations in our favor, such as that relating to the Monroe Doctrine, but also other proposed reservations intended to relieve us from duties imposed on our allies. But these are the least important of our advantages. The far greater advantage lies in the fact that we shall, by reason of our relationship with other countries, control an overwhelming voting strength in every controversy.

At a mere nod from the United States our begotten child Panama, our foster-child Cuba, our wards Nicaragua, Haiti, Guatemala, Honduras, Uruguay, Ecuador, Bolivia, Peru, and even Brazil declared war on Germany. If by the mere raising of a finger these 10 countries declared war against a country that had certainly committed no offense against them, can any unprejudiced mind fail to understand that in every controversy that can affect our interest in the remotest degree the votes of all these States will be cast en bloc for whatever we may desire?

Yes, Mr. President, not only these countries but practically every country in the Western Hemisphere would follow our lead.

Talk about Great Britain having an advantage. Why, Mr. President, if Great Britain should have a quarrel with Guatemala about an oil lease, Great Britain and her dominions would be eliminated. But these children and stepchildren and wards of the United States, numbering a score, would follow the lead of this great country just as surely as the satellite follows the course of the planet.

We all know very well that if we should ask this further advantage of six votes every other country would ask the same. France and Italy and Greece would ask the same, and finally you would get back to Guatemala and Haiti and Liberia, and each of them would ask and demand their six votes. to be equal as a national unity. Mr. President, no world conference having a sense of gratitude in its heart or of justice in its soul would deny to Canada or Australia or New Zealand or South Africa also six votes. Our position will always make us a dominant power. But notwithstanding this advantage, the other nations are willing to rely upon our national honor. With that advantage can we not accord therefore to these other nations some confidence of integrity?

But, Mr. President, let us for a moment look at this subject from the standpoint of the right of Canada to admission as a separate self-governing nation, and I use Canada as typical of Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa.

I would like to put this question straight to every American man, woman, and child: Has Canada, a fully self-governing, independent dominion, earned by her sacrifices in blood and treasure through more than four years of this bloody war a right to a seat in the assembly that would give her a voice in effect equal to Haiti, or Hejaz, or Honduras, or Liberia, or Nicaragua, or Panama, or Peru, or San Salvador. or Guatemala, not one of which ever sacrificed a single soldier or a single dollar in defense of this great world principle? I know what the American people would answer if it were put directly to them.

Every delegate in that great peace conference declared that Canada had earned this recognition. Every nation signatory to this compact declared that it had no fear of Canada. The Senate of the United States is the first body that has ever challenged this slight recognition to Canada for her great sacrifices in this war.

Why were all these other little South or Central American States included in this compact? They were included because they had made a paper declaration of war against Germany. Why did they make this paper declaration of war against Germany? Who asked them to do so? The United States requested them to do so. Would any one of them have declared war except to please the United States and to show that they were on the same side? Did any one of them declare war until after we had declared it? Has any country in Europe complained that the United States, by reason of her position as the protector of all these Central and South American States against European aggression, has a control over every one of them, and would exercise a control over the votes of every one of them by a much stronger pressure than the pressure which even Great Britain could exercise upon Canada on the only questions on which Canada could exercise judgment?

Canada, a country whose population is about one-fourteenth that of the United States, furnished about 500,000 soldiers. If I remember rightly her losses were about 100,000. exclusive of the wounded and permanently injured. Her expenses were enormous. Her debts will be a heavy burden for many years. You say Great Britain controls the Canadian vote. Does she control the Canadian vote any more than the United States controls the Cuban vote or the Panaman vote or any Central American vote? Did Great Britain vote Canada into this war, or did Canada vote herself into it? Does Great Britain govern Canada's vote in the matter of tariffs? If Great Britain did control her there would be no tariffs levied against British goods. Does Great Britain control the action of Canada against the immigration of Asiatics, or does Canada control her own domestic affairs? When Canada made an agreement for reciprocity with the United States some years ago, was the agreement made with Great Britain or was it made with Canada? All you can say is that by reason of the relationship Canada still holds a kindly sympathy for the mother country. So do the German-Americans for Germany. So do the Irish-Americans for Ireland. So do the Scandinavian-Americans for Scandinavia. But do you disfranchise them because of that kindly feeling toward the fatherland?

Compare Canada with all these other nations that have signed this agreement. In territory she is the greatest of all. In population there are but 9 countries that exceed hers, and 22 which have a less population. Some of these countries have a population less than the city of Washington, and yet you give them a vote simply because they declared a paper war. And yet you say that Canada, who did so much to win this war, whose declaration was sealed with the blood of 100,000 of her sons, must be excluded.

All over the country Senators are shouting day and night that Great Britain, with a diplomacy which had outwitted every other country, had secured an advantage of a six-to-one vote over each and every other country represented in this world conference. What a compliment that is to the intelligence of the representatives of every other country!

As a matter of fact Great Britain never asked that these self-governing dominions of hers should have separate membership in the league at all. She was quite willing to assume the responsibility of representing them. But, Mr. President, they preferred to represent themselves just as they had represented themselves in declaring war—just as they had represented themselves on every field of carnage during the four long years of the bloodiest battles this old earth has ever witnessed. These nations, rising from the battle trenches, bleeding and blood begrimed—these nations with the fever of battle yet in their hearts—these nations which for four years had witnessed their brave sons mowed down by the merciless machine guns and mangled by bursting shells—these nations standing by the sanctified graves of their noble dead—these nations that have passed through the mouths of a thousand hells that this earth might be made safe for free people and free governments, demanded of their own right the privilege of sitting in the council chambers of the assembly, demanded the modest right to speak on the affairs of the world they had fought to save, with a voice as potent as that of Haiti or Uruguay or Liberia.

Mr. President, no nation represented at this great world conference had the conscience or the right to deny them this little recognition. And as an American who honors heroism and loves justice I shall never cast a vote of distrust against a single one of these brave little nations.

Mr. President, these nations were allowed a separate vote, independent of the British Empire, in this assembly, not in the council, but in the lower body, because, measured by what they had done, no nation could deny that they had earned this right. Every nation recognized Canada to all intents and purposes as an independent, self-governing nation. Every nation knew that if you were to deny nations a vote because of their sympathy with other nations and because other nations might influence them, you would deny the right of practically all but the greatest nations to vote in this assembly.

Strange as it may seem when we stop to contemplate it, every country engaged in this war thinks that it was the particular country that won the war. Not only this, but each subdivision of each army thinks that it was the particular subdivision whose efforts won the war. Great Britain says the war never could have been won except by her Navy, which held the command of the seas. France is certain that she won the war; the United States that the war could not have been won without her sons at Chateau-Thierry; and Canada, whose soldiers fought so valiantly on every field of contest, feels exactly the same. Well, the whole truth of the matter is that they all won this war, and each, acting with the others to win this war, is entitled to the same credit and the same honor for what each one did and the same place in any forum established to discuss world troubles.

Sometimes in arriving at a conclusion as to what particular army gave the final blow that broke the enemy, it might not be out of place to consult the enemy. I have been reading Ludendorff's history of the war. Gen. Ludendorff says that in the British offensive which started on the 8th day of August, 1918, the great assault made that day by the Canadians and the Australians was the blow that initiated the final defeat of the German armies. That may or may not be conceded by other nations, but it is an enemy admission that at least pays a high compliment to our neighbor, Canada, and our friend, Australia.

Senators opposed to this league seem to be imbued with the idea that we ought not to enter into this compact unless we can so dominate the situation that there never can be any possibility of any decision against us, even if we should be in the wrong. They are not even willing to take a chance where, excluding the parties to the dispute, the vote must be unanimous even as to what the facts are in the case—to have the force even of a moral suggestion.

From all these debates against the league one would conclude that the moment the armistice was declared last November we became the allies of Germany and Turkey and Bulgaria, and our old allies in this awful carnage, those who had stood the brunt of the war and suffered all its horrors for four years before we could be prepared to joint them, became our deadly enemies; that the thousands of brave seamen who dared the hidden mine and the deadly submarine, and whose comrades went down to watery graves by thousands that ships so sorely needed by their own countries might transport our soldiers to perform their great part in this war for human rights, are now enemies at heart of the United States; and that while all these other allied nations trust each other and trust us, we can not afford to put the slightest trust in their honor or integrity. We ought to be ashamed to harbor such everlastingly selfish motives and distrust against our allies.

There were in the Senate gallery when the Senator from New Jersey was making an address the other day a number of New Zealand officers who were on their way home from France, and who, landing at New York, decided they would take advantage of the opportunity to visit the Senate of this country, their great, strong, and friendly ally in this war, with whose sons they had so often fought and bivouacked on the fields of France. There were some Canadian officers with them. I can appreciate their feeling of disappointment as they heard from this eloquent Senator words that breathed distrust and hatred against them and their mother country. I was particularly struck by the expression of sadness which I saw on the face of each one as they departed after listening to this speech, though none said a word. The Senator in that speech said he would deprecate any Anglo-Saxon misunderstanding, and yet he would kick this great Anglo-Saxon self-governing Canada out of this league because in a dispute between Belgium and Germany, or between Italy and Austria, this neighbor of ours and our good Australian friend would have a vote on what the truth of those facts in dispute might be. He would not have any Anglo-Saxon misunderstanding, but he would have Australia out of this league as unfit to associate in the assembly with Hejaz, with black Liberia, or blacker Haiti, with effervescent Guatemala, or discordant Honduras.

Now, do you want to give Canada a place anywhere in this league? Do you believe that by her sacrifices she has earned a right to sit in the assembly with Uruguay or Haiti? If you do, then let her have that voice in the assembly. Let her have it upon questions in which neither Canada nor Great Britain is a party. Let her have it on the only question that can really be decided, so far as disputes are concerned, the question of what the facts are in any given dispute, a question that binds no one, but the decision of which appeals only to the conscience of the people of any country.

Give her, whose blood commingled in unstinted stream with her allies on every battle field of Europe, whose soldiers fought and bled and died side by side with our brave American boys, this slight honor. In the name of the brave and the true of all nations who fought the battle for human rights, in the name of the noble dead and the wounded and bleeding survivors of this awful conflict, let us accord to Canada what France and Belgium, the graveyards of her heroic sons, have accorded her—a confidence in her integrity and sense of justice and a place of honor among the nations of the world that dared to die to save that world from military slavery.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BALL in the chair). Does the Senator from Montana rise to make a request? The Chair had promised to recognize the Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK].

Mr. McCORMICK. I do not desire to prevent the Senator from Montana addressing the Senate at this time, if he so desires.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I am in the same frame of mind with reference to the Senator from Illinois. I have no desire to claim any precedence at all. I am very glad to yield to the Senator from Illinois if he desires to address the Senate.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, I had intended to speak very briefly upon the resolution which I introduced during the morning hour and upon no other phase of the general question before the Senate, but I do not feel that I can allow the remarks of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] to pass without comment.

It is an unhappy circumstance of this debate that Senators find it necessary to impute bad faith to those who differ from them; to insinuate that they are wittingly misrepresenting facts; to challenge, by innuendo, the patriotism which has animated Senators of the United States through the long years. When last he spoke, the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], whose amendment the Senator from North Dakota has discussed this afternoon, expressly disclaimed for himself and for others who are supporting his amendment any desire to withdraw from Canada the vote accorded her under the terms of the covenant or to deny to the other self-governing dominions of the British Empire or even to deny India the votes which the covenant bestows upon them. As I recall his speech, the Senator from California asserted then that what he sought through this amendment was not the denial of votes to any of the component parts of the British Empire, but an equal vote for the United States, which has twice the self-governing population of the British Empire.

The Senator from North Dakota has ascribed to the supporters of this amendment not only the desire to deny Canada and the other self-governing dominions a vote in the assembly of the league, but has categorically denied that there was any possibility of Canada or any other of the dominions being represented in the council of the league. If that be true, why the letter addressed to Sir Robert Borden? If that be true, why should the Prime Minister of Great Britain, the president of the council of France, and the President of the United States join in an unequivocal assertion to the contrary? Surely the Senator from North Dakota does not ascribe to the three signers of the letter addressed to Sir Robert Borden any want of intellectual integrity or any intention to deceive the Canadian Parliament in order that it might be induced to ratify the covenant. The letter itself, if one may judge from the debate in the Canadian House of Commons, was obviously a part of the negotiation which led to the inclusion of the dominions and of India as voting powers in the assembly of the league. It was to make manifest to the parliaments of the dominions that they came in on a legal or constitutional equality with other members of the assembly; that they were represented not by voices only but by equal votes and enjoyed equal rights.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President——

Mr. McCORMICK. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. MOSES. I should like to ask the Senator if the question has not obviously been discussed and disposed of in the course of the genesis of the covenant of the league as presented to us by reason of the fact that in the earlier draft proposed for the covenant of the league the representatives of the constituent nations were to be the diplomatic representatives of those nations, accredited to a certain unnamed capital? It being apparent that Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, and India had no diplomatic representatives, and therefore could not have representation in the league under that basis, the entire structure of the league as originally proposed was changed in order to give these dominions, colonies, and parts of the Empire a clear and unequivocal representation in the league, with the ultimate privilege, as pointed out in the letter of the big three to Sir Robert Borden, of seats in the council itself.

Mr. McCORMICK. The Senator from New Hampshire, if he will permit me to say so, merely adds evidence to evidence which is already conclusive on that point. Nobody would deny Canada a vote. There is no one here who belittles her splendid sacrifices, nor is there anyone here who belittles the great and splendid part in the war played by Great Britain when during the long years, while she awaited the coming of the conquering legions from overseas, she held the bloody breach. Never in her greatest days was England greater than she was during the long agony of this war; but, Mr. President, I do not think that any proponent of the covenant as it stands or that even any among those who believe that the British Empire should have six votes to one for the United States would hold that the measure of sacrifice, actual or relative, should be the gauge of representation, whether in the assembly or the council of the league.

It would be invidious to draw comparisons in this regard, but among those who first made sacrifice upon the altar of liberty and those who spent most liberally of their treasure and their blood France ranks as chief, and yet nowhere have Frenchmen ever asserted that on that score France should enjoy a primacy in the league.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President——

Mr. McCORMICK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. MOSES. May I ask the Senator if it is not a fact that others of the nations constituting the league have colonies or dependencies quite as much entitled to representation as the British dependency of India? Is it not a fact that, upon the basis of Indian representation in the assembly of the league, the French, if they saw fit to do so, could quite as well demand representation for their African and Asian dependencies, and Belgium also for her African colonies?

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, the Senator's question is opportune at this moment. In connection with the remark of the Senator from North Dakota that no one save Senators of the United States has challenged the disproportionate representation of the British Empire in the league, Sir Robert Borden, who is a credible witness, remarked during the course of the debate in the Canadian House of Commons that the representatives of every great power had challenged the proposal that the dominions of the British Empire be represented in the league. If he is to be believed, the representatives of the United States, then, as well as those of the other powers, challenged the very representation which now they support upon the stump and in the Senate of the United States.

The Senator from New Hampshire, who, like myself, has followed the debates in the French Chamber through the Journal Officiel of the French Chamber of Deputies, will bear me out when I say that not once but repeatedly critics of the treaty in the French Chamber have based their criticisms, in part, upon that disproportionate representation.

M. Angagnew, in a speech which might be characterized as bitter, argued that French colonies no less than those of Britain deserved representation in the assembly if British dominions and dependencies were there to be represented.

M. Franklin-Bouillon, who is known to many Senators, who himself is a graduate of an English university, and who is the chairman of the committee on foreign relations in the French Chamber, has twice spoken against the treaty on the score of the representation of the British dominions and the Empire of India in the assembly of the league.

It is the habit of men when they are engaged in debate, and especially when they are supporting a cause which hitherto they have opposed in principle, to become more royalist than the king. In this case they are prone to be, as a distinguished British editor has pointed out, more English than the English themselves.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President——

Mr. McCORMICK. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. MOSES. I hope the Senator will not pass from his interesting discussion of the debate in the French Chamber without permitting me to call attention to the fact that the French critics of the treaty in regard to the disproportionate representation of the French Republic and the British Empire felt constrained not to press that criticism to the point of textual amendment of the instrument because they hesitated to add further irritation to a strained situation between the French and British, already well-nigh to the breaking point, growing out of incidents connected with the publication of the British-Persian agreement, and that it was only because they hesitated to see themselves flying in the face of their allies that they desisted.

Mr. McCORMICK. Oh, no; the Senator is not quite accurate on that point. They forbore to press textual amendments because, under the French constitution, the Parliament is forbidden to amend a treaty.

Mr. MOSES. Ah, yes, Mr. President——

Mr. McCORMICK. If you please, during the debate their criticism was restrained in view of the bitterness engendered by the treaty. They substituted for amendments resolutions, of which more will be heard during the debate in the Senate.

Mr. MOSES. Yes, Mr. President; but that particular resolution was not pressed at the moment in the French Chamber because of the situation which I have described.

Mr. McCORMICK. I think that is true.

I was saying, Mr. President, when the Senator from New Hampshire interrupted me, that in the course of this debate Senators have become more royalist than kings and more English than the English themselves. The most conspicuous supporter of the league covenant in England, who has not held office under the coalition government, is A. G. Gardiner, until recently editor of the London Daily News, which is the foremost of the so-called "cocoa" press in London, widely read, and as influential as any of the organs of liberalism in England—the most powerful, perhaps, of the British liberal organs.

Great Britain—

doesn't want any loaded dice; the British Empire is a unit, one and indivisible.

Admitting—

And I now quote the correspondent—that the present draft of the league of nations covenant gave the Empire a preponderance of votes in the assembly, A. G. Gardiner, editor of the London Daily News, advocated to-day an amendment—

Not a reservation, but an amendment—

stipulating expressely that when one section of the British Empire is involved in a matter all other sections be prevented from voting.

"If asked to accept such an amendment, I am sure the British people willingly would do so," Gardiner said.

"The spirit of the covenant certainly contemplates the British Empire as a unit. But it fails to specify this, probably, because the omission never came to the attention of the peace conferees. Now that the issue has been raised, however, it will not be difficult to make the wording conform to the spirit and to eliminate America's cause for fear. Perhaps the wording could be changed without resubmitting the covenant to the nations concerned if Great Britain, as the interested party, would request the change."

Here, Mr. President, the English are purposing to do in our behalf what Senators shrink from doing in the service of the United States.

Mr. Gardiner continues:

"Although the intention of the conferees obviously was not to give the British Empire more votes than the United States, the text of the covenant justifies Senator REED'S assertion. He believes that in case of a dispute between the United States and one section of the Empire, the other sections would be sitting in judgment on the matter. Personally, I think it is debatable how much the scales would be loaded.

It is conceivable that Canada's or South Africa's interests might be opposed to those of the Empire, or even allied with America's. But I readily understand the American concern in the matter and recognize it as a real objection which should be met. Perhaps the best way would be to insert a ruling in the covenant specifically covering this exigency."

Mr. President, unless the grounds for differences in the covenant, in the treaty, or in diplomatic negotiations and instruments which have been consummated contemporaneously with the treaty be debated now and with candor we shall enter the league, if enter we do, threatened from the beginning with bitter controversies.

The dice, some of the parties to the covenant will feel, are loaded. It is, perhaps, one of the penalties of intimate association between powers that acrimonious disputes should arise which do not arise between powers whose relations are few and are simple. It is for that reason that many of us shrink from entering into intimate bonds with the old powers, whose European interests have engendered recurring animosities and recurring wars for generations.

If I have ventured to quote so distinguished a supporter of the league as Mr. Gardiner, so unwavering and so unqualified a supporter of the President as is Mr. Gardiner, on the matter of equal representation of the great powers in the assembly of the league, it is because Mr. Gardiner's position demonstrates what happily may prove true in the future as in the present—that when differences arise between countries candid, courageous, and fair-minded men will speak out, wherever they may be found. At present public opinion in Europe is aroused over the Anglo-Persian treaty in a degree——

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

Mr. McCORMICK. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. Before the Senator leaves this discussion of inequality of voting, I want to ask him whether he thinks the best remedy for this inequality is to increase the number of votes of the United States?

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin knows, of course, that I am opposed to the terms of the covenant as they stand; but if the covenant is to remain a political instrument I am inclined to believe that that is the better remedy.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator, then, tell me how, in his opinion, an increase in the number of votes of the United States would protect the United States in any matter in which she was vitally interested? If the Senator will permit me to give him an illustration——

Mr. McCORMICK. I was going to ask the Senator from Wisconsin to elaborate his point.

Mr. LENROOT. If the vote of the United States is increased to six in a given case, and we should have a dispute with some member other than Great Britain—because there is another amendment which takes care of that—what difference could it make to the United States in that dispute whether it had one vote or a hundred? None of them could be utilized in any case in which she was a party to a dispute.

Mr. McCORMICK. I think the Senator from Wisconsin means to ask me if I believe that the addition of five to the number of votes of the United States would be protection enough. I do not.

Mr. LENROOT. In any case where we were a party to a dispute we would have no vote at all, whether one or five.

Mr. McCORMICK. Precisely. I was saying, Mr. President, that I had ventured to quote the former editor of the London Daily News in this connection, because I believed that one of the promises of better relations between the powers lies in the increasing readiness of candid and courageous and fair-minded men to speak out upon these differences.

The Anglo-Persian treaty has provoked more bitterness and more discussion in Europe than it has in the United States. It has engendered a sharp difference of opinion in England, no less than in France. During a recent debate in the Senate upon the relation of Persia to the British Empire under the proposed covenant, and under the treaty consummated between Persia and the British Empire, allusion was made to the disclaimers on the part of the British Government, disclaimers of any intent to impose a protectorate upon Persia or to establish one by negotiation. In order that there may be no assumption, on the part of those who defend the British course more unequivocally than do the British themselves, that I for one seek to impute to the British Government a dishonorable motive, or to the British people an all-conquering lust of territory, I want to read, in part, Lord Curzon's statement. It is the more interesting because of his long study and long experience in Egypt, in the Levant, and in India, where he served as viceroy. Speaking of Persia and the establishment of a protectorate over Persia, Lord Curzon says:

On the contrary, she would have resented and resisted it. I should have been opposed to it because it would have been contrary to our repeated engagements, and, in the last resort, because I should have regarded it as inimical to British interests.

We have, or shall have, as a result of this war, enough to do in the eastern parts of the world. If a nation assumes a protectorate, it also assumes certain responsibilities which have a tendency to attain the weight of a heavy burden. Above all, it is compelled to give financial assistance on a scale which may ultimately be overwhelming. Therefore, neither I nor my colleagues would have consented to or acquiesced in anything like the creation of a British protectorate over Persia.

Mr. Cecil Harmsworth, under secretary for foreign affairs, in the House of Commons spoke as follows:

The policy of His Majesty's Government is to assist Persia to reestablish herself on a sound basis. There is not the slightest foundation for a suspicion that the Government proposed, or that the Persian Government would have consented, to create anything in the nature of a protectorate.

Before I advert to similar disclaimers in the past I beg leave to read from current comment in the British press. The British Manchester Guardian, which in the north of England is the fellow of the London Daily News, says:

If these things had been done by any other power, we should say that they amounted to a veiled protectorate.

The Daily News, presumably under its new editor, bitterly dissents from the disavowal of the Government, saying:

Our record up to the present in this matter is anything but creditable. We have committed ourself to an agreement with France incompatible with any genuine belief in the efficacy of the league. We have concluded an agreement with Persia constituting an open mockery of the principles that the league embodies. We have announced a scheme for the preference for mandate territories no less incompatible with the spirit underlying the whole covenant.

The London Post, which represents the opposite pole of British political opinion, speaks in the same vein.

I have here the English Review for September of this year:

The first test—

Of the new era among peoples, says the editor—

is the petty controversy between France and Britain over the small division of the spoils that has its "spiritual home" or material oil fields in Persia. There we have at least neutral territory. Persia did not come within the zone of war, but Persia is to come within the settlement, and so for £2,000,000, invested at the comfortable return of 7 per cent, we are to guarantee Persian integrity and self-determination. Those who remember the Persian delegation knocking at the door of the "big three" at Paris must indeed smile when they read of this accord so profiteeringly yet happily arranged "on the spot," far from the importunities of the league of nations, for though to the general public the deal may signify little, to those who have oil shares it means much, and to the diplomatists of the old secret school it is a master stroke. Persia is settled. We assume responsibility. Persia enters the British imperial orbit.

The trouble is France, for the French are logical, and, looking at Persia, they not unnaturally ask where they come in, seeing that oil is good business and Persia occupies a highly important strategic position, the railways for which they, at any rate, would like to control or contract for pari passu.

I said a few moments ago that I quoted Mr. Harmsworth and Lord Curzon in order that none of the supporters of the Anglo-Persian treaty in the Senate might attribute to me the assumption that the British Government was not speaking in good faith.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. McCORMICK. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, of course I am very much interested in the exposition the Senator is giving of the action of Great Britain with reference to the negotiation of the Persian treaty; and it is also interesting to know the views of the liberal press in Great Britain relative to the action of their Government; but this is the question I am about to propound to the Senator—and I do not do it with any purpose to be offensive——

Mr. McCORMICK. Although that may be the consequence.

Mr. KING. What does the Senator suggest should be done by this Government? How are we, in the view of the Senator, to interpose ourselves to prevent the execution of the terms of that treaty? If Persia is satisfied, is the Senator from Illinois dissatisfied with the treaty; and if so, is it the purpose of the Senator from Illinois to suggest that our Government should intervene and try to set aside the treaty and interpose itself or the league of nations to bring Great Britain and Persia within the league of nations as a subject of review?

Mr. McCORMICK. In the language of Francis, answering that other incomparable philosopher and parliamentarian, the friend of Sir John Falstaff, I say "Anon." I will touch upon that point later. But let me ask if the Senator has read the text of the resolution which I introduced this morning?

Mr. KING. I heard it read this morning from the desk.

Mr. McCORMICK. The Senator doubtless has noted in the press that the State Department has made representations to the British Government on the score that the Anglo-Persian treaty was not in consonance with the negotiations which have been so happily consummated at Paris.

Mr. KING. I recall that the newspapers published something respecting the attitude which the State Department had taken, and yet I was curious to know upon what theory the State Department of our Government was interposing and was calling to account either Persia or Great Britain for the negotiation of a treaty which seems, so far as I can ascertain, to be quite satisfactory to both England and Persia.

Mr. McCORMICK. I am not less curious than the Senator from Utah as to the terms which our State Department addressed to the British Government. Perhaps he may be more successful than other Senators have been, and perhaps than I shall be, in eliciting those terms.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. McCORMICK. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I think perhaps I can shed some light on the question in answer to the inquiry of the Senator from Utah. The covenant of the league of nations provides that any treaty contrary to its provisions, and in violation of its spirit, shall be void; and consequently the United States, if the existing treaty should be adopted and the league of nations become effective, would be entirely within its rights in calling the attention of Great Britain to the fact that the Persian treaty was in violation of the covenant. But if it were not for the present treaty, as a matter of course the United States would be guilty of questionable propriety in making any suggestion of the kind. I take it, therefore, that the Senator from Illinois, who protests so vigorously against the Anglo-Persian treaty, is quite pleased that the Government of the United States has this opportunity to call attention to the inconsistency between it and the present treaty.

Mr. McCORMICK. I have said to the Senator from Utah, "Anon." I will say to the Senator from Montana—

> There are more things in heaven and earth, Horatio,
> Than are dreamt of in your philosophy.

But I wish to dwell upon the aspects of the Persian treaty as they were discussed here upon the floor the other day in connection with the guaranties under article 10.

When the Senator from Utah interrupted, I had referred to the statements of Lord Curzon and Mr. Cecil Harmsworth, and I wish to recall at this time that thirty-odd years ago similar statements were made by Lord Granville and Lord Dufferin, and more notably by Lord Salisbury and Mr. Gladstone, in connection with a like situation. British troops were in occupation of Egypt, as they were quartered in Persia at the time the recent treaty was negotiated. An anomalous diplomatic relation, a sort of irregular political intimacy, had been established between the Egyptian and British Governments, as now one has been established between the Persian and British Governments. Mr. Gladstone remarked at the time that occupation prolonged would be an annexation.

> We are against it—

Said he—that is, against annexation—

> on the ground of the specific and solemn pledges given to the world in the most solemn manner and under the most critical circumstances—pledges which have earned for us the confidence of Europe at large during the course of difficult and delicate operations, and which, if one pledge can be more sacred and solemn than another, special sacredness in this case binds us to observe.

It was Lord Salisbury who retorted in the House of Lords to the suggestion that the occupation should become permanent, that a protectorate should be established or that Egypt should be annexed to the Empire—

> My noble friend pays an insufficient regard to the sanctity of the obligations which the Government of the Queen have undertaken and by which they are bound to abide.

In Egypt, as in Persia, the British entered into political relations and economic relations with the native Government, to assure the payment of the Egyptian bonded debt, to restore and establish order, to advance the economic interests of the country, to insure its development.

Senators will recall that French opinion at the time was restive, as it was at intervals, until ultimately, when Commander Marchand crossed the Sahara and arrived at Eashoda, France and Britain were at swords' points. There was engendered an animosity and a tension as great as that which preceded the outbreak of the Great War, greater than that which followed the Agadir incident by far. It was only relieved when France renounced the explorer's title to the countries discovered by Marchand.

There were British advisers appointed, as British advisers are to be appointed in Persia, to the vast material benefit of Egypt; advisers in the administration of the railway; in irrigation; in agriculture; advisers civil and advisers military. British capital was sought to encourage the economic development of the country. The material development of Egypt under Lord Cromer is a monument to the administrative genius of Britain and to the impartial justice meted out under the heavy hand of the occupying power. Egypt blossomed like a garden, enjoyed a peace and a prosperity unequaled since the time of the Ptolemies, prospered until during the war cotton lands at the mouth of the Nile Delta rose to a value of something like $2,000 an acre. The fellaheen were glutted with profits, assured by their support of the Allies as well as by the peace and the order established by Britain. Then there was given to the world as a panacea the self-determination of peoples, prescribed ad libitum, with equal doses for all, no matter whether or not their stomachs were habituated to democracy and representative institutions. Egypt, witnessing self-determination in the Hedjaz and wherever else the addition of a machine gun to the breechclout made possible the vindication of that doctrine, decided for self-determination, too.

I do not argue that Egypt was ready, but Egypt thought so and attempted to assert its sovereign right. The league has denied the sovereignty of the Egyptian people, and, in cynical contradiction of our course in Costa Rica, for example, our administration, recognized the right of Britain to nominate the sovereign head of the Egyptian government. The British protectorate over Egypt was recognized by this Government and then by the peace treaty to which the powers have become signatory.

I have made this long excursion to show what very well may be in store for Persia. Civil and military advisers are to be appointed, moneys are to be advanced, government is to be organized, all by the greatest of colonizing powers, which has carried civilization further afield than any power since Rome. The spokesmen for that great power have disclaimed any intention to infringe the sovereignty of Persia. Oh, I have heard it said that Persia agreed to the terms of the new treaty. So did Egypt. I hear it said that Persia will vastly benefit by the occupation. I dare say; I do not doubt it; but the secretary of the Persian delegation in Paris, from whom the negotiation of the treaty and its consummation were privy, protested at length, even though the foreign minister, who signed the treaty in Teheran, defended it. I do not believe that anyone will argue that the treaty came into being under conditions which made for the free choice of Persia, nor will any British statesman argue that there was no selfish impulse on the part of Britain in the negotiation of the treaty. It makes for the security of Persia's northern frontier. It completes the "sanitary cordon" to the south of Russia. It supplies the missing link in the chain which is to bind Calcutta to Cairo, and links India with the other all-red route from Cairo to the Cape.

Now, the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], who is worn with long waiting for my answer to his question, has gone, and must read to-morrow, if he will, what I have to say on the point.

Great lawyers will assert that Persian sovereignty is unimpaired. I dare say so. Also unimpaired is the sovereignty of Haiti, which is fast in the grip of 1,100 American marines, while the Haitien President never moves within or without his palace unless accompanied by his body guard, a gunner's sergeant of the Marine Corps.

If any of those who are interested in the Anglo-Persian situation have followed the financial columns of the British press they will have noted certain consolidations of oil interests. The Royal Dutch and Shell have consummated a union and are seeking capital in the United States, where the great international bankers have an interest purely altruistic in article 10 of the league. The smaller Scottish oil companies are being united in one corporation, which is to become the Scottish selling agent of the Anglo-Persian Oil Co., which is going to bring together the oil interests of the Persian Gulf and the Burmese-Siamese Peninsula. We need not take too seriously the London gossip that the British Government's support of the Anglo-Persian Oil Co. was one of the precipitant causes of the war; but here are material interests, obviously of enormous importance in the current development of oil, growing up in Persia precisely as they did in Egypt. Whatever the technical situation of Persia, however intact may be its sovereignty, de jure de facto, we have Britain already exploiting to the advantage of mankind the Persian oil fields and making ready to supply fuel for the development of Mesopotamia. We have here the establishment of tremendous material interests, the safeguarding of which, the public supervision of which, will be in fact the charge of the stronger party to the Anglo-Persian treaty. The usufruct will belong to that power.

It was said during the debate to which I have alluded that, under article 10, we would not be guaranteeing Persia to the British Empire. We would, however, be guaranteeing the status quo in which Persia finds herself under the treaty. I see the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] nodding denial of the statement, and I shall be interested to hear his argument on that point.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. McCORMICK. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I had not intended to say anything at all upon that subject, but I am quite ready to express my views about the matter very briefly, although they were so clearly expressed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] the other day that I can not conceive that there can be very much doubt about the views entertained on this side of the Chamber.

The question was presented whether Great Britain could call upon the United States, under the provisions of article 10, to protect her in her occupancy of Persia. The Senator from Nebraska clearly pointed out that the treaty provides—whether that is hypocritical or otherwise—that Persia remains a sovereign country, and consequently Great Britain could not possibly claim that any war would be calculated to deprive her of independence or territorial sovereignty if it were directed in any wise against Persia.

Mr. McCORMICK. Yes, Mr. President, and the Persian minister of foreign affairs, coifed with an astrakhan fez, robed in a single-breasted frock coat, with Shah orders on his bosom, will act upon the advice of a blonde gentleman in a pith helmet and cotton suit, and invite the guaranty of Persian territory by American troops if it should be invaded by a power which could not be repelled by the force organized by Britain under the treaty. If this treaty were as innocent as its face, why were the negotiations conducted in secret? Why were they conducted privy from the Persian delegation at the Paris peace conference?

There are material objections to the covenant and to the treaty, but I think there are none greater than the dark circumstances which environed the negotiation of the treaty of peace and of the Anglo-Persian treaty. Nothing can militate more against the success of the ambassadors of good will everywhere, whether they be accredited diplomatic agents or merely travelers; nothing can do more to negative the mission of the greatest and most distinguished of all ambassadors, Lord Grey, accredited to this Government by Great Britain, than the secrecy in which the Persian treaty and the treaty of peace have been negotiated.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, on Friday last the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] undertook to call the attention of the Senate to what he conceived to be an inconsistency between the interpretation given to article 10 of the covenant for the league of nations by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT] and that which had been previously given it by myself. This was quite in keeping with a very noticeable effort to point out what are alleged to be ambiguities and uncertainties in this document as a justification either for rejecting the entire treaty or for the introduction of amendments or reservations. Often these ambiguities and uncertainties are magnified where doubt exists and oftentimes created where none can possibly arise. In that connection the Senator called attention to my attitude upon the significance of article 10 as recorded in the RECORD. I am quoted as saying, and quite correctly:

> Under the first sentence of article 10, I repeat, our obligation is absolute and perfect whenever a war of aggression is made against any other member of the league.

And again:

> I assert that whenever this country is in any manner called upon, or it is suggested that its obligation under article 10 has arisen, the Congress of the United States determines whether the condition set out under article 10 exists, namely, whether the territorial integrity and existing political independence of another member of the league is threatened by aggression. If it is, then it is the duty of the United States, under this treaty, to do whatever is reasonably necessary upon its part to prevent that threat from being accomplished.

I followed with some degree of care, Mr. President, the exceedingly able address of the Senator from Delaware as it was being delivered in the Senate, and I was not able then to perceive, nor am I able now to recognize, any inconsistency whatever between the position taken by him at that time and my own position as expressed in the brief extract from my remarks just quoted. The Senator from Delaware, among other things, said:

> These considerations therefore prompt me to take the view that, considered in the light of the whole covenant and its purposes, several action on the initiative of the respective nations in keeping article 10 is in nowise contemplated. In other words, whatever is done or suggested to be done in keeping the obligations of article 10 is to be the result of the common judgment of the council, arrived at after joint deliberation.

And again:

> Therefore it seems clear to me that when the external aggression has been committed by one nation in violation of the provisions of article 10, no duty rests on any member of the league to immediately rush to the defense of the aggrieved nation; that the council, in considering the case, can only give advice, in which case still there is no duty upon any particular nation to follow the advice.

The Senator from Delaware was meeting, and very successfully, the idea, to inculcate which no little effort has been made, that the real obligation of this whole article rested upon the United States. The article in question, article 10, is continually discussed as though the obligation thereof rested upon the United States alone; that whenever war broke out in any quarter of the globe, however remote, the duty fell upon the United States, as the general policeman of the whole world, to go there and quell the disturbance. It is never even suggested that the same obligation rests upon every other nation which is a member of the league; but the United States is obligated no more than any other nation here.

Mr. President, there is not the slightest doubt in the world that whenever a war of aggression is actually precipitated or threatened, all the nations of the earth—at least, those who are members of the league; and the council, being in session, will be the appropriate body to represent them—will confer together in relation to the means by which the obligation shall be carried out according to the provisions of the second sentence of the article; so that, while the obligation rests upon the United States, and rests upon every other member of the league, in all reasonable probability no one will take action with reference to the matter until after the council considers the matter and outlines a procedure by which the disturbance is to be quelled and the aggressor is restrained in his criminal designs.

Why, Mr. President, when we went into this war we did not start off on our own account, outlining a plan of campaign, devising a system under which we, independent from all the other nations involved in the contest upon our side, were going to undertake to suppress Germany or overcome her pretensions. We simply went in with the other nations; we conferred with them by our proper representatives; we had our representative upon the general war council sitting in Paris; and concerted action was taken. Of course, that is the model for the procedure that will occur under article 10; and undoubtedly this country, as well as every other country bound by the obligation, will await the advice which is given by the council.

But, Mr. President, it must be borne in mind that the council acts only by unanimity. It starts in with nine members. Those may increase from time to time. Now, I do not think it can be fairly argued that if the offending nation is able to secure the adherence of only one member of the nine, so that there can not be any unanimous decision, thereby it will be able to paralyze and destroy the effect of article 10.

For instance, Mr. President, the capacity of Germany for intrigue has been sufficiently demonstrated. She starts a war of aggression against some neighboring country—Poland, for instance. I do not think anybody can reasonably contend that if Germany is only able to get one nation out of the nine represented upon the council to disagree to the plan that is proposed by the other eight, she will thus escape the risk she runs under the provisions of article 10, nor that thereby all the nations of the earth will be exonerated from their obligation thereunder. I scarcely believe that anyone who feels that there is any force or efficacy whatever to article 10 will make that contention; but if there be any such, Mr. President, he must then confess that article 10 thunders in the index but is woefully silent in the body of the book, because it is not at all improbable that there will be disagreement with respect to one; and how easily a purpose to aid the aggressive nation in its purpose could be concealed under a mere disagreement to the plan of action that is proposed by the other eight members of the council. If that is the case, the other members are not released from their obligations, to my mind at least, in any degree whatever; but the obligation still rests upon them to repress, so far as they can, the nation which has broken the common peace by uniting, if they can, outside of the provisions of article 10, pursuing a concerted plan other than that which was proposed in the league, but which was not assented to.

In that view, Mr. President, I do not conceive that there is the slightest difference of opinion between the Senator from Delaware and myself. In other words, I agree fully with the Senator from Delaware that that would be the course that would be pursued; but I can not agree that no obligation rests upon any member of the league under the provisions of article 10 provided you can not get a unanimous action of the council.

The Senator from Wisconsin then asks, if the Senator from Delaware entertains the view concerning the significance of article 10 which he, the Senator from Wisconsin, attributes to him, why he, the Senator from Delaware, should object to a reservation which would expressly so state; and then he adds, if the construction given to the article by the Senator from Montana is correct, how any nation should ever bind itself to such an obligation. I have no means of knowing just exactly what answer the Senator from Delaware would make to the inquiry addressed to him by the Senator from Wisconsin. He is here, I observe, and will undoubtedly be able fully to satisfy the Senator from Wisconsin; but if the question were addressed to me, if I had the same idea of it that the Senator from Wisconsin seems to think the Senator from Delaware has, I would say to the Senator from Wisconsin that I should object to a reservation so stating, and I should object to a reservation so stating for the sole reason that if you attach any such reservation to your ratification, Germany is not bound by her signature or her act of ratifying the treaty. In other words, if you attach any such reservation to your resolution of ratification, you put Germany, so far as the United States is concerned, in exactly the position that these two countries would occupy with relation to each other if, immediately upon the cessation of hostilities, every soldier except the few that are there now were withdrawn from German territory. You put us in the same situation that we would be in if we had no means of compelling Germany to sign the treaty on the 11th day of November, 1918. You put us in exactly the position we would be in if we had recalled every soldier forthwith to this country, even before the armistice was signed.

It is true that, by reason of the commanding position which the United States now holds as the center of the financial world, we can exercise commercial pressure upon Germany which may possibly compel the acceptance of such a reservation, or of other reservations; but, Mr. President, every advantage which we secure by reason of our military triumph over Germany has gone to the winds.

I do not see how any Senator who really attends to the fundamental legal principles can take the view that a change may be effected in part 1, constituting the covenant of the league of nations, without the assent of Germany. It seems to be conceded that the assent of the other signatories to the treaty, at least of those who become members of the league, is necessary either if any substantial change is made in the text or if any substantial addition is made to the resolution of ratification, either by way of reservation or proviso or amendment. But it is said that the consent of Germany to such changes is not necessary because Germany is not a member of the league. I pointed out the other day, however, that many provisions of the treaty of the most vital concern to Germany introduce the league of nations and the council of the league of nations. The council of the league of nations determines a vast number of questions in which Germany is interested. Consequently she is interested in the constitution of the assembly as well as the constitution of the council; and any amendments or changes that in any manner interfere with the constitution of either of these bodies, or with the powers they exercise, is a matter of the greatest concern to Germany.

Mr. LENROOT rose.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the Senator will pardon me for just a minute, after Germany has signed this treaty or ratified it she then becomes bound by every provision, and she has consented that the covenant may be modified without her consent; but on fundamental principles she is not bound either by her signature or by her ratification, so far as we are concerned, unless we sign and ratify.

Mr. President, this does not require any intimate acquaintance with the principles of international law. It addresses itself to the plain judgment of the ordinary business man. A has certain negotiations with B concerning some business matter. A sits down and writes out a contract and signs it and sends it to B, saying, "This, I believe, is the agreement which we entered into, at least as I understand it. I have signed it. I send it to you in duplicate. You sign it and return to me a duplicate with your signature, if you are satisfied." B, however, signs with certain reservations, and sends it back to A. A is not bound. He can say, "No; I shall not agree to the reservations you suggest, and I will not abide by the thing even as I proposed it to you in the first place." He can not even be held to his original proposition, and after A has signified his attitude with reference to the matter, B is too late to say. "Well, I will withdraw the reservations." His day of grace has gone.

So, Mr. President, if there were no other reason, and I were taking the attitude with respect to article 10 that is attributed to the Senator from Delaware, I would say, "No; I am satisfied that that is the meaning of article 10. I do not want to give Germany an opportunity to get out of the obligations which we forced her to accede to at the close of a successful war."

But, Mr. President, the Senator asks why any nation should ever care to obligate itself in that way if the interpretation given to the article by myself is the correct one. Speaking for myself, I am quite willing that the United States should obligate itself in that way, because I believe that by so obligating itself, together with all the other members of the league—bearing in mind that it is not the United States alone that is obligating itself, but all the members so obligating themselves—there will be no war until, indeed, the world is again divided into two hostile camps, neither of which will observe any obligation to the requirements of this covenant.

Why do I say so? Mr. President, it has been said before, but it will bear repeating, that that is exactly what the Monroe doctrine is. The United States published to all the world 100 years ago that if any nation should attack any Republic on the Western Hemisphere we would make war upon them. That has served to keep all Europe and all Asia from any act of aggressive warfare upon any Republic on this continent, and we never had to spend a dollar, nor did it cost us the life of a single American citizen.

What is the reason for doubting that, if we and every nation in Europe say that if any nation shall attempt to invade the sovereignty of another in aggressive warfare all the world will proceed to engage them? I referred some time ago to our treaty with Panama. We have asserted the Monroe doctrine by the treaty with Panama, by which we have guaranteed the territorial integrity and political independence of that State. No nation dare attack the Republic of Panama without hearing the screams of the eagle, and no nation will, Mr. President, on this continent or upon any other continent. It has preserved the peace of that country ever since. Colombia long since would have made war upon Panama did she not know that the moment she put her troops across the border, whether in a righteous war or in an unrighteous war, whether in a just war or in an unjust war, whether with provocation or without provocation, we would be there with all our power, all our military, all our financial resources, and all our resources in men. Thus there is not the slightest fear about anybody making war upon the Republic of Panama, whether on this continent or any other continent.

The other day the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] made a very impressive speech, and a very temperate one, in which he presented the case of Greece making war against Bulgaria over the boundary between those two countries, the outgrowth of the controversy over the division of Thrace. He called attention to the fact that there are 700,000 Greeks in this country, and to the provisions of article 16, as follows:

> Should any member of the league resort to war in disregard of its covenants under articles 12, 13, or 15, it shall ipso facto be deemed to have committed an act of war against all other members of the league, which hereby undertake immediately to subject it to the severance of all trade or financial relations, the prohibition of all intercourse between their nationals and the nationals of the covenant-breaking State, and the prevention of all financial, commercial, or personal intercourse between the nationals of the covenant-breaking State and the nationals of any other State, whether a member of the league or not.

He called attention to the fact that a most deplorable state of circumstances would arise here in this country if Greece, in view of these provisions, should make war upon Bulgaria. The Senator stated, in that connection, that it would be a violation of law for one to go into a Greek delicatessen store to buy a pound of cheese or into a Greek shoe-shining parlor to have his shoes shined. So it would. That would be exceedingly distressing to the 700,000 Greeks in this country. I suppose the probabilities are that there are at least three times 700,000 Greeks scattered all over the civilized world, in Great Britain and in her colonies, and in the States along the Mediterranean Sea; and in each one of those States every Greek would be subjected to exactly the same disadvantages and annoyances that the 700,000 Greeks would in this country. And yet it seems never to have occurred to the Senator from New York at all that the Government of Greece, realizing the plight in which it would place all of its nationals all over the world by going to war with Bulgaria, might be deterred from going to war against Bulgaria.

Moreover, Mr. President, when Greece recognizes that not only would her nationals be thus placed in peril in all the countries of the world, but she herself, by such an act, would bring down upon her possibly the military forces of all the world, not of the United States alone, but of Italy, France, Spain, Great Britain, Japan, Belgium, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, and of all the world, how can we conceive that Greece would go to war with Bulgaria over the dividing line? In all reasonable probability Greece would say, under those circumstances, "Well, the best we can do is to submit this controversy to the council of the league of nations, under the provisions of article 15, which are as follows:

"If there should arise between members of the league any dispute likely to lead to a rupture, which is not submitted to arbitration in accordance with article 13, the members of the league agree that they will submit the matter to the council."

That is the way Greece would act.

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], whose eloquence we all admire, according to the newspaper reports was applauded generously and vigorously at a meeting held at one of the churches in this city a short time ago, when he propounded to his listeners the question, "Suppose China should make war upon Japan to get back Shantung; would you be willing to send your sons over to Japan to help Japan beat off the Chinese?"

Mr. President, how could such a thing occur? China is no match for Japan as it is. They tried conclusions some 12 or 15 years ago and the contest did not last long. It would not be necessary now, nor at any time in the future that the mind can very readily conceive of, for Japan to call upon anyone for aid in beating off China.

But if she were impelled to call upon anyone, she would not only call upon the United States but she would call upon every other member of the league, and all would be called upon to respond—Brazil, Argentina, Peru, Great Britain, and all her colonies, Canada, Australia, France, and Italy. Nations never go to war unless there is some chance at least of emerging successfully. Nations do defend themselves against overwhelming odds, determined to do or to die, to preserve their liberties or to expire in the effort. But when it comes to waging aggressive war upon another nation, they never undertake it without a careful calculation of means and ends. How, under these circumstances, is China going to war with Japan? The thing is impossible, if article 10 is operative at all. In other words, if it calls upon us to rush, as it is expressed, to the aid of the country attacked, so it does all other nations of the earth. And then there is not going to be the war that a great many of the Senators apprehend.

I spoke of the Senator from Idaho, who expressed some considerable horror a few days ago at the view I then expressed that if an act of aggression actually exists, the Congress of the United States does not stop to inquire into the justice or the injustice, the right or the wrong, of the war, but goes to the aid of the country attacked. Mr. President, why should anybody entertain any sentiments of horror at such an idea? In the view of this covenant there are no righteous wars of aggression; there are no just wars of aggression. They are all wrong. Of course, I understand that many people do not agree with that. Apparently the Senator from Idaho entertains views somewhat similar to those, or at least related to those, expressed by Bernhardi, that wars are great public benefits, that they are the civilizers of the earth. Perhaps there was a time when there were some righteous wars. The crusades were preached as a matter of course to all the nations of the earth as holy wars, and I am not undertaking to say that they did not result in much benefit. But we have undertaken to propose a different plan in this covenant for settling the disputes that arise between nations.

Article 13 of the covenant provides:

The members of the league agree that whenever any dispute shall arise between them which they recognize to be suitable for submission to arbitration and which can not be satisfactorily settled by diplomacy, they will submit the whole subject matter to arbitration.

Article 15 provides:

If there should arise between members of the league any dispute likely to lead to a rupture, which is not submitted to arbitration in accordance with article 13, the members of the league agree that they will submit the matter to the council.

Article 16 provides:

Should any member of the league resort to war in disregard of its covenants under articles 12, 13, or 15, it shall ipso facto be deemed to have committed an act of war against all other members of the league.

Article 17 provides:

In the event of a dispute between a member of the league and a State which is not a member of the league, or between States not members of the league, the State or States not members of the league shall be invited to accept the obligations of membership in the league for the purposes of such dispute, upon such conditions as the council may deem just.

Thus, Mr. President, we offer a tribunal for settlement of these international disputes, without allowing them to be determined by the arbitrament of war.

When a nation violates its covenants under this league and makes war against a neighbor for the purpose of despoiling it of its territory or overturning the liberties of its people and its independence, we do not stop to inquire whether upon any theory of moral right or wrong the war is justifiable or unjustifiable, righteous or unrighteous. We say to them: "Submit your matters to the tribunal which has been constituted by the league."

When the Hatfields go out to shoot up the McCoys or the McCoys to shoot up the Hatfields, as the case may be, we do not stop to inquire whether the Hatfields deserve shooting or the McCoys deserve hanging. In all probability they do. Their crimes, perhaps, amply justify whatever punishment they get. We do not permit them to execute their own vengeance. We do not stop to inquire whether they have a righteous cause or an unrighteous cause, upon any theory of morals whatever. We seize the man or the body of men who break the general peace, and incarcerate them, and their acts are regarded as murder. If the McCoys have any criticism to make of the Hatfields, if they have suffered any wrongs at their hands, the courts are open to them.

Just a word more, Mr. President. There has been some criticism of article 10 made by the eminent statesman, formerly a Member of this body, Mr. Elihu Root. He advises that article 10 ought to be stricken from the covenant, because, he said, there are many different races in this country, our citizenship is made up of men with European connections, descendants of Europeans, and the question would always be presented as to whether the war was a righteous one or an unrighteous one, and those dissensions would spring up among our people.

I agree that if you have reposed in Congress the power to determine whether the war is a righteous war or an unrighteous war, a just war or an unjust war, those differences will crop out.

Of course, if Germany invades Poland every German in this country, or at least a very considerable number of Germans, will be sure that it is a righteous war and consequently would endeavor by every artifice, by every persuasion that they can command, to have Congress so determine and not enter into the controversy under article 10. Of course, if France desires to prosecute a war against Germany all those of French descent, or at least a very considerable number of them, will be naturally predisposed to regard the war as a righteous one and thus induce Congress to withdraw.

Mr. President, we are not called upon to enter into that question at all. If it is the fact of aggression that fixes our liability, as I insist it does, then it is utterly immaterial, and then all these supposed differences and strifes and contentions among our own people will disappear, when once we adhere to the proposition that all these wars are wrong and that the proper solution of international troubles and disputes is in accordance with the other provisions of the covenant.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, with reference to the argument the Senator from Montana has just made, we need not call up an imaginary case as to what the obligation of the United States would be under article 10, if the treaty should be ratified without reservations relieving us of that obligation. Let us take this case which is present to-day. Suppose the Fiume controversy shall be settled in such way as is dictated by the United States. Suppose that controversy is settled against the claim of Italy, and agreed to by the other parties to the conference because the United States says that it must settle it this way. Suppose Italy some time in the future, strong and powerful, begins a war of aggression to get back Fiume. Is it not entirely possible that the other nations will say, "The United States committed this; let the United States defend with her men the boundaries of Jugo-Slavia," and it will be the appeal from the country upon whom aggression is made that will come to us, and if we remain a self-respecting Nation, pretending to keep pledges that we have made, we will keep our obligation exactly as the Senator from Montana says article 10 should be construed. So it is not an imaginary case in any degree. If the treaty is to be ratified with the obligations of article 10 remaining as they are, it is well within the probabilities that within 12 months we will be called upon to fulfill our obligations under article 10, with our khaki-clad boys crossing the seas to die.

So much for that, Mr. President.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But let me ask the Senator why he reaches the conclusion that every other nation will not accept and fulfill the same obligation?

Mr. LENROOT. I stated that if the controversy should be settled according to the dictation of the United States, and it looks to-day as if it might be, the other countries being willing to settle it upon a different basis, if the United States dictates the boundaries the other nations are very likely to say to the United States, "The nation that dictated these boundaries must defend them."

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the Senator believes Great Britain or France would endeavor to escape every obligation on such a flimsy pretext as that, as a matter of course, there is no basis for a league at all.

Mr. LENROOT. Perhaps the Senator may have a higher opinion of the honor of those nations, but after what happened with reference to Shantung I should think even the Senator from Montana would be somewhat skeptical.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I merely desire to say that I am not one of those who believe that in every controversy the United States will be actuated by high and holy motives and every other country by the reverse.

Mr. LENROOT. I shall not pursue that further, but I do want very briefly to refer to another matter before I get to the Senator's reply to a statement that I made the other evening.

The Senator from Montana has repeatedly said that no amendment to the league of nations covenant, or part 1 of the treaty, can be made without its being assented to by Germany.

Mr. President, I have been opposed to amendments to other portions of the treaty, and whether I shall oppose any amendments to the league of nations portion of the treaty will depend upon the merits of the proposition, but I shall not oppose them for the reason that I have opposed other amendments, because amendments can be made to the league of nations portion of the covenant irrespective of any assent or dissent upon the part of Germany.

Let us see if that is not true. This treaty becomes effective, so far as Germany is concerned, whenever three of the principal allied and associated powers have ratified it. That is to say, the treaty will be effective, so far as Germany is concerned, when it is ratified by the British Empire, by France, and by Japan.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Will not the Senator concede that it will be effective only between Germany and those countries?

Mr. LENROOT. I will come to that if the Senator will just have a little patience. The treaty becomes effective as to those three nations when ratified by them, and I think we will all concede that before this body votes upon final ratification of the treaty it will have been ratified by those three great powers and will be effective. Then when it is ratified by those three great powers the league of nations comes into being, consisting of such members as have ratified the treaty or have accepted the invitation to become members of the league, so that when France, the British Empire, and Japan have ratified the treaty the league of nations will consist of the representatives of those three powers, assuming that none others have ratified it, and those three powers, under Germany's agreement in the treaty, can rewrite and amend the league of nations covenant in any way that they see fit. They might rewrite the entire covenant and Germany could not for a moment object, because Germany has agreed that any amendment that may be made to the league covenant will be accepted by her so long as they are made by those who subscribe to the league. Inasmuch as the reservations in the resolution of ratification that will be proposed will, I assume, require that those reservations be assented to by three of the principal powers. those three powers, before our ratification becomes effective, can themselves amend the league, making it read word for word as we desire to have it read.

Has Germany anything to say about it? Can Germany complain or object if our resolution of ratification is in the exact language of the league covenant as the league covenant stands at the time our ratification is deposited? Why, of course not. There can be no doubt about it, unless the Senator takes the position that the league of nations does not come into being until all the nations recited in the preamble as members of it have ratified it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course, the Senator does not take any such position.

Mr. LENROOT. I supposed not.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But this is a treaty. We become a member of the league by virtue of the treaty which we make with Germany and we can not be a member of the league if we refuse to sign the treaty with Germany.

Mr. LENROOT. Let us see then. Suppose to-day the treaty is ratified by three of the principal powers——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let me ask the Senator, suppose the United States absolutely rejects the treaty, is it the contention of the Senator from Wisconsin that under those circumstances the United States could sit as a member of the council and pass upon German questions or German interests?

Mr. LENROOT. Of course not. We can not sit as a member of the council unless we go into the league in the way provided in the treaty. That is very plain. But suppose that to-day three of the principal nations have ratified the treaty, that the treaty was to-day effective as between those nations and Germany, and to-morrow those nations should amend the league covenant, does the Senator from Montana say that we could not make a treaty of peace with Germany unless we ratified that covenant in the form that it was before it was amended, and if that be so that we could not get into the league of nations because when we amend it it is not the covenant that we entered into? The Senator can take either horn of the dilemma that he chooses.

There can not be any doubt about it, Mr. President. Germany's assent is not required, provided those nations that have ratified before we ratify desire to have us in the league, because they can amend the treaty, Germany has specifically agreed that they may amend the covenant in any way they see fit, and if they see fit to amend it in the way we want to have it amended, Germany has no right to complain.

One word more. The Senator, if I understood him correctly—and it does not seem possible that I could have understood him correctly—said that he saw no inconsistency between his position as to the construction of article 10 and the position of the Senator from Delaware. Why, Mr. President, the only difference between these two distinguished lawyers—and I wish to repeat what I said on Friday, that they are two of the ablest and most distinguished lawyers in this body—is that one of them says that here is a several obligation binding upon the United States; that the only inquiry that the United States can make is whether there has been unlawful external aggression, and if there has been, it is our duty to protect the nation invaded to the full extent and with all the power we have. That is the position of the Senator from Montana, while the position of the Senator from Delaware is simply that there is no obligation of any kind. He says that there is no individual obligation upon the part of the United States. The Senator from Montana says there is. The Senator from Delaware says that the only obligation is to consider the advice of the council, and that we are under no obligation to follow that advice. Mr. President, the positions of the Senator from Montana and the Senator from Delaware are as far apart as the poles; and yet the Senator from Montana would ask the Senate to ratify a treaty as to which upon the most vital matter that has ever confronted the United States in any treaty he and his colleague, the Senator from Delaware, give entirely different constructions.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate, as in legislative session, adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, October 7, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, October 6, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, fountain of light and life and love, we realize our weakness, the foibles of human nature, and come to Thee at the beginning of the new week which stretches before us with its opportunities and possibilities; that we may drink deep of the fountain, receive new light to guide us, new life to sustain us and larger love, that it may go out in sympathy to our fellow-men in all the conditions and circumstances of life; that Thy kingdom may come in all our hearts and Thy will be done and our work be of the highest order. Under the leadership of the world's great Redeemer. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday was read and approved.

STRIKING CERTAIN MATTER FROM THE RECORD.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday last the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], who had apparently spent a pretty bad night, found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a poem by Israel Zangwill, inserted by me. If he had looked in the RECORD on pages 6194, 6195, 6196, he would have found three pages by Zangwill, also inserted in another body.

The gentleman from Massachusetts had been away on a trip in the far West and, I thought, had returned full of joviality and good spirits; but, lo and behold! he seizes the first opportunity to demonstrate his ability as a statesman by moving in my absence to expunge the poem. I do not deny for a moment that he could have exercised his privilege to do so; but, lo and behold! some other gentlemen also participated in the discussion. If they are satisfied and contented with the kind of record they made after they read it, I am.

On Saturday last the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SEARS] rose on the floor of the House and made inquiry about the same matter. That gentleman, with his statesmanlike ability, two years ago on the floor of this House said:

Briefly I want to call my colleague's attention to the fact that the high cost of living is getting higher, the price of clothing is increasing, the price of groceries continues to soar, and flour will soon pass the high-water mark established of approximately $15 per barrel. I trust the day is not far distant when the able statesmen upon the floor of this House will give their best thought and lend their best efforts in working out some relief.

More than two years have run away and the gentleman from Florida, notwithstanding his wisdom and his statesmanship, has produced no bill, has produced no resolution, has produced nothing to reduce the cost of living. But he rose on Saturday and asked why action had not been taken to strike out the poem.

In the same speech appears the following:

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SEARS. I refuse to yield to the gentleman or any other gentleman. Fickle fate has indeed been unkind, Mr. Chairman, when it selected the distinguished gentleman from California to lead the fight for Prussianism. I have read of the oppression of his people, and as an American citizen my heart has gone out to them, and it ill befits that gentleman to try to place upon my people, and now his people, the militarism that will, in my opinion, be harder on them than any his people have ever been subjected to.

These people to whom he refers left in France 3,100 of their best who lie buried over there. It ill becomes any man on the floor of this House, or any other place, to deride or ridicule either the Irish people or those of Jewish faith.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in order that I may relieve the minds of these gentlemen, big and broad-minded, in order that they may be able to rest in peace over night and carefully repose during the daytime, I ask unanimous consent that the poem may be omitted from the permanent RECORD. The newspapers of the country have discussed it editorially and given it a wider circulation than could ever be possible to obtain through the RECORD. The poem is not in cold storage, as some of my friends here think it is, but it has gone down in the history of the world much further than some actions and deeds of these gentlemen, small as they are. As the years roll away perhaps they will be contented with the record, but I think their consciences will eventually lead them to regret.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the poem he has inserted in the RECORD be omitted from the permanent RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, upon what topic?

Mr. HEFLIN. In regard to an election held in Alabama, replying to a statement in the Post.

Mr. WALSH. Is it a statement reflecting on the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. HEFLIN. It misstates the facts about a campaign that I participated in, and I want to correct it.

Mr. WALSH. I object.

The SPEAKER. To-day being the first Monday in the month, it is for the consideration of bills on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent. The Clerk will report the first bill on the calendar.

ADJUSTMENT OF DISPUTES ARISING FROM FAULTY SURVEYS IN FLORIDA.

The first bill on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 55) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to adjust disputes or claims by entrymen, selectors, grantees, and patentees of the United States against the United States and between each other, arising from faulty surveys in townships 36, 37, and 38 south, ranges 29 and 30 east, Tallahassee meridian, in the State of Florida.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to equitably adjust disputes and claims by entrymen, selectors, grantees, and patentees of the United States, their heirs or assigns, against the United States and between each other, arising from faulty surveys in townships 36, 37, and 38 south, ranges 29 and 30 east, Tallahassee meridian, in the State of Florida, the said surveys having been shown to have been faulty by the resurvey of certain lands in said townships, and for this purpose the said Secretary is authorized to accept conveyances from and grant patents to any such entrymen, selectors, grantees, patentees, their heirs or assigns, of any of the lands of the United States in the said townships open to entry or settlement which, in the judgment or discretion of said Secretary, it shall be just and equitable to grant or convey to such parties or any of them, to make up any deficiency or loss sustained by any such parties by reason of such faulty surveys, or by the meander lines, location, or existence of lakes or other bodies of water, not shown or incorrectly shown by such original faulty surveys of the United States in said townships, to the end that such entrymen, selectors, grantees, patentees, their heirs or assigns, may be duly vested with the title to such part of the lands of the United States as shall be necessary or proper to make up any deficiency in acreage or loss, as far as possible, due to such faulty survey, as shown by the resurvey of the said townships, preserving to the owners who have lands shown by the former faulty surveys to be actually bounded by lakes or other bodies of water, as far as practicable, the right to have patented to them the lands shown by such new resurveys to lie between their holdings and such lakes or bodies of water: Provided, That in the said adjustment no greater area shall be patented to any claimant than that which is surrendered by him or of which he is deprived by the fact that, under the corrected survey, the area to which title, derived from the United States, is now asserted by the entryman, selector, grantee, patentee, his heirs or assigns, is found to have no existence in fact, or to be covered by water and to have been so covered at the time of the faulty survey: Provided further, That nothing herein shall be construed as authorizing the Secretary of the Interior in the said settlement to patent to any entryman, selector, grantee, or patentee, or his heirs or assigns an area which, when added to the area retained by the said entryman, selector, grantee, patentee, or his heirs or assigns, shall give a larger acreage than that originally entered or thought to be acquired from the United States, or any grantee of the United States.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the gentleman from Florida [Mr. DRANE] if he agrees with the contention of the Secretary of the Interior that section 3 of this bill is unnecessary and whether it is expected that that would be eliminated.

Mr. DRANE. Mr. Speaker, in reply to the gentleman, I would state that at the time I introduced the twin measure, it being introduced simultaneously in the House and in the Senate, I was perfectly willing that that section should be stricken out. When my bill came up for consideration before the Committee on the Public Lands, it was found that the Senate bill was also pending there, having passed the Senate, and that it contained section 3, which it had originally been suggested should be stricken out. I presume the Senate committee left it in there so as to make assurance doubly sure. It does not hurt the bill and it does not make any difference whether it stays in or not.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman state when these original surveys were made, and just how they came to get into this mix up?

Mr. DRANE. The history of that survey in Florida is this: In the late fifties surveys were made of certain public lands in the country in which I have since lived, which at that time contained almost no people at all, except a few of the remnants of the Indian fighters. The survey was made under contract. The contract, as I have been told, was to be paid for at so much per mile. The probabilities are that there was no survey made there at all. I am told in the Land Department that it was simply a pretense at a survey; that it was so faulty as to appear fraudulent upon its face. Be that as it may, a lot of innocent people went in there and established themselves, made their homes and raised their orange groves there, and were not disturbed in their possession until probably within the past two or three years. Within the past two or three years that land, which was supposed in the old days to have had no value, has been penetrated by railroads. It is now rapidly settling up and is of great value.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DRANE. Yes.

Mr. HICKS. Was this survey made by Government surveyors or by private people?

Mr. DRANE. It was made by the Government.

Mr. HICKS. It says in the report that in places that the original monuments are impossible of identification.

Mr. DRANE. A few of them are shown, but none are, in the opinion of the Land Department, absolutely dependable.

Mr. HICKS. Is it the fact that there have been monuments, or were there none established at all?

Mr. DRANE. There were a few established in one or two places, but it seems were never completely located and a reliable survey completed.

Mr. HICKS. What harm is being done at the present time? Is it the fact that the different landowners can not identify their parcels of land?

Mr. DRANE. If the House will indulge me for a few moments, I will read from the report of the Secretary of the Interior as made to the chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands. He makes it very much clearer than I can make it.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. DRANE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DRANE. Under date of June 12, 1919, the Secretary of the Interior wrote to Mr. SINNOTT, chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands, in part, as follows:

In reporting upon this proposed legislation I am advised by the Commissioner of the General Land Office that the matter of the resurvey of the above-named townships was initiated in January, 1916, by formal application submitted by the settlers and interested landowners. The petition contains the following caption:

"We hereby bind ourselves to fully cooperate in the effort that is now being made to get the United States Land Office to order a resurvey and relocation or retracement of township, range, and section lines in the township above mentioned, and others, if there be such as known to be in error."

The application was supported by certain maps, field notes, and exhibits submitted by the applicants as evidence both of the conditions then existing and of the necessity for resurvey.

After consideration of the data presented, and after conference with the proponents of the resurvey, the Commissioner of the General Land Office reached the conclusion that no general resurvey of the townships in question was necessary or desirable, particularly on account of the fact that the interest retained in the premises by the United States appeared to be so small as to render the petition inadmissible under the departmental ruling of May 22, 1909.

It appeared, however, that the obliteration of the evidences of the original survey was so general as to preclude the possibility of restorations by local surveyors, and that there was considerable confusion and uncertainty as to the boundary lines which the settlers, entrymen, and owners were unable to overcome. Under the circumstances the commissioner was disposed to grant whatever relief could properly be offered short of a general resurvey, and was of the opinion that inasmuch as practically all of the individual entries and unpatented lands were confined to a highly restricted area, the execution of a corrective survey limited to the western portions of townships 36, 37, and 38 south, range 30 east, would be sufficient to clear the situation and accomplish the purpose of the applicants. No action appeared to be necessary in townships 36, 37, and 38 south, range 29 east.

A field examination was accordingly authorized and it was developed that only a small portion of the monuments of the original surveys could be identified with any degree of certainty, sufficient in number, however, and bearing a satisfactory relation to one another to afford a satisfactory control for the reestablishment of the lines of the original surveys.

It was shown by the applicants for the resurvey and by the examiner who made the preliminary investigation that very large discrepancies existed in townships 36 and 37 south, range 30 east, with respect to the position of numerous lakes which exist in these townships. The original township plats show several lakes, but these lakes were not represented in their correct position—i. e., the lakes are located in a different position from that represented on the approved township plats, and with different sinuosities of the shore lines. There are also numerous lakes in these townships which are not represented on the original township plats. The information before the department indicated that much of the doubt and confusion of the settlers in regard to the true position of their boundary lines was due to the discrepancies in the position of the lake areas in these townships. The resurvey of certain lines and boundaries in which the Government has an interest in the proper location of public lands, was, therefore, authorized by the department on December 11, 1916. Such resurvey has been made, and it shows conclusively that the old survey was erroneous in certain details, particularly with reference to the location and identification of numerous lakes in this region, such lakes being in some instances entirely omitted from the original plats, and in other cases not correctly located.

This condition complicated the resurvey, but in no measure disqualifies the identification of the position of the original section lines. Careful technical examination of the resurvey demonstrates that only one position can result from the control based upon the best available evidences of the original survey to be found upon the ground.

A condition developed by the resurvey heretofore made is that an extension of the resurvey to include adjoining areas will probably disclose additional areas of unsurveyed public land, and likewise show that areas disposed of as land will prove to be lake, or that areas shown on the original plats as lake will be found to be land. It is this condition that has led to the introduction of this bill.

While the Land Department may, under existing law (2372 R. S.), by amendment of entries and patents, correct mistakes in descriptions to the end that the Government's patents shall convey the land intended to be entered, such law is hardly broad enough to cover what I understand is desired to be done here, namely, to authorize an exchange of the areas originally entered now found to be lake for vacant areas of public land. As the provisions of the bill appear to be entirely discretionary with the Land Department, I see no objections to it, and it may enable us to make equitable adjustments which might otherwise result in loss or damage by reason of these old erroneous surveys.

I do not think section 3 is necessary, and it best be omitted from the bill, for the President has ample authority under the act of June 25, 1910 (36 Stat., 847), as amended by the act of August 24, 1912 (37 Stat., 497), to make withdrawals in aid of legislation or for other purposes, and I have already submitted to the President a proposed Executive order for the temporary withdrawal of the areas that may be affected by this legislation until the adjustments contemplated may be brought about.

Cordially, yours,

FRANKLIN K. LANE, Secretary.

Mr. SINNOTT. Is not that the real trouble, that lakes were shown to be land and land shown to be lakes?

Mr. DRANE. And there were lakes which were shown in an imaginary way; that is, the sinuosities of the lakes were not shown. The whole thing, in brief, is this: The settlers and nonresident landowners in there are at loggerheads with each other. They are going into court, and there is very great confusion. There is no place for proper relief except through the Land Department. The Land Department says this bill will afford the proper relief.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. How much of this land is still in possession of the Federal Government?

Mr. DRANE. I could not tell, except this, that the report of the Secretary says that the amount of land in which the Government is interested is not large enough to make the resurvey of the whole country desirable, and therefore he suggests this as the remedy to save expense to the Government.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. If the Government is interested very little, in very few parcels of land, in fact has very little interest in the entire proposition, why should the Government be asked to do this and how will it in any way be binding upon those who have an interest in the matter?

Mr. DRANE. In this way: Whatever the faulty survey is, the fault was originally caused by a Government surveyor.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. But as far as my information extends, when the Federal Government has parted with its interest in lands it has thereafter nothing whatever to do with it, and the conflicting claims thereafter are private claims and must be settled by the respective contestants. If they can not settle they must go into the courts. After the Government has parted with its interest it washes its hands of the matter entirely. In my judgment the Government ought not to be asked to go to this expense. If it does and establishes new lines they will have no force whatever except as the individual owners down there may be willing to abide by the result of the Government survey.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Florida yield?

Mr. DRANE. Certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. What the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN] just stated is entirely true, and yet the fact remains that this is probably the only way in which these errors, discrepancies, and conflicts can be settled. This is one of the faulty surveys of years past with which people living in public-land States are familiar. Nobody knows just how those errors arose. They probably grew out of the fact that the surveyor who made the survey, knowing that the survey would never be checked in his time, did not run all of the lines. That has been true with regard to surveys in many parts of the West, and it may have been true in this survey in Florida. Some of the lines probably were never run except on paper. Those that were run may have been run so carelessly that they are probably valueless. Until we established the system of marking corners with metal monuments they were marked with monuments which were easily destroyed, quickly decayed, and after a few years could not be identified. Now, it is true that the Federal Government can not now make anything more than a retracement. The Federal Government can go in there and can declare what were the original corners. Upon the best evidence obtainable the retracement can be made which is binding unless it can be proven that the retracement is not accurate. But the Federal authorities have the right to retrace and to say where the old corners were, and to a certain extent that would settle the controversy, because ordinarily the private owner does not contest a retracement by the Federal Government, but in that event he must prove that the retracement is not accurate. But the retracement does not fully settle the situation because of the fact that the original survey was faulty, but people have so high a regard for Federal surveys they are much more inclined to accept the judgment of a Federal surveyor than that of the local surveyor.

The SPEAKER. The 10 minutes of the gentleman from Florida has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Florida be extended for five minutes.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Speaker, I ask that his time be extended for 10 minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, give the gentleman the five minutes, and if necessary he can be given more time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MONDELL. While these local readjustments are frequently impossible by surveys run by local surveyors and through suits in local courts to settle and readjust these matters, it has proven that it is frequently possible for the Federal Government by making a retracement to make a readjustment of lines that will be accepted by the people locally. That is particularly true where, in this particular case, it seems that a faulty survey left some areas, probably small, that do not seem to have been included in any of the tracts surveyed. So there is a little leeway, there is an opportunity to adjust by giving the man a small tract that may be in a hiatus between two lines, thus saving him from the loss that he would suffer by readjustment with his neighbor on the other side under suggestion of a Government surveyor. The plan proposed by this bill is a wise one, in my opinion. It is the only plan that I know of whereby a readjustment, an equitable readjustment, can be had without a long series of lawsuits.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Recognized unless it is disputed, proved unless disproved.

Mr. MONDELL. I understand, but the question is simply this: Here is a condition under which these people for years have been trying to settle their differences and have been unable to do it, and for reasons that are well known to men who have lived under similar conditions elsewhere. Here is a proposition of an equitable adjustment under Federal auspices that in all probability will settle all of these questions by agreement of the parties. It will cost Uncle Sam a few dollars, but the cost will be comparatively small.

Mr. DRANE. It is by petition, too.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. The gentleman says this is to be an adjustment under Federal auspices of a matter with which the Government has nothing to do and concerning which the Government has no authority. All over the public-land States differences have arisen, doubts have arisen as to where the lines are, and in no case does the Government go in and try to settle differences, because they arise between private owners, nor should it do so. The Government having parted with its title has quit entirely its supervision of and control over and makes no attempt to control these lands; and now to authorize the Federal Government to go in and mix in a private controversy I think is wrong in principle. It will invite such interference by the Federal Government in private quarrels all over this country. It seems to me to be wrong. The Government has no interest in the matter; the Government has no authority over it. Its finding and recommendation can be accepted or set aside by either interested party and at any time. The dispute continues, and the parties to it find themselves at last in a State court, where they belong. Why the Government should be asked to have anything to do with it I can not see.

Mr. MONDELL. Now, Mr. Speaker, what the gentleman from Michigan says would be of great force if it accurately stated the facts. We are doing this very thing in every public-land State in the Union, and we have been doing it for years. Twenty per cent of all the money appropriated for public-land purposes can be used for this sort of retracement, but in this particular case it so happened that the original survey left some lands in hiatus between surveyed lines, and there is a situation that can not be met——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent for five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MONDELL. There is a situation that can not be met by the ordinary methods of retracement and resurvey that are being carried on every day in the year. In Nebraska township after township has been retraced practically as proposed here. In my State many townships have been retraced. In Colorado vast areas have been retraced.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Congress made an appropriation of $50,000 to resurvey two entire townships in my State where there was not a soul left in them. Yet they were officially surveyed.

Mr. MONDELL. That sort of retracement and survey would apply in the case of these Florida lands, except that a condition rather unusual exists there, apparently, under which the old surveys did not seem to embrace all the area of water and land. And therefore legislation somewhat supplementing the legislation under which we make ordinary retracements and surveys is necessary. But the principle involved, the policy proposed, the work to be done, the ends sought, are what is being accomplished all over the Northwest every day of the year under retracement surveys.

Mr. DRANE. Now, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. OSBORNE. Will the gentleman permit an inquiry?

Mr. DRANE. I will.

Mr. OSBORNE. Is it not a fact that the original fault in this matter is the fault of the Government?

Mr. DRANE. That is right.

Mr. OSBORNE. And that the people are thrown into this confusion by reason of the fault of the Government employees, the surveyors, and is it not a fact that these mistakes do occur, as the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] has said, in every public-land State? Is it not a fact that it results in bloodshed and in all kinds of trouble, and that the cost to the Government in making these retracings is so insignificant in comparison with the good to be accomplished it is hardly worth while to be taken into account?

Mr. DRANE. That is true, and here is something else that should not be lost sight of, and that is that all the people interested have petitioned the Land Department agreeing to abide by the decision of that department. The Land Department feels that it has not the authority under the law to adjust these differences, though it is in sympathy with it.

Mr. SINNOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DRANE. Certainly.

Mr. SINNOTT. With reference to the interest of the Government, that is referred to in the first paragraph of the Secretary's letter on page 2. That was his opinion before the resurvey was made, the first preliminary resurvey; but in the third paragraph from the bottom of the Secretary's letter he states that a condition developed by the resurvey which showed that additional areas of unsurveyed public lands might be disclosed by the resurvey or the retracement referred to in this letter.

Mr. DRANE. It is believed the Government will find land that it did not know it owned.

Mr. SINNOTT. As to retracement, the Government does concern itself with land after it has parted title with it at the present time, but not after the first grantee from the Government has sold the land. So if there are any transfers from the original entrymen they would be shut out from the benefits of the retracement act referred to by the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. DRANE. Mr. Speaker, the matter has been very thoroughly covered by what these gentlemen have said, and I am going to submit three amendments——

The SPEAKER. To this paragraph?

Mr. DRANE. Yes, sir; to the first and subsequent paragraphs.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Has the right to consideration of the bill been given?

The SPEAKER. It is being read for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DRANE: Page 1, line 7, after the word "in," insert "township 29 south, range 28 east; also in."

Mr. DRANE. That simply adds township 29 to it; and I will simply say before doing this that I submitted it to the Secretary of the Interior and asked him, in view of his having indorsed the original bill, if he objected to this amendment; and I have a letter from him in which he states:

I am advised that lands in this township have recently been surveyed, and that the same condition of affairs exists with respect to lands there as regards those originally described in the bill. Such being the case, I have no objection to the amendment proposed by you, and believe it might be advisable to include them in the measure.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DRANE. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. Have the people residing in the township also joined in the petition?

Mr. DRANE. I can not say as to that. I do not know.

Mr. WALSH. You do not know whether they will agree to abide by it or not?

Mr. DRANE. As to township 29, I can not say.

Mr. WALSH. Well, it seems to me that unless we are sure of that——

Mr. DRANE. I may say that this bill is not mandatory on the department. It simply leaves it discretionary.

Mr. CANNON. I want to ask the gentleman one question.

Mr. DRANE. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. A has an improvement here on an entry that he claims to have made on lands that were surveyed, and on which he has put $50,000 of improvement or $5,000 of improvement. To-day they are litigating about it. B says, "No; you are on my land." Now, the Government retraces, we will say. That does not amount to anything provided that in litigation this $50,000 of improvements that A is in possession of is claimed by B. And then, I think the report shows that there is enough in that region or corner that has been established, where they could run from one township and range to another township and range and reestablish. Now, what would be the equities between A and B?

Mr. DRANE. You understand, sir, that that survey was made probably more than 50 years ago.

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. DRANE. A few of the old settlers went in there and raised their families and developed orange groves there. Now, a new generation has come on, and they are seeking to get in. They find another survey, and there is inexplicable confusion between Mr. A and Mr. B. There seems to be no other way in which to settle it. They appeal to the constituted authorities here in Washington. The authorities say, "We are willing to settle it, provided we have legislative authority." There is all there is in it.

Mr. CANNON. Precisely. But all of us who have grown up on the border understand that corners disappear. I know some litigation that lasted for years, and was fairly expensive, in the State of Illinois and also in the State of Indiana, about corners and ranges, but finally it was fought out and the title was settled. Would the Government be responsible if it makes this resurvey?

Mr. DRANE. No, sir. The bill provides that no man shall receive any more land than the Government originally intended to give him.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Florida has expired.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, in the Washington Post of yesterday reference was made to the election just held in the seventh Alabama district. The article that I refer to states that the election is still in doubt, and that the normal Democratic majority is about 4,000. Both of these statements are incorrect.

Mr. Speaker, death is no respecter of persons. He knows no difference between Democrats and Republicans, and whether they be in the private walks of life or Members of this august and honored body, sooner or later he visits them all. He invaded the ranks of our Alabama delegation a few weeks ago and took away an honored Member, Hon. John Lawson Burnett, one of the ablest and best Representatives that have sat in this body since I have been a Member. [Applause.] On the 30th day of September the district he represented so faithfully and well for 20 years was called upon to elect his successor. The Democrats in a primary nominated L. B. Rainey, an able and splendid young Democrat from Gadsden, the home city of Mr. Burnett. The Republicans nominated C. B. Kennamer. They did not do so, however, until two more prominent Republicans had been offered but declined the nomination. One of them stated that he was in favor of the league of nations. Both of these Republicans knew that the district that had just elected Mr. Burnett to represent that district in the Sixty-sixth Congress would be sure to elect a Democrat to fill out his unexpired term. While the Democratic majority in the district is not always as large as we would like for it to be, the district is safely Democratic, and can always be carried by a Democrat when we make a thorough canvass, as we did this time. Representative Burnett had been elected from that district by some rather small majorities. At one time his majority was 523 and at another time 133 and at one election his majority in the district was only 15 votes.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. At the time his majority was small is it not a fact that there was a county in his district that was 550 Republican, which was taken out after those elections?

Mr. HEFLIN. I do not know what the Republican majority was in that county, but it was small.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Is it not a further fact that another county was added to the district which was normally 150 Democratic?

Mr. HEFLIN. I do not know the exact majority; about 100, I should say.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Is it not a fact that Mr. Burnett's majority at the last election was over 1,300?

Mr. HEFLIN. Sometimes his majority was large and sometimes it was small. There are more Republicans in that district than there are in any other district in the State, but there are not enough of them to carry the district. The district is safely Democratic. I made 21 speeches in the district in the campaign just closed, and I enlightened the Republicans as best I could all over the district. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. If the district was safely Democratic, why was it necessary for the gentleman to make 21 speeches? [Laughter.]

Mr. HEFLIN. In order to arouse the Democrats to the importance of voting the Democratic ticket—to get out the Democratic vote. As I said at the outset, the Democratic majority is not very large in that district. The unrest produced by the World War and the misunderstanding of the league of nations produced by the speeches of Senator LODGE, Senator REED, and other Republicans [laughter], circulated over the district, confusing and misleading the people, had to be met, explained, and combated by us. Mr. Rainey, the Democratic nominee, declared for the league of nations and the Democratic administration, while Mr. Kennamer, the Republican candidate, declared against the league of nations and the administration. The official count gives Mr. Rainey a clear majority of 406 votes, and this is a clear victory for the league of nations and the Democratic administration. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have three minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. HEFLIN. Just for a question.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will ask if it is not a fact that the Democratic speakers, and also the Democratic press in that district, because of the fact that the sentiment was so largely against the league of nations, proclaimed throughout the district that the league of nations was not an issue; that it mattered not who was elected, because the House had nothing to do with the question of determining the league of nations; and did not the gentleman himself say that in his speech at Center on Saturday before the election?

Mr. HEFLIN. I did say that the House had no vote on the league of nations, and I also said that there was a good deal that the Representatives in the House would have to do if we kept our wholesome Democratic laws upon the statute books. [Applause.]

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Did not the Gadsden papers, for several days immediately before the election, warn the people not to be fooled about the league of nations, and did they not say that the league of nations was not the issue at all?

Mr. HEFLIN. Your candidate insisted that the league of nations was the issue, and that if he were elected it would go out to the world that the district was against it.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Please answer the question.

Mr. HEFLIN. And Rainey, our candidate, said, "I am for the league of nations and for the Democratic administration," and he was elected by 406 majority. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Did not the Gadsden papers, as I have stated repeatedly, say that the league of nations was not the question, and that that was a false issue, and not to be fooled by it?

Mr. HEFLIN. These papers stated, and correctly, that the Member elected would not have a vote on the ratification of the treaty. But the Republican candidate and his helpers all insisted that the league of nations was the issue. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] was down there and contributed to our success, as did Mr. FESS, of Ohio. [Laughter and applause.] A speech made in this House by Mr. FESS April 24, 1916, helped us with all right-thinking people in the seventh district. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I will print in the RECORD a telegram from Judge Herzberg, of Gadsden, giving the Democratic majority as disclosed by the official count of all the votes cast in the district:

GADSDEN, ALA., October 3, 1919—4.34 p. m.

Hon. J. THOS. HEFLIN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Official count, entire district, gives Rainey, Democrat, 406 majority.

L. L. HERZBERG.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Gentlemen of the House, the reference made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] to the late Congressman Burnett is one that we all appreciate and indorse. [Applause.] I looked upon him as one of the bravest of our Members, one of the clearest in his views, and one of the most amiable Members that it has been my pleasure to know since I have been in Congress.

Now, as to the election on the 30th. Prior to 1915 the seventh district of Alabama started on the extreme east of the State with Cherokee County, and ran across to the extreme west side of the State, including Franklin County, with eight counties altogether. The elections were uncomfortably close, as the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] has just mentioned. In 1915 the State was redistricted, and two counties, Franklin and Winston, strongly Republican, were lopped off, and the Democratic county of Blount was added to it, and with these changes the normal majority of the Democrats was between 3,000 and 3,600.

When this vacancy occurred in the House there was some concern as to whether there was any chance of a high-grade, clear-cut, aggressive campaign on the part of the Republicans. It was thought that there was some chance for breaking into the very heart of the solid Southland. I have reasons for believing that that situation is present and has been for some time. If you could eliminate certain prejudices the South would not remain solidly Democratic. There is not an intelligent Member on either side of the aisle who will not admit that, privately at least, if not publicly.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption?

Mr. FESS. I will.

Mr. BANKHEAD. What character of prejudices does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. FESS. Prejudices that grow largely out of the race question.

Mr. OLIVER. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. FESS. I will.

Mr. OLIVER. Does the gentleman know that the candidate of the Republicans in that contest condemned the appointment of negro lieutenants for negro troops by the President, and likewise condemned the appointment of a negro to act as special agent of the War Department in looking after the welfare of negro soldiers?

Mr. FESS. I am not aware of that. I am aware, however——

Mr. OLIVER. I will state that that is a fact. Is the gentleman further aware, when he speaks of a high-grade campaign, that the Republican candidate was strong in his opposition to tick eradication?

Mr. FESS. Republicans are not running campaigns on the issue of tick eradication.

Mr. OLIVER. That was one of the issues made by the Republican candidate, and my understanding is that the gentleman who now has the floor wrote letters to the seventh Alabama district indorsing the policies that the Republican candidate stood for.

Mr. FESS. I will state to my friend from Alabama who has just interrupted me that the Republicans do not conduct campaigns on the issue of tick eradication or any other issue that looks to the Federal Government to see how much money can be taken out of the Treasury. That is a thing that we object to—your pork-barrel methods. [Applause.]

In the second place, if our Democratic friends can take any encouragement from the result of this election, in which the official report says there is a majority of 406 for the Democratic candidate in a district which was redistricted in order to make it safely and solidly Democratic with a normal majority of from 3,000 to 3,600 cut down to 406, they are welcome to all the encouragement they can get from that. [Applause.] Let the Republicans, as well as the Democrats, note that five counties out of the seven were carried by the Republican candidate, including the Democratic county added in 1915, and but two counties out of the seven were carried by the Democratic candidate, and this upon an issue in which my name was used, as the gentleman from Alabama, our genial friend, Mr. HEFLIN, suggested, on a cheap basis of racial prejudice. If that sort of thing can go, it is only a question of the Democratic constituency and not a matter of intelligence, which has no permanent importance, and I will say to my Democratic friends, you may claim the Congressman, but we shall claim the victory; for if our Democratic friends in solidly Democratic communities can be made so impatient and uncertain that you have got to import the force of your committee and your Congressman into the district to hold it in order to hold your own seats on your own ash heap, the victory is ours and not yours. [Applause.] It is only a suggestion of what our friends may look for in the very near future.

Mr. HEFLIN. We will carry it by 2,000 majority next time.

Mr. CARAWAY. I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes on this subject.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. TOWNER). The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CARAWAY. I am always amused when our friend from Ohio, Dr. FESS, talks politics. He said a minute ago that if they could eliminate certain conditions they could break the solid South. I should like to tell him what those conditions are. Whenever they can banish intelligence down there, he may expect the solid South to go Republican. [Laughter.]

But until that happens the doctor is going to have to content himself, as he said he would, by letting us have the offices and he claim the victory. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] There is not any more use, seriously speaking, of talking about the South going Republican than there is to talk about the Republican Party growing patriotic on the question of the league of nations—not a bit. [Laughter.] If the gentleman can get any real consolation by claiming an empty victory, why, God bless his soul, he will be happy all his life. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] suggests that the Republican candidate in Alabama ran on his opposition to tick eradication, and the gentleman from Ohio says he wants it understood that the Republican Party is not a tick eradicator. [Laughter.] Well, you know there is considerable resemblance between the Republican Party and a cow that has not been dipped. [Laughter.] And, I take it, the same thing is the matter with both of them, and until they get rid of the tick we may have the kind of politics that the gentleman from Ohio says fills him with glory. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] a few moments ago asked Dr. FESS in regard to the character of the prejudice resorted to in this special campaign in Alabama. I desire to give him an example. When I arrived at Brimingham on my way to the district I was handed a paper, the Birmingham Ledger, or Herald, announcing my coming and giving the places where I was to speak. Among other things it stated that I was a carpetbagger [laughter]; that I was afflicted with what was known as Wilsonphobia; that I had come down there to drop poison; that I was there for the purpose of deluding the people; that they would resent any man from the North coming down there to tell them how to vote. That was a sample of the prejudice to which they resorted. When I arrived at the place of my first speaking, Cullman, I was met by a committee. I did not know but that it was a committee to carry out the spirit of the article to which I have just referred, but they turned out to be friends.

I was instructed as to the manner of procedure. I was informed that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] had spoken there the day before, and I was told something about his speech. It was suggested to me that there were three things that they would like to have me do: First, to give HEFLIN hell; second, to give Wilson hell, and especially to give the league of nations hell. [Laughter.] I declined the first proposition. I informed the audience the next day that they did not appreciate the gentleman from Alabama; that it was a demonstration of the old adage that a prophet is not without honor save in his own country; that he was easily the biggest man in the Alabama delegation, and you did not have to prove it, for he would admit it. [Laughter.] I also informed them that they did not appreciate his influence; that the gentleman was desirous of entering the war; that he was chafing like a war horse to get into the fray, and would have gone if it had not been for the urgent request of the President of the United States to remain here; that for him to go would deprive him, the President, of his mouthpiece in the House. [Laughter.]

I informed them that he was appreciated fully, however, by the President from the fact that when it came to selection of an Assistant Secretary of War during this trying period he went to Alabama to get him; that this Assistant Secretary came from the district of Mr. HEFLIN, and notwithstanding he was black as a coal he was nevertheless appointed Assistant Secretary of War. I told them that as another evidence of his influence that when the ship George Washington sailed across to the other side they were looking for some one to represent that section, and the gentleman from Alabama was again called upon to name that representative. The man he selected was as black as the ace of spades; but this did not matter to this great champion of the colored race. Therefore I declined to do what they wanted me to do in regard to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN].

That the league of nations was an issue down there there can be no manner of doubt. Although the speakers and the press in every issue were disclaiming the fact that the league of nations was the issue, the Gadsden Democratic paper came out every day and said it was a false issue and was done for the purpose of fooling the people; that no matter who was elected he would have no voice and nothing to say, and appealing to the fact that the letter sent by Dr. FESS, chairman of the congressional committee, for the people down in that section to vote for Kenneman was based on the fact that Kenneman had promised to vote for certain issues inimical to the South. The main appeal made by the gentleman from Alabama was that in the event that the treaty was ratified cotton automatically would go to 60 cents a pound. [Laughter.] I told the people that I expected he knew what he was talking about, and by that same token the boll weevil would be exterminated. Also, the cattle tick about which the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] had spoken, was an issue down there, and I assured them upon the same authority the cattle tick would be eradicated immediately upon the adoption of the league of nations, cotton would go to 60 cents a pound, and the cattle tick would turn up its toes, the roup in the chickens would disappear, and all other diseases of animals and men would be no more. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. HEFLIN. I stated that when Mr. LODGE started his fight on the league of nations cotton was 36 cents, and that at the time I was speaking it was 29 cents, and that if it was ratified it would go to 60. [Laughter.]

Here is what I said about the gentleman coming down there: I said that Mr. WOOD had made more bitter attacks on the South being in the saddle and attacking the President than any Republican I knew of, and that if Mr. SANDERS of Indiana or Mr. PURNELL or Mr. BLAND should be sent down there they would not be open to that kind of an attack, but that the man they had sent was open to that kind of an attack, and that was why we were attacking the gentleman—on the question of the solid South and the South being in the saddle, and the gentleman helped us very much.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Well, you ought to have given me a vote of thanks, and you did not do it anywhere. But, Mr. Speaker, in all seriousness, I wish to bear witness to the fact that in all my experience, in all the campaigns that I have ever had to do with, I never received at the hands of any people a warmer reception or more cordial welcome than I did from the Republicans in that community. I want to say as to the proposition, which comes in large measure from the other side, that the Republicans of the South are the scalawag Republicans, Republicans merely to get the plunder when we are in power, is a base slander, that it is not true in any sense of the word, and that the Republicans in the seventh district of Alabama are composed of the best citizens of Alabama, and if they have the courage to stand up and be knocked down year after year, as they have been doing, ever ready to fight for the principles of the Republican Party, gaining strength with each encounter, so that in this campaign it became necessary for the entire Alabama delegation, with one or two exceptions, to go to the rescue of one of their Democratic candidates, it augurs well, and demonstrates that there is still hope and that the light is breaking for a better day. [Applause.]

Mr. DRANE. Mr. Speaker, I think all this shows that I am a very good-natured man. I now move the adoption of my amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the said Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized to cause to be made such surveys or resurveys in said townships as may in his judgment be necessary in order to carry out the provisions of this act.

Mr. DRANE. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I have sent to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 21, after the word "in," insert "township 29 south, range 28 east, also in."

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I do not see the necessity for putting in "township 29" in section 2 when it has already been put in by the gentleman's amendment in section 1.

Mr. DRANE. It does not belong in section 2, I would state. It should be in section 3.

Mr. GARD. The gentleman offered the amendment, in line 21 of section 2 on page 3. Mr. Speaker, may we have the amendment again reported?

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment of the gentleman from Florida.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported Mr. DRANE'S amendment.

Mr. DRANE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw that amendment for the purpose of offering a perfecting amendment.

The SPEAKER. We are in the House now, and the gentleman has the right to withdraw it without unanimous consent.

Mr. DRANE. Mr. Speaker, the Secretary in his letter suggested the striking out of section 3 of the bill, stating it is not necessary, and I now move that section 3 be stricken out.

The SPEAKER. That can be done only after it has been read. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That from and after the date of the introduction of this bill the lands in townships 36, 37, and 38 south, ranges 29 and 30 east, Tallahassee meridian, shall be withdrawn from all settlement and entry and shall remain so withdrawn until the adjustments hereinbefore alluded to shall have been completed.

Mr. DRANE. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the section.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida moves to strike out the section. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. DRANE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. DRANE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the title be amended to conform to the text of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the title will be amended to conform to the text of the bill.

There was no objection.

By unanimous consent, Mr. DRANE was granted leave to extend and revise his remarks in the RECORD.

SCHOOL LANDS IN GOVERNMENT TOWN SITES ON RECLAMATION PROJECTS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 794) granting lands for school purposes in Government town sites on reclamation projects.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. HERNANDEZ] to state how many different districts there are in which it is necessary that some such withdrawal as this should be made.

Mr. HERNANDEZ. I do not know; there are several. There are 39 reclamation projects in which relief is sought by this bill.

Mr. WALSH. We ought to know how many before we passed a general law just to cover a few districts, particularly when you are asking to pass it by unanimous consent. This report does not give very much information.

Mr. HERNANDEZ. The Committee on the Public Lands makes but one amendment to the bill as it came from the Senate, on page 1, line 3, after the word "be," to insert the words "and he is."

Mr. WALSH. Well, unless——

Mr. MONDELL. Whose bill is this?

Mr. HERNANDEZ. This is Senator SMOOT'S bill.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. WALSH. I will yield.

Mr. MONDELL. I know of town sites on one reclamation project to which this legislation would apply, and while I have not had my attention called to the legislation I can readily understand how important it is. I can not see any possible objection to a general provision of this sort. There are not a great many Government-owned town sites on reclamation projects. There are a few, but on every one of them the question would necessarily arise as to the disposition of land for school purposes.

Mr. WALSH. Does not the gentleman think there should be some limit to the amount of undisposed land that can be used for that purpose rather than leave it to the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. MONDELL. I should imagine that it would be perfectly safe to leave the discretion with the Secretary and his officers for the reason that the gentleman knows that they are not going to be overliberal in a matter of this sort. It might be limited to a block to a school district, and that would not be excessive in a town which was growing. I should say, however, that it is pretty difficult for the Congress to determine whether this should be a block or a quarter of a block. I can not imagine any condition under which the grant to a school district would be excessive, and I think the tendency would be to be conservative and possibly not grant as much as ought to be granted.

Mr. WALSH. Well, does not the gentleman think that Congress would be warranted in placing a maximum? Now, if you do not, in some districts the Secretary in the exercise of his discretion might convey 40 acres of property and in another district it might be three.

Mr. MONDELL. I imagine that the most that would be granted in any case would be a block, or there might be a town site large enough to necessitate and warrant the passing of title to two tracts in the town site for school purposes, but that certainly would be the maximum for anyone to suggest or propose. But what I fear is that if we fix a maximum it will be rather in the direction of a larger area than would ordinarily be granted than otherwise. I imagine there can be no objection to a maximum of not to exceed a block, say, for any one school. There might be a town site in which several school sites were desired.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. In many town sites on reclamation projects, I wish to say to the gentleman from Massachusetts, the people are very poor, and it is very difficult for them to secure money enough to buy school sites. This legislation will have the tendency to build up the community. The Government donates land which is unappropriated and not desired for building purposes. The fact that it is undisposed of would indicate that nobody wants it, and it seems to me to be unfair to impose a tax upon those people, most of whom are poor, in these new towns, and require them to buy land for school purposes. It is all for the general welfare. Everyone in the town is benefited and the Government is not assuming any burden or responsibility.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, that is a stock argument of these people in these States, who are depending upon the Federal Treasury for everything they get.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. It does not cost the Government anything.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts allow me?

Mr. WALSH. I will.

Mr. MONDELL. As a matter of fact, it is not a grant of something that belongs to the Government to some one who has no interest. Now, let us see what happens. If these lands in the town site are sold they go to the credit of the project.

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. The people on the projects, all of them, get the benefit of the sums paid, whereas if they are granted to a school district the people of the school district—that is, of the town and of the adjacent country—have the benefit. It is simply a question of whether the people of an entire project, which might be 50 miles long, secure the benefits of the selling price of a block of land or the people of the school district, that is somewhat a smaller area, have the benefit of the tract for school purposes.

Mr. WALSH. What are those people doing on those tracts for school facilities now? There are some of them who have school facilities and school buildings?

Mr. MONDELL. I think in some cases the school district has purchased land. I should not be surprised if they purchased it at a rather nominal price.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts that it is sufficiently explicit when it says such lands as "are necessary for said district for school buildings and grounds."

Mr. WALSH. In the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. "Provided, That if any land so conveyed cease entirely to be used for school purposes the title thereto shall revert to and revest in the United States."

Mr. WALSH. But the Secretary of the Interior never passes any opinion upon it; it will be passed upon by some clerk down here or somebody in the office down here.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Suppose a canyon is to serve as a playground adjacent to where the building is located——

Mr. WALSH. A canyon?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. A canyon.

Mr. WALSH. We have got bills here where we are asked to give some land because they are afraid of falling into a canyon or canal.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], the State of culture, would not want to deprive the children on one of these projects of a little bit of land, which would amount to $5 or $10 or $15, possibly?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Can the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. HERNANDEZ] tell me how many reclamation projects there are now in his State?

Mr. HERNANDEZ. There are 39 in the United States.

Mr. LONGWORTH. How many in the gentleman's State?

Mr. HERNANDEZ. In my State there are two.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Is Government work being prosecuted on them now?

Mr. HERNANDEZ. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Is it continuously going on?

Mr. HERNANDEZ. One of the projects—the Carlsbad project—is finished now. That is being operated to great advantage and is very successful. The Rio Grande project is still unfinished so far as the canals are concerned.

Mr. WALSH. Would the gentleman from New Mexico have any objection to inserting in line 8, after the word "lands," the words "not exceeding five acres in area"?

Mr. HERNANDEZ. I would accept that amendment.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. If the gentleman will permit, in these days the tendency in the country is to make larger and more commodious grounds for school children to play in. Five acres is not large enough to play baseball on.

Mr. WALSH. If the gentleman will come to Massachusetts we will show him where they are teaching people to play baseball, and who will become famous in the game, upon sand lots of less than 1 acre in area.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Of course, your land is very valuable.

Mr. WALSH. The more valuable the land, the more valuable the player.

Mr. HICKS. Do I understand from the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] that you can not play a ball game on a 5-acre lot?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. That is not big enough. They can throw over that.

Mr. HICKS. You must have big ball players out in Colorado.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Well, the schools have to have accommodations, and they need buildings and outbuildings.

Mr. HICKS. These ball players that the gentleman refers to must be members of the Rocky Mountain League?

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman from Colorado in all seriousness believe it would be necessary in any of these reclamation projects to utilize more than 5 acres for school purposes?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Why, yes; and I will tell you why. Very often they have the children plan little gardens, and that is a part of the curriculum of the school. They ought to have them, and ought to be encouraged to have them.

Mr. WALSH. That is something that has not been offered here. I think I shall object to the consideration of this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts object?

Mr. WALSH. I withdraw it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is, Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. MONDELL. With the understanding that the committee accepts the amendment limiting the area to 5 acres.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there or is there not objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. MONDELL. It is proper for the House to understand what the attitude of the committee is in the matter.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. HERNANDEZ. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New Mexico asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be hereby authorized, upon application by the proper officers of a school district located wholly or in part within the boundaries of a project of the United States Reclamation Service, to issue patent conveying to such district such unappropriated undisposed of lands within any Government reclamation town site situated within such school district as, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior, are necessary for use by said district for school buildings and grounds: Provided, That if any land so conveyed cease entirely to be used for school purposes title thereto shall revert to and revest in the United States.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Page 1, line 3, after the word "be," insert the words "and he is."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend, on line 8, after the word "lands," by inserting the words "not exceeding 5 acres in area."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. WALSH: Page 1, line 8, after the word "lands," insert the words "not exceeding 5 acres in area."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I think I shall support the amendment, but I want to say a word in reference to the tendency of enlarging the space about school buildings. It used to be that about all there was to a school was the building, with a small inclosed space that was regarded a necessity for a playground, but within the last 10 years there has been a very pronounced change of sentiment, to the effect that all that there is in school work is not confined within a building, that much of it is outside of the building, and especially is that true since the drift has been toward vocational education. There has been a movement to increase the agricultural possibilities of scientific methods, and to-day in Ohio, as well as in most other States of the Union, there has been a very pronounced tendency to make agriculture a part of the educational work of the schools, and while land in this particular part of the country is not limited, and while there would be a tendency to not limit it in the bill, I shall vote to limit it to 5 acres. But I wanted to take the time to say that the larger land area is preferred to the smaller, as used to be the rule. I think the whole country realizes that intensive agriculture, as started through the school gardens, is one of the most pronounced advancements in education in the last decade.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield to my friend.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, this tendency to increase the area for play and agricultural pursuits is followed and can be seen in even crowded cities.

Mr. FESS. Very distinctively so. It has gotten to be so to-day that to leave a vacant lot in a city uncultivated is looked upon not only as a lack of interest but actual waste in making the most out of the educational facilities that go with the educational system. I know that in the cities, as much so as in the country, the school gardens requiring an enlarged space for school grounds have come to be distinctive demands.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I want to supplement what the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] has said. I think possibly I am responsible for enlarging this acreage for school purposes. As I recall it, at first only 1 acre was provided for for schoolhouse and grounds. I wanted it increased to 10 acres. We are building for the future and this bill applies to all the Government reclamation projects.

I do feel that we ought to encourage them and provide for large school sites. That land is now vacant and barren land, comparatively worthless, and we want to encourage the children to do gardening and field cropping, to carry on practical plant industry, and give them room to make it a practical subject of study; and it seems to me if they had 10 acres for every one of these country schools it would be splendidly well applied. I regret to see gentlemen suggest cutting it down. I feel that that really is a great mistake. If the gentleman will stop to think of the utilization which can be made of that extra land he will feel that he is really doing an injustice to the youth and welfare of all those communities in asking to limit it to just enough for a schoolhouse and the immediate necessary surroundings. Give the children enough ground for a playground and cropping grounds and gardens and a baseball field besides.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Washington moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I want also to call attention to what the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] and the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] have said, and to emphasize that same thing. The tendency at this time is decidedly in favor of obtaining land to be used for agricultural and demonstrational purposes in connection with schools, and this is especially important on irrigation projects. There are many people who move from localities that know nothing of irrigation, where the children know nothing of irrigation, and know nothing of intensive cultivation and development of the land, and it is the belief of the county agricultural agents and county superintendents in the irrigation States that there will be no better opportunity offered in those communities for teaching children the things they have to learn in order to bring about the highest development of these lands. When you have children in school they are assembled in mass, so that it should be left discretionary, and if it should seem advisable in any case to have a few more than 5 acres of land in order to teach this very thing that must be taught in order to bring the best development to that tract, it seems to me it would be highly advisable. I really believe it ought to be left discretionary, not as a matter of land granting for any community, but to bring the highest development to that community.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Would not the gentleman admit that it would be good policy, however, to limit the amount rather than to leave it unlimited?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. It is left optional with the Secretary.

Mr. FESS. I am rather of opinion that it is an unwise policy to proceed without any limitation at all.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I know that often we have to acquire as much as 5 or 10 acres. How do we know whether it should be 5 or 6 or 8 acres, or, in this particular instance, 3?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Years from now, when they want an additional playground, they will have to pay an enormous price for it, whereas the land now is not worth 15 cents.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. It is for the upbuilding of the farming community that I plead.

Mr. FESS. If the tendency is to run toward agricultural development, I should not object to the enlargement.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. It most certainly is in that direction.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I can not see any reason for any opposition on the part of any of these gentlemen to this measure, and particularly from both of these gentlemen who are members of the Committee on the Public Lands. This land is now undisposed of. Why is it undisposed of? Is it because it lacks value? And if it lacks value, how is it possible to establish a school there and cultivate valuable gardens upon it?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The chances are that the schoolhouse will be one of the very first buildings erected in a town site. When there are buildings constructed there and water is put on those projects that will be found useful.

Mr. WALSH. The danger of this bill is to pass it without any limit and to permit the Secretary of the Interior or some of his subordinates, upon representation made, to grant away 15 or 20 acres for school purposes on the pretext that the children are coming in there, and that they are going to get water on it, and they are going to have valuable school gardens. Well, the children out there will not make any more effort to cultivate valuable school gardens than they do in the States where the citizens from taxation raise money and buy land and build schoolhouses and do not have the opportunity to have the Federal Government turn over tracts, and it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that Congress ought to put a limit in all this legislation, as it has heretofore put a limit in other directions. The plea is that you should not limit the children. You would think that they were going to put up five or six story school buildings and have thousands of children upon these reclamation projects. The fact is, you will have very few of them.

Mr. BROOKS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. BROOKS of Illinois. Does not the gentleman know that in the West, as far east as Illinois, the children have to go 5 or 6 or 8 miles to school?

Mr. WALSH. Oh, you do not have to go as far West as that to find such a condition. In New England, too, the children sometimes have to go as far as 10 or 12 miles.

Mr. BROOKS of Illinois. Or, I should say, sometimes children have to go 15 miles.

Mr. WALSH. Well, say they go 15 miles.

Mr. BROOKS of Illinois. There should be farms for horses and gardens, so that the children can be taught agriculture. There is need for more than 5 or 6 acres where the land is cheap.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. It is not as a school garden, as such, to which I refer, but as an agricultural training station for the children who will go out here for miles and miles around, who have not had training for this sort of cultivation.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I should like to add, as to the concern expressed by some gentlemen of the enormous prices to be paid in the future for these lands in case 5 acres is not enough, that it is not very tenable, because I have been hearing lately from gentlemen interested to the effect that unless we appropriate now $50,000,000 immediately for reclamation, none of these reclaimed lands will be worth anything. There is now pending before the Committee on Ways and Means a bill to draw from the Treasury and transfer to the reclamation fund $50,000,000, on the ground that, as things are going now, none of these projects can be completed otherwise.

Mr. WALSH. I will direct the attention of the gentleman from Ohio to the fact that this land is for school buildings and grounds. Now, that does not mean for prairie gardens, to grow wheat and other enormous crops. It means for school grounds, the same as in any city.

Mr. LONGWORTH. But the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] said that this land was worth now only 15 cents, and that if we provided a limit of 5 acres, enormous sums would be required to buy the land in the near future.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. The figures regarding values are altogether speculative. It seems a wise provision to limit the number of acres. I think the limit of 5 acres is a little small, but nevertheless the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. HERNANDEZ] is not objecting to it. It is always wise to make such a provision, of course.

Mr. WALSH. I am very glad to hear the gentleman's views on that point.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Why not make it 6 acres? That will make a rectangle, and 5 acres will make an irregular piece of ground.

Mr. WALSH. I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment by striking out "5" and raising the limit to "6."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the modification.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the word "five" in the amendment and insert in lieu thereof the word "six."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, as modified.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. HERNANDEZ, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had further insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 8624) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel," approved August 10, 1917, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the further conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. GRONNA, Mr. NORRIS, and Mr. SMITH of Georgia as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

ZION NATIONAL PARK, UTAH.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 425) to establish the Zion National Park, in the State of Utah.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman from Utah [Mr. MAYS] state the necessary annual expenditure for the maintenance of this park?

Mr. MAYS. I think this park will probably require about the same expenditure as the Rocky Mountain National Park to start with, which was $10,000 per year.

Mr. WALSH. Will the expense increase the same as that of the Rocky Mountain National Park?

Mr. MAYS. It probably will increase as the park is more generally used. Sixty thousand people visited the Yellowstone last year. Of course, that park now costs a great deal.

Mr. WALSH. Will it require any extensive expenditures for roads within the reservation?

Mr. MAYS. The Government has already built the road through the main canyon.

Mr. WALSH. And the State has built some roads up to it?

Mr. MAYS. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Will it require any additional outlay in order to make it accessible to tourists?

Mr. MAYS. It is now accessible to tourists, and is being so used; but, of course, as the area visited is extended there may have to be some new roads.

Mr. WALSH. How far is this from the railroad?

Mr. MAYS. I think about 60 miles, is it not?

Mr. WELLING. About 60 miles from the present station of Lund on the Salt Lake route.

Mr. WALSH. I have no further questions.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this is public land, is it?

Mr. MAYS. All except about 80 acres, which are in private ownership.

Mr. BLANTON. How much public land is there in the park in addition to the 80 acres?

Mr. MAYS. Seventy-six thousand acres.

Mr. BLANTON. How much of that is land that is adapted to cultivation?

Mr. MAYS. I should say none of it.

Mr. BLANTON. Is it adapted to any purpose of commercial value other than park purposes?

Mr. MAYS. It is not.

Mr. BLANTON. It is fit for nothing but park purposes?

Mr. MAYS. That is all.

Mr. BLANTON. Is there any great necessity for this additional public park?

Mr. MAYS. There is a demand for it.

Mr. BLANTON. I mean outside of the immediate locality in Utah?

Mr. MAYS. Utah has no national park. There are parks established in most of the other States of the West.

Mr. BLANTON. Most of the States have no national parks.

Mr. MAYS. The Western States have. If the gentleman desires it, I will read the list of national parks in the West.

Mr. BLANTON. What I mean is that the great majority of our States have no national parks.

Mr. MAYS. Probably that is true. A great many of them have no scenery well adapted to park purposes. Of course, these great natural curiosities exist mostly in the West.

Mr. BLANTON. At this particular time, when every legislator realizes the urgent necessity for retrenchment in public expenditures, does not the gentleman believe we could hold this matter in abeyance for a few years until we recuperate a bit?

Mr. MAYS. There is no demand for immediate expenditure of money on this park. The Secretary of the Interior recommends that it be set aside as a national park. It was established as a national monument 12 or 14 years ago.

Mr. BLANTON. I understood the gentleman to say that the legislation carried with it an initial appropriation of $10,000.

Mr. MAYS. No; it does not carry a cent.

Mr. BLANTON. But it will require about that amount?

Mr. MAYS. Well, I assume so.

Mr. BLANTON. For the first year?

Mr. MAYS. I assume that ultimately, as the park develops, it would require probably about the same amount as the Rocky Mountain National Park.

Mr. WELLING. If my colleague will yield for a suggestion, I will state to the gentleman from Texas that the area involved in this proposed national park is withdrawn as a national monument already—every acre of it. Please let me say further, this proposed national park is located in southwestern Utah, in Washington County. The State has constructed at great expense an automobile highway from Salt Lake City to the gateway of the park. The Salt Lake route, connecting Salt Lake with Los Angeles, passes within 50 miles of the park opening, and visitors leaving the railroad at Lund can reach the park through regular stages from that point over a perfect State road.

The original act authorizing the withdrawal of this land as a national monument was passed by the Congress on June 8, 1906. Under authority of this act the first withdrawal of land was made by the proclamation of President Taft July 31, 1909. In this withdrawal there were 15,840 acres. At this time the monument was known as the Mukuntuweap National Monument. Mukuntuweap is an Indian name of doubtful origin and was never adopted by the white settlers who had grown to love the majestic beauties which nature had so lavishly revealed at this place. Later on, in March, 1918, the monument was enlarged by proclamation of President Wilson to the extent of 76,800 acres; and responding to the well-known wish of the people living adjacent to the park, the President designated it as Zion National Monument. It is now proposed in the measure which I have introduced to make of this national monument a national park.

The reasons for this change are perfectly obvious. The national parks of the West are becoming the familiar playgrounds of the American people, and rightly so. This year, long before the close of the tourist season, 60,000 people had visited the Yellowstone National Park through the Salt Lake gateway. The Zion National Park will in every way be worthy of similar approval and patronage by people who love nature in her sublimest moods.

This region obtained its name, Zion Canyon, because of the devout reverence of the Mormon pioneers who settled upon the Virgin River more than 60 years ago. Its perpendicular walls presented an impassable barrier to hostile tribes of Indians, who infested these regions, and these people looked upon Zion Canyon as a convenient and hospitable refuge when threatened by attack from these troublesome Indian tribes.

An enthusiastic admirer of this region once said: "Zion Canyon is an extraordinary gorge cut from brilliantly colored sedimentary rocks by the North Fork of the Virgin River. Its proportions are about equal to those of Yosemite Valley, in Yosemite National Park; the walls are several hundred feet lower and the canyon is considerably narrower. In the cutting of the gorge, however, the torrential stream and wind and rain have carved domes, spires, towers, and other curious forms that strikingly resemble many of the features of Yosemite Valley. More interesting than the carving of Zion's cliffs is their exquisite coloring. Red predominates, as it does in the Grand Canyon in Arizona, but there are amazing combinations of brown, black, and white colors with the red and with each other. White sandstone is superimposed on the red strata, and other layers of the red rock lie in turn upon the white. The action of water upon the exposed surfaces of these rocks has produced a symphony of color that gives the canyon its greatest charm. The finishing touches are given by the forests of the valley floor and the trees on the rim and in the niches of the nearly perpendicular canyon walls. Early scientific explorers of the Southwest, including Maj. J. W. Powell, who made the first trip through the Grand Canyon of the Colorado River, visited Zion Canyon and wrote of the great beauty of the gorge and the brilliance of its coloring, and several artists, including Thomas Moran, have conveyed the wonders of the region to the world by paintings of distinction."

I call particular attention to the fact that the bill does not necessarily involve the expenditure of a dollar of additional money. If the National Park Service, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, feels that work should not be begun on the park at this time, no money at all need be expended. It is thought, however, that this great park should be preserved in its primitive grandeur for the benefit of posterity. Along the perpendicular walls of Zion Canyon are the prehistoric homes of the cliff dwellers of ancient America. It is a favorite field of research for the archaeologist and the scientists who are interested in unfolding the history of this ancient people. On its granite walls are carved the symbols and characters which contain the imperishable record of the life history of these ancient races. I appeal to the House to take such action to-day as is necessary to preserve these records before the despoiling hand of man has forever effaced them.

The people of Utah are naturally intensely interested in this region. Historically it is a sacred spot to them as a refuge from hostile Indian tribes. Scientifically, it contains the record of one of the great unread volumes of past generations. Its scenic beauties can not be surpassed in any region of America to-day, and I trust the time is not far distant when hundreds of thousands of men will find its semitropical climate an inviting field for tourist travel in the winter months.

I may say already an enterprising national-park enthusiast and frontiersman, Mr. W. W. Wylie, has, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, established camps and regular stage traffic through the proposed park and many thousands have already enjoyed a visit to this wonderland of nature. I ask the House to permit its present consideration by unanimous consent.

Mr. BLANTON. I will state to my colleague that I am heartily in favor of establishing as many parks over the country as we can and just as fast as we can do so. The suggestion I was making was not in opposition to the general purpose of the measure, but to call attention to the fact that probably within the next few years most of the citizens of the United States will be occupied in trying to help the Government to raise interest to pay on its indebtedness and trying to meet that indebtedness as it matures. It is going to require a lot of effort in that direction. I think we ought to hesitate a little before we go into new ventures.

Mr. MAYS. The gentleman from Texas will realize that for the following year there will be many millions spent on the other side of the seas by American tourists.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; and they could find much finer scenery in this country.

Mr. MAYS. That was what I was about to say. The parks, such as the Yellowstone Park, are of great benefit to the country. I have lately seen the record that 60,000 visitors, a greatly increased number, were through the Yellowstone Park this year, a great increase as compared with other years. It should be the policy of our Government to keep the tourists in this country till they see America first.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAYS. Yes.

Mr. HICKS. I think the question of the betterment of national parks is something that every citizen is deeply interested in. I would like to ask the gentleman if this proposed park is contiguous to the Grand Canyon of the Colorado. I can not, from the report, determine it.

Mr. MAYS. It is not in the vicinity, but some distance north.

Mr. HICKS. How far from the rim of the Grand Canyon?

Mr. MAYS. I can not tell the gentleman exactly.

Mr. WELLING. It is 90 miles northwest of Bright Angel Point on the Grand Canyon.

Mr. MAYS. I might say to the gentleman that the Secretary of the Interior is greatly interested in the preservation of this park, particularly because it affords the most interesting illustration of American antiquities. The cliff dwellers had their homes in the sides of these perpendicular walls. These dwellings of prehistoric man are to be preserved. Evidences of a high degree of civilization are found in these villages. The curator of the National Museum has lately returned from an examination of these antiquities and tells me he intends to return soon.

Mr. HICKS. Does the gentleman know how these compare with the Mesa Verde National Park, in southwest Colorado?

Mr. MAYS. They are very similar. I would not want to say better, for I would not seek any issue with the gentleman from Colorado on that point.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman says that this carries no appropriation whatever and will require none for the next fiscal year.

Mr. MAYS. Not at all, except as already required as a national monument.

Mr. BLANTON. It is simply to be set apart as a national park?

Mr. MAYS. That is all.

Mr. BLANTON. May I ask the gentleman whether he or anyone is going to urge, in the case of the passage of this measure, an appropriation in the immediate future?

Mr. MAYS. I have not any such thought in mind at all.

Mr. BLANTON. I am not going to object to a measure which merely sets aside this land as a park. I would object to it if it carried an appropriation.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. May I make the suggestion that at the present time as a monument there is a small amount of money expended upon it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. GARD. Further reserving the right to object for a moment, I notice in the last paragraph of the letter the Secretary says:

> Practically all of the land affected by the pending legislation is unappropriated public land. The alienated lands within the boundaries of the proposed park are properly classified in the lists attached hereto.

How much land is there outside of the public land?

Mr. MAYS. My colleague has the list in detail.

Mr. Speaker, we have established 16 national parks, as follows:

Yosemite National Park, Calif.
Sequoia National Park, Calif.
General Grant National Park, Calif.
Mount Rainier National Park, Wash.
Crater Lake National Park, Oreg.
Rocky Mountain National Park, Colo.
Glacier National Park, Mont.
Mesa Verde National Park, Colo.
Hawaii National Park, Hawaii.
Lassen Volcanic National Park, Calif.
Hot Springs Reservation, Ark.
Platte National Park, Okla.
Wind Cave National Park, S. Dak.
Sullys Hill National Park, N. Dak.
Lafayette National Park, Me.
Mount McKinley National Park, Alaska.
Grand Canyon National Park, Ariz.
Yellowstone National Park, Wyo.

It will be observed that the Congress has reached out to far-away Hawaii and Alaska, establishing national parks in those places. It is well to do so. Our magnificent resources in scenery should be preserved and made available to the people, thus diverting hundreds of millions of dollars from the eager clutches of the Old World and impressing our people with the unparalleled grandeur of their own country.

Of all the 16 national parks and 23 monuments established, the Zion National Park will be the most remarkable in many particulars. Travelers tell us that these wonderful canyons are as imposing as the walls and depths of the Grand Canyon itself, and afford a much more varied example of remarkable colorings. I will insert a statement from the well-known author and traveler "Jack Lait":

AN APPRECIATION OF ZION NATIONAL MONUMENT.

[By Jack Lait. Written especially for the United States Railroad Administration.]

Zion Canyon is an epic, written by mother nature in her most ecstatic humor, illustrated by creation in its most majestic manifestations, published by God Almighty as an inspiration to all mankind.

Far from the foot-worn ways of conventional journeying, its remote and intimate preserves unfold to the traveler whose eye seeks the extraordinary a masterpiece in magnitude, incredible colorings, vastnesses of those mystic influences which mark the earth's contour, and a haven of distant peace beyond the understanding of him who has never entered the mouth of Zion Canyon, where the hubbub of the affairs of men has not yet penetrated, where nature is so big that one may not think small thoughts, where one is embraced in the spirits of mystery and history and those fascinating elements untouched by the rude fingers of destroying humans.

I spent 10 delicious days and nights between the unscaled walls of Zion; I explored it over fords and fallen giant trees down to where, between great, sheer altitudes of rock, no man has ever gone farther—the stream becomes too deep to wade, too rocky to canoe, too narrow to swim. On every side was crude but marvelous nature in bird and foliage and fish and rock and running water. I stood there and I gasped, though I had become almost familiar with the miracles of Zion. I gasped: I gasped a prayer, for one may not behold what one beholds there without knowing that there is a God; that His ways are inexplicable to man and to be taken in faith alone.

Zion Canyon is the most beautiful spot on this continent. I think I have seen all the famed show places that the evolutions of the earth's formation has made. And of them all Zion to me stands first, stands alone. In this opinion I may stand alone. But I saw Zion at its best, and it captured me. Rich with a phase of American history seldom touched upon in popular literature, pregnant like the page of knowledge with the spoils of time, it gives to one who stands within its magnificent dimensions a sounder affection and admiration for the courage of men and a more profound impression of the wonder-works of God.

Also a paragraph from the letter of the Secretary of the Interior:

I have dwelt particularly upon Zion Canyon because it is now so readily accessible and because it is actually being used as a tourist resort, but there are other canyons in the reservation that are bigger and even more beautifully colored. Still more remain to be entered and explored. In time they will all be open to the public. Furthermore, there are in the reservation mountains, waterfalls, natural bridges, ancient cliff dwellings, and numerous other features interesting to the tourist and exceedingly valuable to the scientist and student. The entire area should be protected for all time as a national park, and I recommend that the bill under consideration receive the approval of your committee and of Congress. I have no criticism to make of the form and substance of this bill.

Mr. WELLING. There are 80 acres of land in private ownership in the entire 76,000 acres.

Mr. GARD. How is that to be acquired?

Mr. WELLING. It unquestionably would be turned over to the park service at a merely nominal sum. It is not worth anything as agricultural land.

Mr. BLANTON. May I ask the gentleman if it would not be a wise policy to make some provision now for such acquirement, because gentlemen know that if we surround that private land with a public park the price of that land will go up to an immense amount of money.

Mr. WELLING. There has never been a public park established with so little privately owned land as this, and I assure the gentleman there will be no trouble about this private property.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. BLANTON. It would be an easy matter to make provision to acquire the land.

Mr. GARD. I regret that the gentleman from Iowa is demanding the regular order when we are simply making inquiries for information.

Mr. MAYS. There is no disposition to withhold any information. My colleague has a description of the land in private ownership.

Mr. DOWELL. I demand the regular order.

Mr. BLANTON. Then, for the present, Mr. Speaker, until we can go into the matter further, I must object.

Mr. WELLING. Mr. Speaker, I hope that the gentleman will not object. This matter is perfectly simple and there ought to be no objection to it.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman ought not to rush us, because we are trying to find out something about it, and now is the time to find it out.

Mr. GARD. If the gentleman will withdraw his request for the regular order and let us understand it, I think we will get along.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman from Iowa will withdraw his demand for the regular order, I shall withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is heard.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will withdraw his request for the regular order and give us a few minutes in which to look into the matter, probably there will be no objection.

Mr. DOWELL. But the proper way to get information is when the bill comes before the House. I have no objection to taking a few minutes now, but I shall insist on the regular order if it takes very long. For the present I withdraw the demand.

Mr. BLANTON. And I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] reserves the right to object.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, what I desire to call attention to is that I think we should place some safeguard in the matter requiring this alienated property to be purchased at a certain amount, because I believe, as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] has said, that sometimes when the United States steps in and establishes a park, land hitherto thought of little value becomes of immense value, and the Government is called upon to spend a lot of money for a small acreage of land. I think we ought to be protected in this circumstance.

Mr. WELLING. I am so certain of the fact that these 80 acres can be returned to the Government at a merely nominal figure that I am willing to accept any amendment that the gentleman desires to present in respect to it.

Mr. GARD. What does the gentleman suggest?

Mr. WELLING. Say that we provide that it shall be purchased at the price at which public land out there is now ordinarily held—perhaps $5 an acre.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. It is not at all material that the Government have those 80 acres. Let some one own it. It will be all for the better, for then you will have a resident there and it will never interfere with the park.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that in the first place there are only 80 acres out of about 70,000, and in all of the other parks which have been set aside there has been a very much greater amount of privately owned land. A good part of it is obtained at a nominal figure and the balance still remains in private ownership. To set a precedent that you could not establish a private park because there would be one part in private ownership I think would be a very bad thing to do.

Mr. GARD. I certainly am in accord with the purpose of the bill, which is to preserve this great national antiquity. I think it should be preserved. There is only a small amount of land, 80 acres, and some say that piece of land is not necessary at all. If it is necessary, I think some additional reservation should be placed in the bill limiting the price at which it shall be purchased. I confess that I am not familiar with the form in which it should be offered, but I suggest that those in charge of the bill place somewhere in the bill the statement that it shall be purchased at a price not to exceed $5 an acre.

Mr. MAYS. That is entirely satisfactory to me.

Mr. RAKER. You can not acquire it now.

Mr. MAYS. But you can limit the price to be paid eventually.

Mr. RAKER. I know, but that is all up to the action of Congress later.

Mr. GARD. No; it is up to it now.

Mr. MAYS. That would limit the Secretary of the Interior to $5 an acre.

Mr. RAKER. But he can not buy the land.

Mr. MAYS. I am willing to accept such an amendment.

Mr. RAKER. There is no authorization for him to buy the land.

Mr. GARD. This does not authorize it. If the gentleman will offer such an amendment, I would have no objection.

Mr. MAYS. I will offer the amendment.

Mr. GARD. Then I have no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object further, the only reason I raised the question is this: We do know that if a public park is established there and tourists begin to go there every year, the owner of the 80 acres of land could erect big hotels upon it and charge a thousand dollars an acre for it, and reap the benefit of the act of Congress in establishing this as a public park. For that reason an amendment should be adopted to the effect that this is not made a public park until the 80 acres referred to are acquired at a price not to exceed a maximum amount of $5 an acre. That should be a condition precedent. The right of egress and ingress to a person's property is something that the law fixes. This property is entirely surrounded by land owned by the United States, and the minute you put a public park there you can not regulate it so that the owner has not the right of ingress and egress to his property.

Mr. MAYS. We accept the amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. With that understanding, I shall not object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. MAYS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that it may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Utah asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Zion National Monument, in the county of Washington, State of Utah, established and designated as a national monument under the act of June 8, 1906, entitled "An act for the preservation of American antiquities," by presidential proclamations of July 31, 1909, and March 18, 1918, is hereby declared to be a national park and dedicated as such for the benefit and enjoyment of the people, under the name of the Zion National Park.

SEC. 2. That the administration, protection, and promotion of said Zion National Park shall be exercised under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior by the National Park Service, subject to the provision of the act of August 25, 1916, entitled "An act to establish a National Park Service, and for other purposes," and acts additional thereto or amendatory thereof.

Mr. WELLING. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk. Unfortunately I should have offered the amendment at the end of section 1, and I ask unanimous consent to return to the end of section 1 for the purpose of offering this amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Utah asks unanimous consent to return to the end of section 1 for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 10, strike out the period, insert a comma, and add the following: "under which name the aforesaid national park shall be maintained by allotment of funds heretofore or hereafter appropriated for the national monument until such time as an independent appropriation is made therefor by Congress."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WELLING. Mr. Speaker, in order to answer the objection raised to the bill I offer the following amendment, which I hope will meet the approval of the House. I desire the amendment added after the amendment which has just been adopted.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add after the amendment just adopted: "provided alienated land shall be acquired in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior at a cost of not more than $5 per acre.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment. After the word "acre" insert the following: "before said Zion National Park shall be established."

Mr. MAYS. That gives the people a chance if they are so disposed to hold up the situation.

Mr. BLANTON. It requires them to come in before the establishment of the park. After it is once established it puts a value on the property.

Mr. MAYS. It is very common to have privately owned land within the exterior boundaries of these national parks, and if you state that before the park can be established you must buy these 80 acres, these people have a chance to hold up the Government.

Mr. BLANTON. If they know the park is not going to be established until they come in and object to the establishment by not turning over land at a reasonable value, it should not be established.

Mr. MAYS. They may or may not be interested in the establishment of this park.

Mr. BLANTON. I am sure the public-spirited people of Utah could prevail upon the ownership of merely 80 acres of land——

Mr. WELLING. Mr. Speaker, the amendment which I offer gives the Secretary of the Interior the discretion to acquire this land that has been alienated—this is simply 80 acres—at a price not to exceed $5 an acre to the Government, and I think it has been covered fully.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask to be recognized in opposition to the amendment offered by Mr. WELLING.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "acre" insert "before said Zion National Park shall be established."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, the very minute that this bill becomes a law and this park is thereby established, that very minute this act of Congress gives unusual value to this 80 acres of privately owned land. It has been stated here that more than 70,000 acres of public land will be embraced in this public park, which completely surrounds this 80-acre tract of privately owned land.

Mr. MAYS. The gentleman will remember since 1906 this has been a national monument.

Mr. BLANTON. The point I am trying to make is that if we want to prevent an act of Congress from putting an extraordinary unreasonable value upon this little 80-acre tract of land, now of insignificant value, we should protect the people of the United States right at this time, because whenever you establish this national park——

Mr. CARAWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I regret that I can not now yield to the gentleman from Arkansas. By reason of the money Congress will be called upon to spend thereafter, and by tourists who visit this national park each year on the plan of visitation with respect to the Yellowstone National Park, you will find hotel after hotel placed upon this privately owned property. You will find a corporation soon organized to make profit out of this particular land unless we safeguard the matter right at this time.

Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa. What is to prevent the building of a hotel on any of the other tracts of land?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, well, the United States can control its own property on the inside by regulation, but, as I said before, it can not control the right of reasonable ingress and egress to this private property. The person owning this 80 acres, with Government land surrounding it on all sides, will have the right to come in and go from the property under reasonable regulations.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Does the gentleman think it could be a very exorbitant price when it is specified at $5 an acre?

Mr. BLANTON. Now, with all due respect to the gentleman from Utah, his amendment does not mean anything as proposed. It merely gives the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion, the right to acquire this land at $5 an acre. It does not compel the owner to sell his land at $5 an acre, because we have not the right to compel him in that way. And while we authorize the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion, to try to acquire this land at $5 an acre, the owner would probably laugh at him if he would go to him with such a proposition after we established the national park completely surrounding the land and thereby making it of great value.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. How about the other 78,000 acres privately controlled trying to build hotels?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, it is on the outside, and not greatly affected, but this owner is on the inside. This 80 acres is privately controlled land that will be on the inside of this proposed national park, and its owner may reap a fortune by reason of this act of Congress, and I take it that we want properly to protect and safeguard this legislation right at this time.

Mr. RAKER. Has the gentleman observed what the experience has been of those who have owned lands within——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. I ask unanimous consent for one minute more in order to answer the question.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BLANTON. The experience has been that the very minute a private citizen gets a chance to gouge the Public Treasury he usually gouges it to the maximum limit. To take this chance and opportunity away from the owner of this 80 acres of land, whoever he may be, I am seeking now to get an amendment to this bill.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I am disappointed that the committee even consented, although, of course, they had to consent, that the Secretary should purchase the land. But the gentleman from Texas evidently is not familiar with the history of owners within the boundaries of parks. Their use of the land is practically of no value. They can not travel over the public land, in and out, as they would; they can not do as they please. They have got to come to the Government to get the right to go over the land. If the gentleman will read the last case in the Supreme Court in regard to the interest a man has from the Government in the Yosemite National Park, he will see that this man will be only too glad to sell and sell at a reasonable price. He has no monopoly there. He can not establish a hotel or run over the public land without getting their consent.

Mr. WELLING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I yield.

Mr. WELLING. Is it not true that in all the national parks that have been created there has been a great deal larger proportion of deeded land than there is in this?

Mr. RAKER. This is the only one in which it is practically infinitesimal. They have run from a thousand to fifteen thousand acres and more in the national parks. And you establish a policy that every bit of the land must be in public ownership before you can establish a park, and that is unfortunate. The national parks are an asset to this Government, they are of inestimable value, and will continue to grow each day as this Government continues, and we ought to encourage the appropriation for and the proper establishment of national parks instead of trying to curtail them. And by every dollar we spend in the maintenance and upkeep of them, we add that much value to this country. Not only the Government land but surrounding land, whole counties, have an interest, and it is for the interest of humanity in general that the people should get the benefit and use of these parks, and that they have hotels and other accommodations so that they can go there and enjoy the benefits of that park. It is unfortunate that anyone should say that a park can not be established until they have acquired all the private land. Now, that will defeat this bill entirely, because there is no provision in the bill or any authorization to condemn, because there is no park. If you establish a park, then under the law authorizing the national parks you can proceed to acquire the land. Why not establish the park and then proceed to acquire the privately owned land?

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman states in one breath that the land would be of no value to the owner; that he would be glad to turn it over to the United States, and in the next breath the gentleman says that if you may not acquire the land at $5 an acre you never would acquire it.

Mr. RAKER. Oh, no. I said there was no authority to give the Secretary of the Interior to commence action of condemnation.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. RAKER. Just two minutes more.

There is no park established until the land is acquired. You make no provision for the acquiring of the land, and therefore you have a dead act, of no effect and no avail, and which no one can use. And clearly if you give the Secretary discretion, if he desires later to exchange it for some public land on the outside, for this particular park, an equal exchange, we will get the land for the benefit of the park. Nobody is going to be injured. They never have been injured. There have been fair deals and fair transfers, and as to this policy of saying in advance that you can not establish a national park until you have acquired the privately owned land, and the next policy, that you can not establish a national park unless you will agree in advance to expend no money upon it. I wish to ask, Why should the Government own a valuable property worth a great deal to it and its citizens and then not improve it? Ordinary business men do not do those things. If they have a property that is of value they expend a reasonable amount of money on it in order to make it more valuable, so that they can get some return for it. And it is the same way with this as in every other park.

Mr. WELLING. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 6, noes 32.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Utah [Mr. WELLING].

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. WELLING, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. WELLING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Utah asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MAYS. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Utah makes the same request. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BROOKS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio objects. On what subject does the gentleman want to extend his remarks?

Mr. BROOKS of Illinois. I wish to extend my remarks on the war with Silesia.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the war with Silesia. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks that I made a little while ago.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to revise and extend the remarks which he made a little while ago. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a short extract from a report of the Department of Agriculture as to crop conditions in Georgia and my remarks in connection therewith.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting a letter in regard to crop conditions in Georgia and his own remarks in connection therewith. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman in what way the Members of Congress or the people of this Nation would be particularly interested just now in the crop conditions of Georgia, aside from general interest?

Mr. LANKFORD. This is an extract from a report from the Department of Agriculture to the effect that the cotton yield in Georgia will be about 33⅓ per cent of the normal yield.

Mr. BLANTON. Then it will tend to help the farmer, and I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following are the statement and extract referred to:

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Speaker, I was simply crushed and horrified this morning when I read from the Georgia October 1 cotton report from the Department of Agriculture, as follows:

That the State's yield will be the lowest since 1896, that the total production will be the smallest since 1903, that loss of more than 150,000 bales representing $30,000,000, has been incurred since last report date are three astounding statements of the cooperative crop reporting service established by Union of State Department of Agriculture, J. J. Brown, commissioner, and United States Bureau of Crop Estimates, Leon M. Estabrook, chief. Not only that, these are true and conservative figures, as can easily be verified by reading reports of thousands of trustworthy and trained observers maintained by this service in every cotton county in Georgia.

These figures simply mean that the weevil has swept Georgia, doing a maximum damage. Only some 17 cotton counties remain which are not infested, and at the rate of present progress most of these will be invaded before the season closes. As is history in all territory injured for the first time, north central Georgia did not appreciate and would not believe the damage actually taking place, and even the keenest observer hesitated to indicate the full extent of the loss.

Auxiliary to the loss through the weevil, and scarcely second to him in destructiveness, has been the adverse weather. Long periods of flooding rains early in the season were followed in August and September by severe drought and heat. The first wrought destruction on low lands; promoted soft, tender growth where cotton had escaped; and was ideal for weevil propagation. The dry weather caught the plants and stripped them of upper fruit and even their leaves.

Ordinary cotton troubles like rust, blackroot, worms and red spiders, though as bad as usual, in presence of the greater pests have been almost forgotten.

All of these factors, together with labor shortage, have resulted in the greatest abandonment in years. Most of this occurred before the acreage estimate was made and hence included in it, but that since June 25 is still double the average since weevil infestation.

Mr. Speaker, my district is the greatest sufferer in the State, according to the report, and will make less than a third of a normal crop of cotton.

I was raised on a small farm in Clinch County in my district, and actually know what privation and suffering this shortage of a cotton crop means to the people of my section and State.

This great calamity of crop shortage is a most powerful unanswerable argument against the imposition of a potash tariff or any other unnecessary burden on the farmers at this time.

Let us pray to God for a chance to help them instead of a chance to hurt them.

Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the proposed bonus to be given soldiers by inserting a letter from Capt. C. C. Helmer, of Carroll, Iowa.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting a letter as indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, is the letter from some one in authority or from one of the gentleman's constituents?

Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa. It is from one of my constituents. He is a captain in the Regular Army.

Mr. GARD. And does his letter throw any light on the subject?

Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa. I think it does. He is one of the soldier boys.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, some days ago objection was made to a request to insert a communication from a certain organization of soldiers taking the stand that they did not want a bonus. Now, in view of the fact that an objection was made to a general statement by a whole organization in the way of resolutions passed by that organization concerning a particular bill, it occurs to me that until the whole organization is permitted to be heard from, surely no particular soldier should be heard from, and therefore for the time being I shall have to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas objects. The Clerk will report the next bill.

RIGHT OF WAY THROUGH PUBLIC LAND.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 2946) to amend acts to permit the use of right of way through public lands for tram roads, canals, and reservoirs, and for other purposes.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill?

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I understand the gentleman from Idaho has an amendment to submit to this bill excluding the forest reserves from the provisions of the act.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Yes. After the report was made on the bill a communication was received from the Secretary of Agriculture, asking that the amendment be inserted.

Mr. GARD. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio objects.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Ohio let me make an explanation in regard to this bill? It passed both branches of Congress last year. The Senate made a slight amendment to the bill, but it came here just two days before the adjournment.

Mr. GARD. I have objected, and I shall object. I will reserve my objection for a moment; but there seem to be so many objections to the bill from gentlemen on the Committee on Public Lands that I do not think it should be taken up at the present time.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will not resort to that sort of tactics.

Mr. GARD. The Secretary of the Interior says the bill is objectionable to him.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I do not think he makes any such statement.

Mr. GARD. In his letter he says, "The bill in its present form is objectionable to this department."

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Oh, that letter was written on the 12th of January during the last Congress, and he suggests now that if the amendment recommended by him is adopted he has no objection. He approved the bill in a letter the 18th of last June.

Mr. GARD. If the gentleman wants his bill to come in with proper amendments, all right.

Mr. SINNOTT. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that that objection has been obviated.

Mr. WELLING. The objection has been eliminated by the acceptance of the amendment proposed.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Yes. The bill has been amended by the adoption of the amendment suggested by the Secretary of the Interior in January last.

Mr. GARD. The gentleman from Oregon suggested that the gentleman from Idaho has another amendment. Now, I object to having bills come up and after authority is given to consider them have gentlemen come in with amendments changing their character.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. After the bill was reported the Secretary of Agriculture volunteered a letter to the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands suggesting an amendment that this proposed legislation should not apply to forest reserves. We have accepted that amendment because the Secretary of Agriculture has requested it. That is what the gentleman from Oregon had reference to.

Mr. RAKER. I know, but that is an important matter, and this is the first I have heard of it. I would not want to let legislation of this kind go through, proposing to say to men whose property is there that they can not have the same rights over forest reserves that others have.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. But there is a general law applying to rights of way over forest reserves.

Mr. WALSH. Has the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] withdrawn his objection?

The SPEAKER. He reserved his objection.

Mr. GARD. I withdrew the absolute objection, so as to allow the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. SMITH] and the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] and the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT] to explain the bill.

Mr. WALSH. I think they ought to do a little explaining for the benefit of the rest of the House. They have been doing it over on that side, where nobody except the gentleman from Ohio can hear it.

Mr. GARD. I would be very glad if they would explain it to the House.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. It is a very important bill, and it passed both Houses of Congress last year. There is no new matter in the bill except that suggested by the Secretary of Agriculture, and it seems to me we ought to consider the bill in the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill?

Mr. GARD. Further reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would ask the gentleman from Idaho if he intends to offer an amendment to this bill carrying out, in effect, the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Oregon?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Yes.

Mr. GARD. What is that amendment?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Simply the amendment suggested by the Secretary of Agriculture, that this act shall not apply to lands within national forests, because we already have general legislation controlling rights of way in national forests and the uses to which the national forests shall be put.

Mr. GARD. What is the reason for the granting of the rights granted by this bill?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. As indicated in the report, it is necessary to have ditch riders stationed along these great canals which cross the public domain, and in many instances go up into the canyons. In order that these employees may have some place to build their homes and their corrals to take care of their horses, it has been deemed advisable to secure legislation giving them the title to 5 acres of land for this purpose. Otherwise they would be trespassers on the public domain.

Mr. GARD. Are there no tracts of land where under present authority these men may have 5 acres for a house?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. No; the rights of way are only 200 feet in width, and there is no place for them to erect their houses and build their barns. The only place they could build them would be on the public domain, and then they would be trespassers and liable to prosecution. The land is useless. It is not now utilized for any purpose, because it is away out on the plains or up in the canyons, where it could not be used for any other purpose, and is not desired for any other purpose.

Mr. RAKER. If the gentleman will yield, this brings a new feature onto the forest reserves. I remember when the bill was considered I was very much interested, but this proposed amendment eliminates practically three-fourths of the value of the bill, if not nine-tenths of it. Most of these ditches, canals, and rights of way are over forest reserves.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Oh, no.

Mr. RAKER. Oh, but they are in my country and in Nevada, Oregon, and other places. Now, I am going to ask the gentleman a fair question. This never was considered by the committee. Why should we eliminate this right as to forest reserves when that question was not considered or raised in the committee?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. For the reason, as I explained, that the suggestion from the Secretary of Agriculture was not received until three weeks after the bill was reported.

Mr. RAKER. I know; but that is an entire change of the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. We are bringing it up here for consideration now. That is what we are trying to secure—consideration of the amendment offered by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. RAKER. If this legislation is advisable as to the public domain, does not the same reason exist for its application to forest reserves?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. No; for the reason that——

Mr. SINNOTT. If the gentleman will yield, the Agricultural Department reports that there is existing legislation under which the department has no difficulty in meeting the demands of persons who desire to use national forest lands for the purposes contemplated by this proposed legislation, so that there is no trouble upon the forest reserves at the present time. There is legislation that enables these privileges to be granted.

Mr. RAKER. That legislation is simply the right to occupy the land for not more than 20 years, but this gives them a permanent title to the land in connection with their reservoirs, ditches, and so forth, so that they may have it for actual use. I will ask the gentleman if that is not correct?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. That is true; but the gentleman knows that the jurisdiction over forests is in the Department of Agriculture and the jurisdiction over the public domain is in the Secretary of the Interior, and there is a law which applies to the national forests which authorizes their use for the purposes mentioned in the bill.

Mr. RAKER. I want to be fair with the gentleman. The law in regard to the forest reserves provides that the Department of Agriculture may authorize the occupancy and use of certain lands for a period of not exceeding 20 years.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. But that right can be renewed at any time.

Mr. RAKER. It can be renewed, but if a man puts a large amount of money into a reservoir and ditch and other waterworks, why should he not have the same right of permanent occupancy if the land is forest reserve as though it were a part of the public domain?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. We have no objection to it, and we want to meet the wishes of the Secretary of Agriculture in this regard and avoid a controversy which might result in objection to the consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. There seems to be such confusion among the membership as to what the bill should be that I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The Clerk will report the next bill.

RECLAMATION PROJECTS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 796) for furnishing water supply for miscellaneous purposes in connection with reclamation projects.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WALSH. I object.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman withhold his objection so as to give us an opportunity to explain the bill?

Mr. WALSH. If the gentleman desires to make a statement, I will reserve the right to object in order that he may do so.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Let me say that this little bill is one that has been passed before by the Senate and been favorably considered by this committee at the last session of Congress. Throughout nearly all of the thirty-odd Government reclamation projects in the West there are at times every season occasions when the officials want to furnish some water for something else than irrigation purposes—for instance, as the Secretary of the Interior says, for sugar-beet factories and alfalfa mills and for domestic purposes to the people. Sometimes they have to furnish water for railroad engines on trains running through the projects. It is some little temporary use, the amount of water being usually insignificant, but at the same time it is very important to the community. We have put in an amendment that such water shall only be furnished on the approval of the water users' association of that project. So if it is with their approval and the approval of the Secretary of the Interior and is for a general public benefit, and at a time and under conditions where it does not take any water away from the irrigators, I do not see what objection there can be to it. It is in the interest of development, accommodates everybody, and is objected to by nobody. It applies to all the reclamation projects. I trust that the gentleman from Massachusetts will not object to this provision, because it certainly harms nobody. I can not see what objection can be made to it, and I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to withdraw his objection to this bill, which is for the benefit and development of the country. I do not know whether I have had any effect upon the gentleman's views.

Mr. FESS. You have.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I wanted to make an appeal that would melt the heart of a wooden Indian tobacco sign to allow this bill to pass and let those deserving people have some water.

Mr. KINKAID. Will the two gentlemen allow me an interruption? This is to relieve very necessitous conditions which occur in a great many places in the arid West when water is extremely scarce. Water is no more important for farming purposes than it is for domestic purposes, but where there is adequate water and some left over from irrigation and domestic purposes, then this is to relieve those necessitous conditions such as the gentleman from Colorado has named. It is a very conservative measure. We have restricted it by four provisos, that the water users must consent, and that it must not be a damage to the project, and furthermore the Government is protected.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. WALSH. I object.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may not be stricken off, but retain its place, and go to the foot of the calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent that the bill may go to the foot of the calendar. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill H. R. 2041 retain its place on the calendar.

Mr. WALSH. No; it ought to go to the foot of the calendar.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will withdraw his objection for a moment.

Mr. WALSH. I will withhold it.

Mr. MONDELL. I did not hear what the gentleman from Massachusetts said was the ground of his objection.

Mr. WALSH. I did not say anything, but I objected.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. It is pretty hard to argue against a blank objection, without there being any reason whatever given for the objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I take it that the gentleman knows what the situation is. The difficulty as the matter now stands is that it is exceedingly difficult for town sites to get a water supply on reclamation projects. Under the law as it now stands, or is interpreted, the only water rights are those that become appurtenant to the land, and therefore are irrigation water rights. The towns on reclamation projects must have a water supply. The only source of water supply for these towns in many instances is the water on the project. The amount of water needed for this purpose is infinitesimal as compared with the amount used for irrigation. But it is the most essential of all the water supplies.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Let me illustrate the situation on a reclamation project with which I am familiar. The only way the town on the reclamation project secures water at all is by a notion that a municipal water supply is an irrigation water supply. That is a fiction that can be questioned at any time. It is true that the people on the town site have invested a considerable amount of money in providing for a reservoir and a pressure pipe, but the water supply is still, so far as its legal status is concerned, an irrigation water supply. As a matter of fact, it is a municipal water supply. I imagine the amount of water needed for that town site is probably not more than the amount of water that would be needed for the irrigation of, say, 40 acres of land. But there is no need higher than that of the need of water for municipal purposes. This is a simple little bill for the purpose of enabling the Secretary to recognize that situation and make provision for these municipal water supplies.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Why can not the town get the water now?

Mr. MONDELL. In this particular case I am speaking of the town can get no other water except that which comes from the project, because there is no water within many miles of the project except the water that comes through the canal to the project. The town is many miles from water except that which comes through the canal. It is the only water in the locality and is brought down for the purpose of irrigating the land. It reaches the little town site built on the project for the purpose of affording the necessary business houses, the railway station, and so forth.

There is no way under heaven of securing water for that town except securing it from this project, water that irrigates the land.

Mr. WALSH. That is not the only section connected with those projects. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. They have no authority to purchase this water from the users now.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not know that the House wants to give me the time to explain the process of appropriation of water for irrigation, but this water supply was appropriated by the Secretary of the Interior for the benefit of the people on the project. The Secretary of the Interior is simply a trustee, and eventually, after all of the lands are sold, that water supply is the property of the people owning the land on the project, a part of whom are those who happen to live in this little town. The water supply is sold to the landowners. That is, the water is not sold; it can not be under the laws of the State; we use that term because there is no other to express what is really done. What is done is to make a charge for the distribution and delivery of water that belongs to the people and land of a project, and that is the charge that is referred to here under the term "sale." He simply makes a charge to the town, as he would to a settler, for a certain amount of water to be used, in this case for municipal purposes, and the sum paid goes into the reclamation fund to help pay for that project. Under the present law there is no way in which that charge for distribution and delivery to a community on the project can be made except under the fiction that the water is being used to irrigate land when, as a matter of fact, it is being used to irrigate the inhabitants thereof, and it is much needed, of course, in these dry times, when there is nothing else to drink.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, in view of the very interesting statement of the gentleman from Wyoming, supplementing the statement of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR], I object.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will not object to letting it retain a place on the calendar.

Mr. WALSH. At the foot of the calendar. We can not have bills objected to remain in the same place on the calendar.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I am not asking to have it remain in the same place, but to go to the foot of the calendar.

The SPEAKER. The House has already consented to that.

SALE OF CERTAIN LANDS AT MINIDOKA, IDAHO.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 2945) to authorize the sale of certain lands at or near Minidoka, Idaho, for railroad purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman from Idaho state what the bill is?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. This is a bill to authorize the sale of about 67 acres of land on a reclamation project to the railroad company, upon which it desires to build a roundhouse and also extend its switches. It is favorably recommended by the Secretary of the Interior, and a provision has been inserted that the land shall not be sold for less than $50 an acre, the proceeds of which will go into the reclamation fund for that particular project. The land has never been applied for, and is really now worth nothing excepting for such purposes as those indicated in the bill. The railroad company is willing to pay $50 or whatever sum above that the Secretary of the Interior estimates the land to be worth.

Mr. GARD. Does the bill carry an amount at which it is to be sold?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. The bill provides that it shall not be sold for less than $50 an acre. The land is really quite a distance from the land that is irrigated, and it has never been applied for, although the project has been open for nearly 10 years.

Mr. GARD. What is the amount of the land?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Sixty-seven and eighty-seven one-hundredths acres.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman from Idaho whether or not the mineral rights are reserved in this transaction?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. The bill does not provide for that, but I have no objection to it. It is in the Great Snake River plain where there are no minerals but lava rock.

Mr. BLANTON. I would state to the gentleman that in two counties in my district to-day there are 200,000 barrels of oil flowing out of the ground every day——

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. But that is a different country from this.

Mr. BLANTON. And they are in a country which until a short time ago people never dreamed had any mineral rights at all. I think that where property is sold at a nominal value—and this is a nominal value, is it not?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. No; it is not.

Mr. BLANTON. When you consider it is within a reclamation project.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Oh, there is no water there to irrigate it. It is 6 or 8 miles from the high-line canal.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman will offer an amendment reserving the mineral rights to the Government, I shall not object.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I have no objection to the gentleman's offering such an amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. Would the gentleman offer it at the proper place in the bill?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I am not interested in offering such an amendment, but if the gentleman wishes me to draw it up I will be very glad to do it.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman can draw it up and offer it. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Idaho asks unanimous consent that this bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to sell and convey to Oregon Short Line Railroad Co., a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of Utah and authorized to do business in the State of Idaho, its successors and assigns, for railroad purposes, and at a price to be fixed by appraisement at not less than $50 per acre, and under such terms, conditions, and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, the following-described land, situated in Minidoka County, Idaho:

All that part of the west half of the southeast quarter and the southeast quarter of the southwest quarter of section 2, and the northwest quarter of the northeast quarter and the north half of the northwest quarter of section 11, all in township 8 south, range 25 east of the Boise meridian, within the following-described area:

Beginning at the intersection of the present southeasterly right of way boundary of the Twin Falls Branch of the Oregon Short Line Railroad Co. with the section line common to said sections 2 and 11, 100 feet southeasterly from and at right angles to the center line of main track of said railroad, said intersection also bearing north 89° 5′ west, 460.1 feet from the quarter section corner common to said sections 2 and 11; thence north 40° 25′ east along said southeasterly right of way boundary, being 100 feet southeasterly from and parallel to said center line of main track, for a distance of 1,726.8 feet; thence south 0° 1′ east, and parallel to the north and south center line of said section 2, for a distance of 1,332.6 feet, to a point in the section line common to said sections 2 and 11; thence continuing south 0° 1′ east, and parallel to the north and south center line of said section 11, for a distance of 1,320 feet, to the south line of the northwest quarter of the northeast quarter and the north half of the northwest quarter of said section 11; thence north 89° 5′ west, along said south line, for a distance 2,229.5 feet, to a point in the present southeasterly right of way boundary of said railroad; thence north 40° 25′ east, along said right of way boundary, and being 100 feet southeasterly from and parallel to said center line of main track, for a distance of 1,710.4 feet, to the point beginning, and containing in all 67.87 acres, more or less, within the proposed pumping unit of the Minidoka project of the United States Reclamation Service.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Page 1, line 8, strike out the word "appraisement" and insert "the Secretary of the Interior in order to return the expenditure heretofore made or proposed to be made for the irrigation of the land."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 4, after the word "company," insert a comma and add the following: "reserving all mineral rights to the Government."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SMITH of Idaho, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

TRANSFER OF EMPLOYEES IN THE CLASSIFIED CIVIL SERVICE.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 7404) to repeal section 7 of the act of October 7, 1917, entitled "An act making appropriation to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes."

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Idaho some particulars in regard to this bill. From a reading of the report, is it a proper conclusion to reach that there are two purposes in view, one to raise salaries and the other to facilitate the exchange of employees from one department to another?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, in drawing this report I hoped to make it full enough so that all Members who took the time to read the report might understand the merits of the legislation. At the beginning of the war, when we had quite a number of war bureaus created, it was necessary to have a great many additional clerks, and those new war bureaus commenced to draw from the old established bureaus in the various departments, and there were so many requests for transfers that it was necessary, for the good of the service and to avoid disorganization of established bureaus, to have the act referred to prohibiting such transfers. Now that the war is over and conditions are resuming normal, it is desired by the Civil Service Commission, also by two Cabinet officers, that this law prohibiting transfers from one department to another be repealed. The law works a great injustice to a great many competent people. From my own district two men came here to Washington and were given positions in a permanent branch of the department. When their skill and experience were discovered transfers were asked for them to other bureaus, but they could not be transferred because of the fact that they had not been in the department for one year.

Mr. HICKS. Let me interrupt the gentleman, if I may, for a moment. On page 2 of the report in the second paragraph at the bottom it states:

It also prevented one department bidding against another, in cases where one of them happened to be more advantageously situated than another with respect to the use of lump-sum appropriations.

Now, if the old law prevented and this does away with the prohibition, then we are going to establish a custom of departments bidding against each other, I would presume.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. In establishing new bureaus the clerks have to be compensated from a lump sum and the gentleman's objection would apply, but there are only three or four bureaus now where clerks are paid from a lump-sum appropriation—the Shipping Board, the Revenue Department, and perhaps in the Census Office. This legislation is intended to make it possible for those bureaus when some one especially qualified who is now in a permanent department for particular work in another department may be transferred without having to serve one year in the department in which he was originally appointed.

Mr. HICKS. There is one other question I would like to ask the gentleman, and that is on page 4 of the gentleman's report in the letter received by Mr. LEHLBACH from Secretary Baker he states that there should be a provision or an amendment put in "prohibiting one department from tendering, either directly or indirectly, a position to an employee of another department at an increased salary without the prior consent of the head of the department desiring the transfer." Was that proviso put in the bill?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. No; it was not put in the bill, because we considered it unnecessary. Under the civil-service law permitting transfers, transfers can not be made from one classified position to another without the consent of the head of the department from which the clerk is transferred and the consent of the head of the department to which the clerk is transferred.

Mr. HICKS. Then why did Mr. Baker refer to it in his letter of July 29?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Perhaps he was not advised on what the law is, as you can not now make a transfer without securing the consent of the heads of the departments interested in the transfer. The Civil Service Commission has written a letter to the committee, which, it seems to me, should appeal to the judgment of Members and is incorporated in the report.

Mr. HICKS. From whom?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. From Mr. Morrison, the chairman. This legislation is simply in the interest of the public service and the proper transaction of the public business. These gentlemen charged with the administration of the law seem to think it is very important. The House Committee on Reform in the Civil Service considered it and reported it out favorably.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, I always dislike to make objections to bills which have been considered by a committee, but it does seem to me that this bill may throw the gates open to increases in salaries, and also to the enlargement of our bureaus and the increase of our civilian employees, and for that reason I am constrained to object to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York objects.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I ask unanimous consent that the bill go to the foot of the calendar.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

CARIBOU NATIONAL FOREST.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 4311) to authorize the addition of certain lands to the Caribou National Forest.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of this bill?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, I desire to have the gentleman explain the necessity for the bill with the amendments which are inserted by the committee.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. The amendment in italics, inserted on the first page of the bill, conforms to the recommendation of the Secretary of the Interior, who desired to have the land examined in order to determine whether or not, in his judgment, it should be included in the national forest, and the amendment on the last page is simply to protect pending entries.

Mr. GARD. I note that the Secretary of the Interior says in the report, on page 3:

I am without information as to the necessity for the proposed legislation. While generally opposed to placing lands more valuable for agricultural uses in forest reserves, it is not very clear that these lands are more valuable for such uses, and I would interpose no objection to the legislation proposed if additions to the forest be restricted to lands of the character contemplated by the bill in its present form.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. That was the reason we put in the provision that he should first examine the land, when he would be in a position to determine whether he wished to approve of the transfer or not.

Mr. GARD. Why is it that the Secretary of the Interior, who is in charge of these matters, is without information as to the necessity for public land in the Caribou National Forest, and what is the necessity for it?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. The reason the Secretary is not advised is because the land is up on the top of the mountains, and none of his special agents has ever been in there to make examination of the land. The necessity for the legislation is to further protect the stream flow in that country, and simply connects up the forest reserve lying on the west side of Wyoming with the forest reserve lying on the east side of Idaho. It is just a strip of townships which should be placed under the jurisdiction of the national forest administration.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and the Clerk will report the next bill.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill go to the foot of the calendar.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman if it is not better policy for the Secretary of the Interior to have this proposition investigated first, before the legislation is taken up and passed, as to the necessity for increasing the size of the reserve?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. The safeguard was put in the bill so that he could examine the land before he determined the matter.

Mr. BLANTON. Has there ever been such a piece of legislation passed until the Secretary of the Interior has had the matter investigated and made a favorable report?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. We have passed a number of bills of that character, both in this Congress and in the last Congress. In this instance, because his recommendation was not absolute, we inserted the provision as he suggested.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the bill going to the foot of the calendar? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

HOMESTEAD ENTRIES IN FORT PECK INDIAN RESERVATION.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 183) providing additional time for the payment of purchase money under homestead entries of land within the former Fort Peck Indian Reservation, Mont.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask that this bill be passed for the present without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent that the bill be passed without prejudice. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk will report the next bill.

RAILROAD RIGHT OF WAY FOR PUBLIC-ROAD PURPOSES.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 2100) authorizing the Union Pacific Railroad Co., or its successors, to convey for public-road purposes certain parts of its right of way.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Union Pacific Railroad Co., or any of its successors or assigns, is hereby authorized to convey to any State, county, or municipality any portion of its right of way to be used as a public highway or street: Provided, That no such conveyance shall have the effect to diminish the right of way of said railroad company to a less width than 50 feet on each side of the center of the main track of the railroad as now established and maintained.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I wondered whether or not there should be an amendment on line 4.

Mr. WALSH. Has consent been granted for the consideration of the bill?

Mr. RAKER. Yes. It is before the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Consent was granted.

Mr. RAKER. I want to call the committee's attention to the fact and ask if they do not believe the words "or assigns" ought to be stricken out of line 4?

Mr. KINKAID. To remove obstacles to the construction of the Lincoln Highway is the immediate purpose, yet streets in villages and cities are also equally involved. While the suggestion of the gentleman from California seems to be plausible, I think, on the whole, the word "assigns" had better not be stricken out.

Mr. RAKER. Originally there was some little doubt in my mind in regard to this, authorizing the transfer, but I simply want to call the gentleman's attention to this fact, that there could be no valid assignee of the Union Pacific Railroad Co. to this land. That is right, is it not?

Mr. SINNOTT. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. SINNOTT. This bill is for the purpose of curing that. The Union Pacific Co. had no right under the original grant to assign or deed away any of this land. Some of the land has been deeded for wagon-road purposes, and this would cure that.

Mr. RAKER. That has already been done? In other words, the Union Pacific Railroad Co. has already transferred some of this land within the right of way for public-road purposes?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes. And that grant was invalid, except as it was cured by the former act.

Mr. RAKER. Now, the purpose of this is not only to authorize them to assign further land for road purposes but to confirm that which has already been transferred?

Mr. SINNOTT. For road purposes.

Mr. RAKER. For road purposes only?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the Senate bill to be read a third time.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SINNOTT, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next one.

ENTRIES UNDER THE HOMESTEAD LAWS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the resolution (H. J. Res. 167) making the provisions of section 2296 of the United States Revised Statutes applicable to all entries made under the homestead laws and laws supplemental and amendatory thereof.

The title of the resolution was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. WALSH. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and the Clerk will report the next bill.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution remain on the calendar and go to the foot thereof.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that the resolution remain on the calendar and go to the foot thereof. Is there objection?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is the parliamentary effect under the rule of bills and resolutions going to the foot of the calendar? Does that mean that they are to be put on next week, next time, and, if that process is continued in the case of this resolution, kept up from time to time indefinitely?

The SPEAKER. It can not.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Whereas under the rule a bill or resolution can be put on only twice, as I understand it, there are some of these bills and resolutions that I have objected to with the idea of disposing of them, not with a view of permitting them to be brought up another time, and I think the Members of the House should have that in mind when they are making objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can cure that by objecting.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The gentleman understands they could not be brought up to-day. They would have to go over two weeks.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I object to the request of the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RAKER. The Speaker holds that when objection is made bills go off the calendar? That is the usual practice with all the bills?

The SPEAKER. Yes. The Clerk will report the next one.

RECLAMATION OF ARID LANDS IN NEVADA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 9) to encourage the reclamation of certain arid lands in the State of Nevada, and for other purposes.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. EVANS] a question, whether this measure in its present form conforms in all respects to the bill that was up in the last Congress? Does the gentleman know?

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. I am a new Member. It has passed the Senate. It has the unanimous approval of the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands.

Mr. WALSH. Will some one on the committee advise me? Was this passed in the last Congress?

Mr. KINKAID. It was passed in the Senate in the last Congress. It has been pending for some time, and it has had several favorable reports from the Senate committee, and it has passed the Senate at least once before.

Mr. WALSH. This is too important a measure to be passed by unanimous consent.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. WALSH. I will withhold my objection for a moment, but I shall object.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. Mr. Speaker, if I may make a short statement, I think something should be done to change the status in Nevada, where population in the entire State in 1910 was less than 82,000. This serious situation was not because of natural resources but for failure of the Federal Government to enact laws suitable to our peculiar conditions, which are unique, being the only State of its kind in all our Union. The rainfall there is less than in any other State. The waters of Nevada occur in a most peculiar way. Of all our several flowing streams none extend beyond our State boundaries, but sink into the ground and entirely disappear beneath the surface.

Therefore we plan by this measure which applies solely to Nevada Government lands now unreserved, unappropriated, nonmineral, nontimbered, public lands, to invite private capital to sink deeply, tapping the underground flow known to exist beneath arable and productive soil, with the hope of establishing an artesian flow, or raising water by pumping to irrigate and reclaim this section of idle soil to production and progress.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, is the gentleman reading a letter from the department?

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. No, sir. I am reading my own thought, to make it a little more cohesive.

The Carey Act and land law now in force have failed to induce settlement and development of these vast areas of level and fertile sections, because after 50 years Nevada is owned 5½ per cent of area by individuals, 5½ per cent further by railroads, and 89 per cent by our Government. It has always been the purpose of the Government to pursue a liberal policy toward western development of public lands, granting all that was needed to encourage genuine settlers to develop western sections from Territories into States of most prosperous communities and cities.

I wish to say that the proposed legislation is to some extent experimental, and will be watched with intense interest by all adjoining States where the governmental policy is to place the title to those areas into private ownership, and encourage bona fide settlers. That vast productive section awaits the coming of the prospector and the farmer, the only men qualified to subdue and restore the West, who, in spite of failure, are ever hopeful that the future will bring its sure reward. They need, and should have, your confidence and encouragement. They are the men who have brought cultivation to the arable and the arid lands of the West. They pioneer into sections unsafe for the newcomer.

The western man has a certain respect and admiration for the eastern man, because in him he recognizes the builder, the doer of big worth-while things; therefore the ambition rises strong within the western mind to reclaim, restore, and build the West. Be advised by the western man as to western needs. Repeal laws obstructive to true progress. Invite and encourage the pioneers and prospectors, who in their own western way are the real constructive spirits that will cause the West to prosper as does the East, joining hands to make all problems easy and the future beyond compare.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say for the benefit of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], as well as of the House generally, that the membership of the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands was of the opinion that this is a very meritorious measure. The Committee on Irrigation in the last Congress was of the same opinion, and made a favorable report on a similar bill.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINKAID. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Is it not true that the objections that were made in former Congresses to the measure as it originally came from the Senate have been eliminated from this? At least that is my understanding and judgment, and as chairman of the former Committee on Irrigation I am glad to corroborate what the present chairman says. We all feel that there should be no objection to this bill, and we feel that the State of Nevada is peculiarly entitled to this legislation.

Mr. KINKAID. Yes. The State of Nevada is situated very peculiarly in this respect——

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman permit and agree to an amendment to reserve the mineral rights of the Government?

Mr. KINKAID. They are reserved.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. They are already reserved.

Mr. BLANTON. The way I caught the bill it just spoke of the lands as nonmineral lands. Many lands classified as nonmineral and nonagricultural lands are, as a matter of fact, mineral and agricultural in some instances.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Those reservations are made now by general law. It is not necessary to put that in. You can not get oil land by homesteading nowadays.

Mr. BLANTON. It is all reserved?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. These lands come under the general reservation?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. These homesteads to-day do not contain any oil?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. When you get a homestead, you do not get any oil under it. The oil that may be underneath it is reserved.

Mr. BLANTON. This is not with respect to any homestead rights. It carries with it the right to exploitation with regard to the reclaiming of arid lands.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; by expending a lot of money and digging an artesian well.

Mr. BLANTON. If the mineral rights are properly reserved, I have no objection.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. They are properly reserved. I am glad the gentleman has asked the question.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. KINKAID. I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That on establishing at any time within two years from the date of the permit to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Interior that underground waters in sufficient quantity to produce at a profit agricultural crops other than native grasses upon not less than 20 acres of land has been discovered and developed and rendered available for such use within the limits of the land embraced in any permit, the said permittee shall be entitled to a patent for one-fourth of the land embraced in the permit, such area to be selected by the permittee in compact form, according to the legal subdivisions of the public land surveys, if the land be surveyed or to be surveyed at his expense, under rules and regulations established by the Secretary of the Interior, if located on unsurveyed land.

Mr. RAKER. I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. RAKER: After the word "land," in line 19, page 4, add:

"Provided, That within the limits of a railroad grant land cornering shall be considered as contiguous and in compact form."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, a point of order. Have we not passed that section?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk informs the Chair that we have not.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, this applies to California as well as Nevada, and I offer the amendment to see if we can establish a rule. Here is a section of public land containing 640 acres. Back over here is another section of 640 acres, and the two sections corner. There is no other available land, the alternate sections being railroad lands. Because these two sections corner and are not contiguous, a man can not take the two tracts of land for the purpose of developing water. There is a great deal of land in Nevada and considerable in California that is in this situation.

Mr. KINKAID. If the gentleman will allow me to suggest a word in furtherance of his argument, the Interior Department holds that they are not contiguous, because they do not lie alongside each other, but merely corner on each other.

Mr. RAKER. That is correct.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Does the gentleman know that the courts have held that lands which corner on each other are contiguous?

Mr. RAKER. Just to the contrary. All of the land decisions hold that where lands simply corner they are not contiguous. That is the universal and unvarying rule.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I beg the gentleman's pardon. The law, with reference to the laying out of congressional districts, requires that the territory included in a congressional district shall be contiguous. Two counties corner on each other have been held to be contiguous.

Mr. RAKER. That does not apply to the public lands.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. The gentleman said it was a uniform rule.

Mr. RAKER. It is uniform and unvarying in the Land Department and everywhere, unless there is special legislation. For illustration, here are two sections cornering. A quarter section in one corner is public land and a quarter section in the other section across the corner is public land. You can take only one of the quarters, because the two are not contiguous but corner on each other. That is the rule. Now, I wish to read this letter written by Mr. Arthur L. Coggins, a very high-class man:

DUNSMUIR, CALIF., September 25, 1919.

Hon. JOHN E. RAKER,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. RAKER: Re S. 9, Report No. 286, irrigation arid lands in Nevada:

Section 5 of this act, line 15, provides that the land shall be "in compact form." The interpretation of the Land Office of this term is as "near a square as possible," contiguous, and "lands cornering are not considered as contiguous." Now, within the limits of the railroad grant, where every other section is owned by the railroad, it very often happens, that to the interest of the homesteader, and, in this case, the prospector for water, that he will have to go into two sections for a suitable selection of land. If you go out of one section of Government land into the next adjoining section of Government land, these lands, although cornering, are not considered contiguous, and could not be filed upon within the meaning of these acts.

That is as it has been determined by the Land Department, and it is the law. Mr. Coggins says:

I would suggest an amendment to this act: "Provided, That within the limits of the railroad grant, lands cornering should be considered as contiguous and in compact form."

That applies to this particular condition, and it is the amendment which I have offered.

Mr. KINKAID. There is no objection to the amendment.

Mr. RAKER. I want to read this one statement which illustrates the matter before the House:

I ran onto a case like this in Nevada, where there was plenty of water available from underground sources in section 12, but the land was unfit for agricultural purposes, being strongly alkaline. The land, however, in the cornering section 14 was entirely suited to agriculture and could be irrigated from the water developed in section 12, where the poor land was. Under section 14 the water table was at a great depth and in an insufficient quantity for irrigation purposes. It was not possible under any law to so combine the source of the water with that of the good land. It was either to stick in section 14 with plenty of good land and no water or else remain in section 12 with plenty of water and the poorest of the poor land.

In the interest of the true development of these arid lands I would ask that you place before the proper committee the suggestion that I have made in order that it may be incorporated into the bill.

Thanking you for your help in these matters, I am,

Very truly, yours,

ARTHUR L. COGGINS.

This condition applies not only to Nevada but also to California, and I think it ought to be corrected so as to permit a man in that territory, where the railroad land is in alternate sections, to make use of section 12, for instance, and also section 14, so as to utilize both. That is all this is for; but under the bill as it stands now he can not take it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I should like to ask a question. The lands in Nevada are used largely for grazing purposes rather than agricultural purposes. Suppose a man takes one of these two-year permits and does not do any work at all but digs a well?

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. The bill provides that he shall do his work expeditiously.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. What does "expeditiously" mean?

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. Within six months.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Does it say within six months?

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. He must make a showing within six months.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. In the first part of the bill it provides that the land shall not be fenced or otherwise exclusively used by the permittee, except as provided in the bill.

Mr. RAKER. He can not fence it. He can only use the land.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

I doubt the advisability of enacting this legislation, though I do not know that I want to advise anybody to vote against it. I do not want to be on record, however, as having indicated that I believe that this is helpful and safe legislation. I hope it may turn out better than I think. My prophecy is that under it many applications will be made and permits will be granted to people who will make little or no effort to develop water, but will seek to withhold the land from entry. I think I can readily see how under it the very condition would arise that arose years ago under an apparently innocent bill, which provided for the construction of storage reservoirs on public domain. Under that law the Department of the Interior was compelled to draw regulations contrary to the provisions of the law in order to prevent the public domain in vast areas being taken and held without any intent to improve. I hope we shall not have the same result under this law.

As to those who do in good faith go on this land with the view of developing water, it may be that the provisions of the bill are not too liberal. There is so much land in Nevada that needs water, and of so little value without water, that perhaps it is right to grant it without the restrictions that we have required elsewhere. Under this law we give a man 640 acres for reclaiming 20 acres; perhaps that is wise. I have some doubts, but under the provisions of the law there is great danger of the practice growing up which I have just suggested of claiming vast areas of land under this law without development and withholding it from any other development, with the expectation of securing some special grazing benefits for the time being.

But, Mr. Speaker, whatever we may think of the bill the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] has no virtue at all as far as I can see. Within the railroad land grants the railroad owns the alternate sections, checkerboard form. If one should be entitled to take four sections of land, separated from each other by the alternate railroad sections, and if on one of them the permittee should develop water, he ought not to be allowed to select from two sections which simply corner on each other. There would not be one case in a hundred that the applicant would have any purpose in doing that. But permission to secure a permit covering four sections of land so situated would multiply four times the very danger I have suggested, of people going in without any intent or purpose to really develop water, establish a claim to four sections of land cornering on each other and separated by a railroad land grant land which the applicant would probably own. It would be a wonderful opportunity to secure a large range area, or control it, under the pretense that the party was endeavoring to secure water.

Mr. RAKER. What good would it do him except to bore for water? He could not fence it; he could not use it; he could not put it to any other use.

Mr. MONDELL. That was exactly the argument, almost word for word, made at the time we passed the apparently innocuous reservoir bill; but the fact was that locations were made covering whole counties. I recall well one county in one of the Western States, every acre of which was covered by one of these reservoir locations. For the time being it paralyzed all development except such as might come under that particular law, and little or no development did come under that law, so that it did paralyze development. At the end of the filing period another filing was put on the land. Of course, the Secretary of the Interior could not send enough agents out there to keep track of each filing on four sections of land to detemine whether the permittee was proceeding with due diligence to sink a well. That is impossible unless we are to increase greatly the force of public land agents. Therefore, questionable as the bill is as a whole, the amendment is much more questionable than the other provisions of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment to page 4, section 5, line 15.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 15, after the word "selected," insert the words "with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior."

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, in the policy of this bill it seems we are embarking on a decidedly new field, and it may be that the conditions in the State of Nevada are such as authorize this legislation. It is entirely local. It is made, I suspect, in realization of the limited agricultural and grazing area in the State of Nevada now and the very small population of the State. At the same time, as the gentleman from Wyoming has said, it opens a new field for what may be the desire of some persons to get beyond the law, to do something beyond the mere boring for water, to do something that may not advance the agricultural interests in the State of Nevada. If there be anything concealed in the bill by which the Government might be defrauded out of valuable land, if there be any obscure and ambiguous language by which the Secretary of the Interior may not at all times have the proper jurisdiction or control of the allotment of the land, I think that should be made clear.

Therefore, the amendment that I have offered is intended to have a continuing authority in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior until the final allotment is made by the permittee. The law as it is now written permits an arbitrary selection by the permittee, and surely in the conferring of this great public boon, in conferring private title to public lands on a man who says that he is going to bore for water and who does in fact secure some water, it would seem that continuing jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior should apply until the land is actually transferred.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. Mr. Speaker, I would call the gentleman's attention that on page 2 of the bill there is a provision that the land shall not be fenced or otherwise exclusively used by the permittee except as therein provided, and there is a further provision that the land shall theretofore have been designated by the Secretary of the Interior subject to disposal under the provisions of this act.

Mr. GARD. I understand that, but that is not what I mean.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. And also on the first page there is provision that it should be unreserved, unappropriated, nonmineral, nontimber. The idea all the way through is to allay any suspicion. If there is a joker in this bill, I do not know it.

Mr. GARD. And I do not say that there is, but those in charge should admit that the allotment to the permittee should be at all times under the control of the Secretary of the Interior. Does not the gentleman believe that that is true?

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. Yes. The amendment is agreeable to me, but it would have to go back to conference.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman says that the amendment is agreeable to him, and it would seem to me that we are embarking upon such an unusual procedure in giving up the public domain to private enterprise that this amendment as it has been accepted by the gentleman in charge of the bill should be adopted.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Speaker, the amendment proposed by the able gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] would not change the effect of the bill in the least degree, in my humble opinion, and, therefore, it would do the bill no serious injury to adopt the amendment. But I do not rise to oppose the amendment, but wish to speak briefly with reference to the attitude of our very able floor leader, the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], to whom I always accord a comprehensive knowledge of the public-land laws and public-land conditions. I think there is no Member of Congress who is any better grounded on this subject matter than is the gentleman from Wyoming. I have always regarded his opinion as highly valuable on all public-land questions. However, I think the objection which the gentleman from Wyoming has made here should not operate against the enactment of this bill upon its merits, because his objection only goes to the possibility that the Secretary of the Interior might not be able with his usual amount of diligence and vigilence to prevent fraud in the operation of the measure. This may occur with regard to any public-lands measure. If a loophole be open in this bill for the perpetration of fraud, I suggest that the gentleman from Wyoming, who is very capable of preparing a proper amendment, do so and preclude anything of this kind. The great area in the State of Nevada which yet belongs to the Government should not be allowed to remain a desert merely for the want of water to reclaim it to a profitable cultivation or merely for the want of appropriate language to prevent fraud in the operation of the law.

Mr. Speaker, the bill wisely provides that the development shall be commenced within six months, and it also provides that on a showing made to the Secretary of the Interior that if diligence is not being shown in the development the right to the privilege granted under the application and entry may be revoked.

Mr. Speaker, the homestead laws of the United States are a misfit for the State of Nevada; that is, the ordinary homestead laws under which homesteads were taken up in the humid regions of the West—in the States of Illinois, Iowa, Nebraska, Kansas, the Dakotas, and Oklahoma.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KINKAID. And the desert-land law which used to permit acquiring title to 640 acres in these desert regions is a misfit in respect to the State of Nevada, because there are no streams there from which water may be taken by gravity and carried on to the lands to be reclaimed. So that the desert-land law is not applicable to the State of Nevada. But here is a proposition which I am sure will appeal very persuasively to this Congress, which wants to restrict appropriations as far as may be. The public treasury is not called upon to exepend one cent, and attention has been called to the fact that a bill for $50,000,000 is pending in the Committee on Appropriations, and I will say there is another for $100,000,000, for appropriation for reclamation purposes, which I introduced myself for the reclamation of arid lands. The Government would be out this money for the time being, although eventually it would be reimbursed every dollar; but here the individuals and the corporations who may make applications under this proposed law would be out all of the money and would assume all the risk, and it is a gamble as to whether they will get any water or not. The Government will not be out one dollar, and individuals, enterprising individuals, public spirited individuals in the State of Nevada who want to see their desert areas developed will assume all the cost and risk. Mr. Speaker, we should give the people of Nevada the chance to do for themselves what the Government has been doing for other regions and localities.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has again expired.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio. Here is a State of 81,000 population, just one-third the number of people in the usual congressional district in my State. Here is a bill permitting the drilling for water in an unsettled country in order to develop it. The only purpose that the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio could have would be to send this bill back to conference. The very provision that he attempts to place in this bill is well guarded in the section read and referred to by the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. EVANS]. This is the history, gentlemen, of the Western States, that you have to pass liberal laws permitting development before you will get them settled up by substantial people. The western part of Texas for many years lay there dormant until liberal laws were passed by the Legislature of Texas that enabled men to go there and drill 400 to 800 feet and develop that section of the country. Ten years ago there were 80,000,000 acres of school lands in western Texas undeveloped. Liberal laws were passed permitting men to go there and settle and develop and get homes, and to-day they are settled by small farms, which never would have been done if it had not been for those liberal laws. This bill permits men to develop the State of Nevada, that has about one-third the area of my State and one-third the population of my congressional district. I say the bill ought to pass in its present form, and the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio ought to be voted down, because the only purpose it can have is to send this bill back to conference. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That all entries made and patents issued under the provisions of this act shall be subject to and contain a reservation to the United States of all the coal and other valuable minerals in the lands so entered and patented, together with the right to prospect for, mine, and remove the same. The coal and other valuable mineral deposits in such lands shall be subject to disposal by the United States in accordance with the provisions of the coal and mineral land laws in force at the time of such disposal. Any person qualified to locate and enter the coal or other mineral deposits, or having the right to mine and remove the same under the laws of the United States, shall have the right at all times to enter upon the lands entered or patented, as provided by this act, for the purpose of prospecting for coal or other mineral therein, provided he shall not injure, damage, or destroy the permanent improvements of the entryman or patentee, and shall be liable to and shall compensate the entryman or patentee for all damages to the crops on such lands by reason of such prospecting. Any person who has acquired from the United States the coal or other mineral deposits in any such land, or the right to mine or remove the same, may reenter and occupy so much of the surface thereof as may be required for all purposes reasonably incident to the mining or removal of the coal or other minerals, first, upon securing the written consent or waiver of the homestead entryman or patentee; second, upon payment of the damages to crops or other tangible improvements to the owner thereof, where agreement may be had as to the amount thereof; or, third, in lieu of either of the foregoing provisions, upon the execution of a good and sufficient bond or undertaking to the United States for the use and benefit of the entryman or owner of the land, to secure the payment of such damages to the crops or tangible improvements of the entryman or owner, as may be determined and fixed in an action brought upon the bond or undertaking in a court of competent jurisdiction against the principal and sureties thereon, such bond or undertaking to be in form and in accordance with rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, and to be filed with and approved by the register and receiver of the local land office of the district wherein the land is situate, subject to appeal to the Commissioner of the General Land Office: Provided, That all patents issued for the coal or other mineral deposits herein reserved shall contain appropriate notations declaring them to be subject to the provisions of this act with reference to the disposition, occupancy, and use of the surface of the land.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire of the gentleman in charge of the bill whether or not more than one patent can be issued to a single permittee?

Mr. KINKAID. No; that is expressly prohibited.

Mr. ELSTON. No; I can not find it in the bill. There is a provision here that only one permit shall be issued to any person in any 40 square miles. Does the bill authorize a permit to be issued to that same person outside of that area? If so, the process may be multiplied so that a single permittee may acquire an area of land greatly in excess of 640 acres. It might give him many thousands of acres. Now, I do not know whether that is good or bad policy, and I would like to know whether that is protected in the bill?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. If a man bored a well once every 40 miles, he could not bore a great many before he would get across the State, and I do not see where——

Mr. ELSTON. I understand it is not 40 miles square, but 40 square miles. That is 4 by 10.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. It is 40 miles square.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I do not see how anybody could monopolize anything by that.

Mr. ELSTON. I understood it was 40 square miles. The gentleman's explanation minimizes my objection.

Mr. KINKAID. I will suggest to the gentleman that all entries of this kind under public-land legislation is limited to one entry to one individual or corporation. That is the system of public-land legislation throughout. It is all in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. ELSTON. A man could not get many 640-acre tracts with the larger limitation of area?

Mr. KINKAID. No; it is all in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. ELSTON. The gentleman means the number of patents that may be issued after permits have issued. Of course, the permits are not restricted in number, except as to this restriction as to area.

Mr. KINKAID. I understand there will be but one application granted.

Mr. ELSTON. The bill does not say that at all. It says as many applications as——

Mr. KINKAID. I am sure it is implied. That is the system of public-land legislation in general. The homestead law does not say a man shall have but one entry, but he can not have but one entry except where it is provided he can make up for what he lacks in area.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. If anybody can be found who would bore a half dozen wells in 640 acres in Death Valley, it seems to me it ought to be permitted.

Mr. KINKAID. The very object is to encourage that procedure.

Mr. JONES of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman permit a question? Do I understand that the "valuable mineral deposits" would include oil and gas?

Mr. KINKAID. Oh, yes; certainly, those are all minerals.

Mr. SINNOTT. And the courts have determined that?

Mr. JONES of Pennsylvania. I know that some courts have not determined that.

Mr. SINNOTT. The Interior Department and the Supreme Court have decided that.

Mr. KINKAID. That is thoroughly covered.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. EVANS of Nevada, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

COMMUTATION OF QUARTERS FOR OFFICERS OF THE NAVY AT SEA.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass House joint resolution 213.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan moves to suspend the rules and pass the joint resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 213) continuing temporarily certain allowances to officers of the Navy.

Whereas since it now appears that peace will not have been declared by October 1, 1919, on which date officers of the Navy, by operation of law, will cease to receive the benefits prescribed in the act of April 16, 1918 (Public, No. 129).

Whereas said benefits will accrue to officers of the Army until peace shall have been declared: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the paragraph in the act of July 11, 1919 (Public, No. 8), which reads as follows:

"The act of April 16, 1918 (Public, No. 129), granting under certain conditions to every commissioned officer of the Army the right to quarters in kind for their dependents or the authorized commutation therefor, including the allowances for heat and light, shall hereafter be construed to apply to officers of the Navy and Marine Corps only during the period of the war and in no event beyond October 1, 1919," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KELLEY] is recognized for 20 minutes and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] for 20 minutes.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under the act of April 16, 1918, commutation of quarters and for heat and light for officers in the Army serving abroad was authorized. Under general law, passed in 1907, that carried with it commutation of quarters and for heat and light for the officers of the Navy and Marine Corps also serving similarly. The whole period of this authorization of April 16, 1918, was for the duration of the emergency. When the Congress passed the last naval appropriation bill we supposed that the emergency would be over by October 1, 1919, and we put a provision in the naval appropriation bill granting commutation of quarters and for heat and light until October 1, 1919, only.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman contend that repealing this section now—October 1 having passed—continues these allowances?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. That is my understanding.

Mr. WALSH. Then, if that continues them, it certainly does not continue them temporarily?

Mr. PADGETT. The original law simply provided that the commutation should continue during the emergency, and the language of the naval appropriation bill provided that for the Army and Marine Corps it should not be considered to extend beyond October 1. Now, repealing that clause in the naval appropriation bill lets it revert back on the original act and just allows it to them during the emergency, the same as the Army is getting, and puts the Army and Navy and Marine Corps back on the same basis.

Mr. WALSH. Now, let us see if that is so, if the gentleman will yield further. October 1 has passed. The law was in effect which prohibited these allowances being continued beyond October 1. Now, I suppose the assumption is that on the 1st of October these allowances ceased?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. They did.

Mr. WALSH. And you contend that subsequent to October 1, by repealing this statute, you can revive another law to which this was an amendment?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I will say to the gentleman, no. The act which gives the officers of the Navy and Marine Corps the right to commutation of quarters was passed April 16, 1918, for the Army alone. Now, by a prior act, I think passed in 1907——

Mr. WALSH. March 2.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. March 2, 1907, the commutation of quarters and for heat and light for the Navy and Marine Corps is the same as that for similar grades in the Army. Now, if we repeal this provision put in the last naval appropriation bill it puts it back upon the same basis as though this paragraph we are seeking to repeal had never been passed at all, from this date forward.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield? As I understand the gentleman, if this bill you seek to repeal were not on the statute books there would be no limitation?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. There would be no limitation until the emergency is over.

Mr. FESS. And the existing law would continue it up to the time of the end of the emergency?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. That is correct.

Mr. FESS. The repeal of this simply repeals the limitation on the original law?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. The gentleman states it perfectly, I think.

Mr. WALSH. If the gentleman will yield, I would want to be pretty sure that the Comptroller of the Treasury would hold that way before I would make that contention. They were getting these allowances under the law which had been amended——

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. No. The gentleman is mistaken about that. They were getting these allowances under the law passed in 1907, which made the commutation of quarters for officers in the Navy and Marine Corps the same as for the officers in the Army. We did not change that law at all. That has not been changed in any respect.

Mr. WALSH. It has been modified.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Not that law. The laws of 1907 and also of 1918 have not been modified in any respect. We amended neither of those acts. What we really did was to approximate the date of the ending of the emergency as October 1, 1919.

Mr. WALSH. Well, October 1 has come and gone. Allowances have been discontinued. Now, you can not, after a date has passed and beyond which the law shall not be effective after that date has passed, then come in and repeal that paragraph and revive and put into force the original law again.

Mr. PADGETT. It would meet your objection, then, if you would say, where the words are "is hereby repealed," to strike out the period and insert "effective September 30." And that would make the repeal——

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. That is not the gentleman's contention.

Mr. PADGETT. That is not necessary under this law. That is the idea he has.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. The gentleman is wrong about it. Let me state this question so as to have it clear.

The law of 1907 provides that commutation of quarters for the Navy and Marine Corps shall be the same as for corresponding officers in the Army. Now, in 1918 a law was passed giving commutation of quarters to the officers of the Army serving abroad. That carried with it automatically, without any legislation at all, commutation of quarters for the officers of the Navy and Marine Corps serving similarly. When we passed the last appropriation bill we put in a proviso that it should not go further than October 1, 1919. Now, by removing that proviso it leaves the legislation just as it stood before the passage of the last naval appropriation bill.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICKETTS. That law is dead, as I understand it?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. No; the law is not dead.

Mr. RICKETTS. The provision you made in the appropriation bill is ended?

Mr. PADGETT. It simply said it would not be construed as applying to the Navy.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. We simply said that this commutation of quarters should not go forward longer than October 1, because we supposed the emergency would be over at that time.

Mr. RICKETTS. Is it not out of the way?

Mr. PADGETT. No.

Mr. RICKETTS. I take it that you limited the effect of that law up to October 1, 1919.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. No. We sought to fix the time of the emergency.

Mr. RICKETTS. In other words, you said the emergency would end on October 1?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Yes; but it has not ended.

Mr. RICKETTS. It has not ended?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. No. If we repeal the paragraph placed in the last naval bill, the commutation of quarters will continue as long as the emergency lasts. I think the situation is prefectly clear.

Mr. HICKS. Are we not doing this—we are just killing a provision that we put on the existing law; and, therefore, by removing that it really puts the old law into continuous operation?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. But you are killing that provision which expires by its own limitation.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. No.

Mr. WALSH. That date has gone, and if the Army and the Navy have been receiving these allowances since October 1 they have been doing it in violation of the law.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. The provision we put on did not affect the Army.

Mr. WALSH. One further question. Does the gentleman know whether or not the Navy and the Marine Corps have been receiving these allowances from the 1st of October to date?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. They have not.

Mr. WALSH. Have they been receiving any allowances?

Mr. PADGETT. They have been receiving allowances under the general law, but this was a special act passed at the beginning of the war that extended commutation to the Army, and which was to continue during the emergency.

Mr. WALSH. You want these allowances continued?

Mr. PADGETT. We repealed that law.

Mr. WALSH. Then, if you want these allowances continued, what difference is it whether you repeal this or not?

Mr. PADGETT. They stopped on October 1, and by repealing that limitation they go right on under the general law that was passed in 1907. I believe that was the date.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. I want to know if I understand the situation correctly. My understanding is that after we got into the war a law was passed under which, for the period of the emergency, and limited to the period of the emergency, certain allowances were made to the officers of the Navy.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Officers of the Army.

Mr. MONDELL. This applies to the Navy.

Mr. PADGETT. Another general law makes it apply to the Navy.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Another law, passed in 1907, provides that allowances for the Navy shall be the same as for the corresponding officers in the Army. That took in the Navy and the Marine Corps, although they were not mentioned specifically in the act of 1918. It has been so ruled, and they have been so paid. When we passed the naval appropriation bill we assumed that the emergency would end by October 1, and so we provided that these allowances for the Navy should not go beyond October 1. Now the emergency has not ended. The Army officers similarly situated go on drawing the commutation of quarters if serving abroad, but the Marine Corps and naval officers serving abroad or at sea can not draw commutation for quarters since October 1 on account of this limitation.

Mr. MONDELL. Then the effect of your legislation will be to reestablish, from the time this law passes until the end of the emergency, the right to these allowances?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. That is it exactly.

Mr. MONDELL. It probably will not warrant the payment of these allowances from October 1 up to the present time?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Possibly not.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I differ with the gentleman there. It is perfectly easy for us to make a law retroactive so far as allowances are concerned. Up to the time of the date mentioned in this act—that is, up to April 16, 1918—you had a general law that makes these allowances?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Yes; and that is still in force.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. At that time you put a limitation on it?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. No. We passed a new act providing for certain allowances during the emergency for officers of the Army serving abroad. Before that they could not get commutation of quarters and of heat and light if serving outside of the jurisdiction of the United States. So that law was passed. The old law of 1907 made that automatically apply to both the Army and Navy, and if we had not put any provision in the naval appropriation bill to change it, everything would have gone on smoothly until the emergency was over. We supposed it would be over on October 1, and so we put in that date.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. These allowances were going on, and would have continued until some other arrangement was made if you had not put this provision in the last naval appropriation bill?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. And by this present provision you simply take off the limitation?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Could not the process sought to be accomplished be carried out by simply striking out the words "and in no event beyond October 1, 1919"?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. That could be done, but the entire paragraph may as well come out. No part of it is needed.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Then you do not have to repeal the whole provision. It certainly, according to——

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. We did not need to affirmatively provide in the naval appropriation bill for payment to October 1. That would have been done had we simply let the matter stand as it was.

Mr. LONGWORTH. According to the gentleman's statement, as I understand to-day, these allowances will be continued in the case of the Army, but not in the case of the Navy and Marine Corps after October 1.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. After October 1; yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Why not strike out the words "and in no event beyond October 1"?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Well, we may as well strike it all out, leaving it as if no provision had been in the naval appropriation bill at all.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I confess I do not get that clearly.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I am like the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH]. I confess I am in a fog.

Mr. LONGWORTH. It is as clear as mud to me.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. This act of April 16, 1918, provided that the provisions for special allowances should hereafter be considered to apply to officers of the Navy and Marine Corps only during the period of the war, and in no event beyond October 1, 1919.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That is the point the gentleman is trying to avoid, because the period of the war is still on.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I will say to the gentleman that it did not apply by its terms to the officers of the Navy or Marine Corps at all.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Why not? It says it shall be construed to apply to the officers of the Navy and Marine Corps only during the period of the war, and in no event beyond October 1, 1919.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. If the gentleman will listen to me carefully, I will state it once more. I think anybody ought to be able to understand it: In 1918 Congress passed an act giving certain allowances to officers in the Army, who were serving abroad, for commutation of quarters and for heat and light. Nothing was said in that act about the Navy or the Marine Corps at all, but by a previous act passed in 1907 automatically those same commutations and allowances applied to officers of the Navy and the Marine Corps of similar rank. Now, last summer when we passed the naval appropriation bill we put on a provision saying that these allowances should end on October 1. If we repeal that provision, the acts of March, 1907, and April, 1918, will control the payment of commutation of quarters for officers in the Army and the Navy and the Marine Corps alike, and that is all we have got to do.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. What was the effect of that law? Did it take anything away from the officers in the Army or Navy?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. It did not take anything away from the officers of the Army.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Did it add something to them?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. No; it did not touch the legislation respecting the Army in any way.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. But with respect to the Navy? Why did the naval act of 1919 say that the act of April, 1918, should apply to officers of the Navy and Marine Corps in no event beyond October 1, 1919?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. We thought that the emergency would be over by that time, and fixed that date, and based our appropriation accordingly.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Conceding that you thought the emergency would be over by that time, what was the object of the law?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. To stop these commutations on that date.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Why did you want to stop these commutations on that date?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Because we thought the necessity would be over, and that the officers would be back in their usual status.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. In other words, before that time they were getting something which, as of October 1, 1919, you wanted to take away from them?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Why do you want to restore it to them now after October 1 has arrived and passed?

Mr. PADGETT. Because the emergency still exists.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. You passed that provision while the emergency existed, with the purpose of taking away these allowances from them on October 1, 1919. You declared that in no event, that is to say, whether the war was over, or not, should they receive the allowances after October 1, 1919. Now when October has arrived you say you want to give the allowances back to them.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Officers in the Army who are serving abroad are now drawing these allowances for their families, but Marine Corps officers serving in the Army also, in the same field abroad, are not permitted, if this law stands after October 1, to draw their allowances, and it would be a discrimination against the Navy and Marine Corps such as Congress never intended should be made. That is why.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. We ought to pay these officers, not according to what somebody else is getting, but according to what is just and proper in their respective cases. If in the summer of 1919 you thought that these allowances ought to be taken from these officers as of October 1, 1919, why do you now think that they ought to be restored? The fighting is long since over.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Would there be any necessity for the repeal of this section if the words "and in no event beyond October 1, 1919," were not in it?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Not at all.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Why, then, do you not simply eliminate those words?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. That could be done in that way, but we do not need any part of the paragraph, so we eliminated all of it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Then why was the paragraph ever passed? Why did you adopt it at all if there was no necessity for it?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. It was unnecessary, very likely, except in so far as it describes the situation we intended to limit.

Mr. LONGWORTH. And the committee guessed wrong about it, but why not simply eliminate their wrong guess?

Mr. PADGETT. We are doing that.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I am afraid you are not.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. We made the appropriation for the commutation of quarters for officers, being an appropriating committee, and we had to have some particular date in mind in fixing the amount of money. We felt quite sure that peace would be officially declared by October 1, and so we put that date in the bill as marking the end of the emergency.

Mr. PADGETT. It was in a spirit of overeconomy.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman wants to accomplish the same thing I do, but in a different way.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] has 20 minutes.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I am opposed to this proposition, and I imagine the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] favors it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks some one who is opposed to the joint resolution should be recognized.

Mr. PADGETT. I will yield to the gentleman from Virginia such time as he desires.

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Let me make my statement first.

Mr. BRIGGS. Certainly.

Mr. PADGETT. Let us bear in mind that nothing has been repealed. The act of 1907 provided that the commutation of quarters for the Army, the Navy, and the Marine Corps should be the same; in other words, that the Navy and the Marine Corps should have the same commutation as is provided by law for the Army. That is the general law. That law is in force now, unamended and unrepealed.

After we got into the war the act of April 16, 1918, provided for an extension of commutation of quarters, light, and heat for the Army. The Navy was not mentioned in the act; the Marine Corps was not mentioned. It just provided for the Army. That was to continue during the emergency.

As soon as that was enacted the Comptroller of the Treasury held that the Navy and the Marine Corps were entitled to the same additional commutations as provided by this act for the Army under the provisions of the general law of 1907, and they have been receiving it, and were receiving it, up to October 1. In this past summer, when we were making up the naval appropriation bill, there was a provision inserted which read as follows:

> The act of April 16, 1918, granting under certain conditions to every commissioned officer of the Army the right to quarters in kind for their dependents or the authorized commutation therefor, including the allowances for heat and light, shall hereafter be construed to apply to officers of the Navy and Marine Corps only during the period of the war, and in no event beyond October 1, 1919.

Now, the effect of that was that it did not repeal anything, did not change the law except that it should not be construed to apply to the Navy and Marine Corps, but left it in force as to the Army.

When you come down to brass tacks, the Naval Committee in the spirit of extreme economy that was prevailing, trying to bring the bill down to bedrock, put on that limitation, guessing that the war would be over by October 1. Now, that guess has not materialized. The result is that now the Army is receiving it, and by this provision which we are repealing we are providing that it shall not be construed to apply to the Navy and Marine Corps after October 1.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. By repealing it you provide that it shall not apply to the Navy at all, even during the emergency.

Mr. PADGETT. No; we simply repeal the provision of July 11, 1919, which leaves the act of April, 1918, in full force, and applying to the Navy as well as to the Army.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Let me ask the gentleman if the words "and in no event beyond October 1, 1919," had not been put in as a result of a bad guess, would you need this legislation?

Mr. PADGETT. No.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Then, why not just strike it out?

Mr. PADGETT. If we strike it out, we strike out the whole provision in the act of July 11, 1919, which provided that the act of April 18 should not be construed as applying to the Navy beyond October 1. The phraseology is entirely correct.

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. What serious objection could there be to an amendment to this effect, that "the benefits of the act of April 16, 1918, shall continue to apply to officers of the Navy and Marine Corps"?

Mr. PADGETT. That would be all right; that would be doing just what this does, taking the obstruction out of the way. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. SAUNDERS.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I have been trying in vain to secure light on one point that has been developed in this argument. The gentleman from Tennessee speaks of seeking to remove an obstruction which appears to have been the creation of the Naval Committee. Why did this committee create this obstruction? I have asked that question of all of the gentlemen who have spoken for this resolution and up to the present time have received no satisfactory reply. Why was obstruction created, I ask again?

Mr. PADGETT. I have stated that it was in a spirit of overeconomy, trying to reduce the naval appropriation bill to the uttermost limit. We put it in, assuming that the emergency would be over by October 1.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. And to convey the impression that these officers would not receive these allowances after October 1?

Mr. PADGETT. And they would not have gotten it, and they will only get it if this is enacted, up to the expiration of the emergency.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Not at all. As I understand this, if you adopt this resolution, these payments will continue for all time.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Oh, the gentleman is entirely wrong.

Mr. PADGETT. The act of April 11, 1918, authorizes only up to the termination of the emergency.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Where is that?

Mr. PADGETT. The act of April 11, 1918.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. On page 2 of the report the gentleman will find it—

> Be it enacted, etc., That during the present emergency—

And everything following that is qualified by that statement, "During the present emergency." It will stop for the Army, the Navy, and the Marine Corps altogether then.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Then this "obstruction" that the gentleman speaks of was created during the war, and took away from the naval officers as of October 1 the benefits that they would receive up to that time.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. That is right.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. And you want to wipe the "obstruction" so that they will continue to receive these benefits so long as the war goes on?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. That is correct.

Mr. PADGETT. And no longer.

Mr. MONTAGUE. To put them upon the same footing as the Army.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Oh, that does not appeal to me at all. We have passed more vicious legislation since I have been in the Congress upon the suggestion that the Army or the Navy was not getting something that the other was getting than I think is to our credit. We ought to deal with these matters on their merits, and when a bill is presented dealing with a situation in the Navy, it should not be sufficient to say that because the Army is getting something, therefore the Navy ought to get it, or if it is an Army bill that because the Navy is getting something, the Army ought to get the same thing. I am concerned more with the merits of the pending proposition.

Mr. PADGETT. The merit of the proposition is simply this, that the law provides that the commutations of the three services, the Army, the Navy, and the Marine Corps, shall be the same. That is fundamental.

Mr. MONTAGUE. And have been for many years.

Mr. PADGETT. Since 1907.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. If that is so, you do not need this legislation.

Mr. PADGETT. Oh, yes; we do. On April 11, 1918, we provided some additional commutations on account of war conditions, to continue during the emergency, and under that first provision the Navy and the Marine Corps were getting the benefit of it. Now, we come along on July 11, 1919, and say that the act which says that they shall be the same shall not be construed to give these additional commutations to the Navy and the Marine Corps beyond October 1. Now, we are just taking out that obstruction.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. In other words, the show of economy that you were seeking to make to the House and to the country at that time, you are now seeking to make of no effect as soon as the law begins to operate.

Mr. PADGETT. To continue during the emergency.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. You provided that the allowances should not continue beyond the 1st of October in any event.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Creating thereby the idea that the Naval Committee was effecting an economy, but as soon as the economy begins to be effective, the Naval Committee hastens forward with a resolution to wipe out the law that is operating in this unexpected fashion. The economy that you were arranging for could not operate before October 1, and as soon as it begins to operate, why the committee comes forward, and says that it ought not to operate. I do not think that puts either the House or the committee in a very desirable light.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Oh, the gentleman is entirely under a misapprehension as to the attitude of the committee.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] has used at least two minutes of my time, and I ask him to yield me that much time.

Mr. PADGETT. I yield the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. The Naval Appropriation Committee was endeavoring to appropriate all the money that the Navy would require, but no more.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. If this pay went on for an entire year, the sum to be fixed in the naval appropriation bill would be one thing and we would have to spread it out on the country.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. And so we thought we made a reasonably good guess that the whole matter would be settled by October 1, and we made the appropriation accordingly and that is all there is to the history of the transaction.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Oh, that is not all.

Mr. PADGETT. And there is another thing that was before the committee, and that is this, that if the declaration of peace is proclaimed there might be some little controversy holding on definitely, running along after the declaration of peace, and we said the pay should not go beyond October 1.

Mr. LONGWORTH. May I ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I will yield.

Mr. LONGWORTH. If this law is repealed, what law is in effect?

Mr. PADGETT. The act of April 11, 1918, stands in full force, and the act of 1907, which provides commutation for the Navy and the Marine Corps shall be the same as the Army; and the act of April, 1918, simply provided for the Army, and by interpretation of the other acts the Navy got the benefit of that legislation. I will yield the gentleman from Virginia two more minutes.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I think I will certainly get through in two minutes unless the gentleman from Tennessee wants more time. Mr. Speaker, I think that at last I understand the legal effect of what the committee is proposing to do and the legal effect is undoubtedly to leave the situation as I have stated that it would be. The committee has given to the country the impression that they were going to save money through the provision in the last naval bill, that they would certainly reduce expenses of this Government by cutting off certain allowances as of October 1, 1919. The gentleman can not controvert that proposition. I again call attention to the fact that the very moment that this reduction becomes effective, the committee comes forward to say that this would be all wrong, that they wish to take back what they have done, that they made a bad guess, and that these allowances which were proposed to be cut off, and which we have cut off for a few days as a result of the legislation of July, 1919, ought to continue, in other words that this reduction which we hoped to secure by this legislation of July, 1919, shall not become really effective. It will not become effective if we pass this resolution. As soon as the hope of reduction held out in the act of July becomes a reality we are asked to efface the reality. The promise of reduction appears to have created vain hopes.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. I will yield.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman state what the emergency is that makes it desirable to repeal this limitation which has already expired?

Mr. PADGETT. The emergency is the high cost of living and the general law which provides that the Navy shall have the same that the Army has, and this simply puts the Navy and Marine Corps in the same condition of the Army, and the law says they shall be under this condition and is temporary.

Mr. WALSH. Was the guess about the high cost of living or the termination of the war when it was fixed in October 1? Nobody expected the high cost of living was going to cease by October 1.

Mr. PADGETT. That is one thing the Navy is up against as well as all the people.

Mr. WALSH. Every branch of the service.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. I do.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Is the meaning of the word "emergency" as given by the gentleman the high cost of living, and not the duration of the war?

Mr. PADGETT. No.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. How long will this emergency last?

Mr. PADGETT. Which one?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Only one has been mentioned.

Mr. PADGETT. The emergency referred to is the termination of the war.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Is that perfectly clear?

Mr. PADGETT. That is the act of April 16, 1918, and that stands in full force.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. New and troublesome conditions might arise after peace is declared, would you speak of them as an emergency?

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. I will.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I am still a seeker after the light. If this paragraph which we now propose to repeal had never been enacted would the Navy to-day draw exactly the same commutation?

Mr. PADGETT. Exactly, and when this is enacted they will draw just exactly what they have been drawing up to October 1.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Then this paragraph was purely a restrictive measure?

Mr. PADGETT. Exactly so.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I think I follow now, and I am prepared to vote.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I think we ought to have a record vote on a proposition like this.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the bill pass under suspension of the rules?

The question was taken.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia makes the point of order of no quorum present. It is clear there is no quorum present.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Will this vote——

The SPEAKER. It is too late now for a parliamentary inquiry.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 7417. An act to amend an act of Congress approved March 12, 1914, authorizing the President of the United States to locate, construct, and operate railroads in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes.

ADJOURNMENT.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned to meet to-morrow, Tuesday, October 7, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, committees were discharged from the consideration of the following bills, which were referred as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9223) granting a pension to Ezra Shanks; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9774) granting an increase of pension to Josephus McMurtrey; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. THOMPSON: A bill (H. R. 9775) granting an increase of pension to Margaret I. Reider; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. ESCH: Petition of the Anti-Saloon League of America, protesting against legislation granting liquor permits to pharmacists; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. FOCHT: Papers to accompany House bill 9549, granting a pension to Mrs. Sadie Doan; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HERSEY: Petition of sundry citizens of Brownville, Me., urging repeal of tax on soda, ice cream, etc.; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. KIESS: Papers to accompany House bill 9076, for the relief of James A. Roche, alias James Brady; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. OSBORNE: Petition of Angel City Court, No. 579, Catholic Order of Foresters, Los Angeles, Calif., protesting against the enactment of the Smith-Towner bill, to provide for a department of education, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Education.

By Mr. WASON: Petition of Maxwell Grey and 21 other residents of Whitefield, N. H., urging the repeal of motion-picture taxes; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. WHITE of Maine: Petition of American Legion of Maine, praying for an investigation of alleged unjust punishments and other wrongs to members of the American Expeditionary Forces and for the punishment of officers responsible therefor; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, October 7, 1919.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the folowing prayer:

Almighty God, we seek Thy favor and guidance for the tremendous duty that is upon us this day, with far-reaching influence, that we may have the divine sanction upon that which we say and do, and that out of all our planning and purposing there may come a sweeter comradeship in a common service and a unity of faith and purpose and ideals among all the people of this land, that we may live and serve and sacrifice for the advancement of Thy kingdom of righteousness and truth in the world. We ask it for Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. SMOOT and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Beckham	Chamberlain	Cummins
Ball	Borah	Colt	Dial
Bankhead	Brandegee	Culberson	Dillingham

Edge	Kendrick	New	Smith, Ariz.
Elkins	Kenyon	Newberry	Smith, Md.
Fletcher	Keyes	Norris	Smoot
France	King	Nugent	Spencer
Frelinghuysen	Kirby	Overman	Stanley
Gay	Knox	Page	Sterling
Gerry	La Follette	Penrose	Sutherland
Gronna	Lenroot	Phelan	Townsend
Hale	Lodge	Poindexter	Trammell

Hitchcock	Moses	Sherman	Watson
Jones, Wash.	Myers	Shields	Williams
Kellogg	Nelson	Simmons	Wolcott

Mr. NEWBERRY. The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS] are engaged in a committee hearing.

Mr. DIAL. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. SMITH of South Carolina] is absent on account of illness in his family. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. GAY. The senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] is detained from the Senate by illness.

Mr. GERRY. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is detained from the Senate by illness in his family. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] are absent on official business. The junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON], and the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] are detained from the Senate on public business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-two Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills:

S. 9. An act to encourage the reclamation of certain arid lands in the State of Nevada, and for other purposes; and

S. 2100. An act authorizing the Union Pacific Railroad Co., or its successors, to convey for public-road purposes certain parts of its right of way.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 425) to establish the Zion National Park in the State of Utah, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 794) granting lands for school purposes in Government town sites on reclamation projects, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 55) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to adjust disputes or claims by entrymen, selectors, grantees, and patentees of the United States against the United States and between each other, arising from faulty surveys in townships 36, 37, and 38 south, ranges 29 and 30 east, Tallahassee meridian, in the State of Florida, and for other purposes, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 2945) to authorize the sale of certain lands at or near Minidoka, Idaho, for railroad purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

REPUBLICAN PLATFORM IN MASSACHUSETTS.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, yesterday I stated, in response to an interrogatory, that I would have inserted in the RECORD the Republican platform adopted at Boston, Mass., a few days ago, which I now ask leave to do. I also ask permission to have inserted in the RECORD an account in the Boston Herald of the adoption of the platform in the convention, and also the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Boston Herald, October 5, 1919.]

SPEEDY RATIFICATION IS FAVORED, BUT WITH RESERVATIONS—SENATOR'S STAND FULLY INDORSED.

The delegates to the Republican State convention, held yesterday in Tremont Temple, adopted resolutions on the league of nations designed to satisfy those of their party who desire speedy ratification of the peace treaty and its integral covenant. They then proceeded by tumultuous applause and deafening cheers to express themselves in heartfelt accord with Senator LODGE in his leadership against the treaty in its present form, even though he and his associates in the United States Senate may by their opposition finally cause the death of the plan by which the peace council at Paris hopes to bring about practically the cessation of war in the world. * * *

The determination of a majority of the delegates to stand by Senator LODGE was first indicated when Speaker Joseph E. Warner, chairman of the committee on resolutions, began reading the all-absorbing resolution. "We therefore favor prompt ratification of the treaty of peace without amendment—" He got no further, for his unusually strong voice was drowned by the shouts of "No!" "Never!" "Nothing of the sort!" and similar expressions of disapproval that came from all parts of the great auditorium. A few cries of "Yes" were heard, but they were as nothing compared with the volume of hostile demonstration.

EXTRACT FROM PLATFORM.

"We therefore favor prompt ratification of the treaty of peace, without amendment, but with such unequivocal and effective reservations as will make clear the unconditional right of the United States to withdraw from the league upon due notice; as will provide that the United States shall assume no obligation to employ American soldiers or sailors unless Congress shall, by act or resolution, so direct; as will make it clear that no domestic questions, such as the tariff and immigration, will be taken from the control of the United States, and that the United States shall be sole judge as to the interpretation of the Monroe doctrine. There must be no abridgment of the sovereignty of the Nation, of the control of its own domestic affairs, or of the maintenance of its national policies.

COMMENDS SENATOR LODGE.

"The Republican Party commends the broad and far-sighted statesmanship of its senior Senator, HENRY CABOT LODGE, whose experience, integrity, and wisdom continue to reflect honor upon the State, which is proud to regard him as its senior and foremost representative in the Congress of the United States, and heartily indorses his efforts to bring about prompt action on the treaty."

SENATOR HERO OF THE HOUR IN CONVENTION—ACCEPTS PLATFORM IN SPEECH THAT STIRS HEARERS—BOUND BY HONOR TO WAGE BATTLE—DECLARES SHANTUNG ARTICLE MORALLY INDEFENSIBLE—POLITICAL ERROR—WOULD GIVE UNITED STATES EQUAL VOTE—SAYS TREATY CAN NOT BE HURRIED THROUGH SENATE LIKE A BRIDGE BILL.

Senator HENRY CABOT LODGE was given a tremendous ovation in the Republican State convention yesterday when he arose to explain to the delegates his attitude toward the peace treaty and its accompanying covenant of the league of nations. The convention had earlier adopted the compromise plank on the subject, as printed in another column. His address was frequently interrupted by cheers and applause.

"I know that the hour is late—I will try to be as brief as possible—but there are a few words that I must say," he began. "I am glad you have adopted that platform of principles without debate. With the statement in regard to reservation, it is needless to say that I am in full accord. I accept the platform. I have no desire to discuss it. But there is one single point on which, in simple honesty to you and to myself, I must make a statement.

"The words are there, 'without amendment'—'ratification without amendment.' That is the opinion of the convention—of the committee first, then of the convention. I did not contest it, but I must express my own opinion upon it, in justice to you as well as to myself.

"I have already voted for amendments. I voted for the only amendments that have been presented by the Committee on Foreign Relations. I voted for them as chairman of that committee, and I am bound, not only by custom, but also by honor, to keep faith with the committee. I can not reverse or change what has happened, even if I desired to, and I do not so desire, for I should not have voted for the amendments in the committee or the Senate on Thursday unless I thought they were right.

AMENDMENT VS. RESERVATION.

"Far too much emphasis is placed, I think—both in the Senate and elsewhere—on the difference between an amendment and a reservation. There is a difference, of course. But the amendment requires the assent of every signatory, and the argument is made that it would cause great delay—the reconvening of the conference. You can not reconvene it, for it has never adjourned," he said, amid laughter. "It is sitting in Paris now.

"Every nation which signed the treaty is there fully represented today, and I had a letter from one of our delegates the other day saying he had hoped to get home at an earlier date, but saw no prospect of it yet. They are still rearranging the map of Europe. The Turkish treaty is not yet made; the Bulgarian treaty, so far as I know, is not yet made. As they are there on the ground, no great time would be wasted.

"But I do not wish to argue that point. I wish merely to say to you that there are only two more amendments of consequence now before the Senate, which I voted for in committee, which I reported to the Senate. One is the amendment striking out the provision regarding Shantung from the treaty. In the very platform in which you have enbodied these words 'without amendment' you have condemned Shantung yourselves. Three of our delegates to Paris protested against it. The President himself had no word in its favor. He said that it was necessary to secure the adhesion of Japan. The Secretary of State testified on the stand that in his belief, even if it had been refused, Japan would have signed. The President said when we talked with him at the White House that he thought the Secretary of State was wrong.

GREAT WRONG TO CHINA.

"In the Shantung provision we turned over the control of a great Province with nearly 40,000,000 people to Japan—turn over a great and friendly people, a democratic people, who were allies and associates with us in the war against Germany, as was Japan. We take Shantung from China and hand it over to Japan with an indefinite promise that some time she will turn it back. It is a great wrong. It is morally indefensible as well as politically shortsighted.

"Gentlemen of the convention, I must vote against Shantung, whether it be by amendment or by reservation, whenever it is presented to me—I can not do otherwise. I would do it if I voted alone. Though I am drawing near the end, I will not leave as a legacy to my children and my grandchildren an apology for my having voted for the confirmation of a great wrong.

"The other amendment is to give the United States an equal vote in the league with any other nation. I think perhaps it is an old-fashioned idea, but I think that at whatever council table the United States may sit her vote should be the equal of any other nation there. ('Massachusetts will stand by you,' cried a voice in the audience.)

"Just a few words about delay. Yes, there has been delay. It is nearly a year now since the armistice was signed, and seven months of that time with the treaty has been passed in Paris. What caused the delay? Attaching the league of nations to the treaty with Germany. If the treaty with Germany had been taken up and disposed of we should have had peace with Germany last April. That treaty as it is, with the league of nations tied to it, came into the hands of the Foreign Relations Committee for action on July 14. There it is," he said, holding up a bulky report. "How many of you have read it? How many of you have read article 1? Don't too many speak at once.

CAN NOT HURRY THE SENATE.

"Article 1 is the league of nations. That treaty, in 270 quarto pages, was put into the hands of the committee on July 14. We had 45 working days and we sat on 37; the intervals were caused by the failure to get witnesses. We had 42 sittings. We did all that men could do to get through with that treaty as rapidly as possible. We reported it to the Senate on September 4. I have kept it before the Senate every day from that time to this, and gentlemen who think that the United States Senate—and I am speaking of both sides—can be easily hurried had better try it.

"The debate is just as much from one side as the other, and it is fundamentally right. This is the greatest question ever presented to the Senate of the United States—the question of the future of the country, of the character of our Government. This is an agreement we are entering into for all time, and it certainly deserves the consideration of the United States Senate, whose responsibility is equal to that of the President of the United States. It has been pressed; it will be pressed. But you can not hurry it; you can not shove it through; you can not dispose of it as if it were a bridge bill. That is impossible and would be wrong.

"I want a league of nations. My idea of a league of nations was that we should start building on The Hague conventions, which did a great and good work. I wish to see, as Mr. Root himself desired above all things, a codification of the international law which has been torn to pieces and cast to the winds by Germany. I wish to see the great feature of an international court with judges. Those are the purposes which the league should serve first. What have we got? We have got a document that never mentions The Hague conventions, that never says anything about international law, and the only court is pushed into one article.

PURELY POLITICAL ALLIANCE.

"Who decides the questions before this league? Men politically appointed—every one of them. It is a political alliance and nothing more and nothing less. Every member of the council and in the assembly are political appointments, and they vote necessarily—I do not blame them—for expediency and in the interest of their own countries. But when we enter into a political alliance it is right that we should be careful. Remember that they all—I do not grudge them a thing they have got—but they all get great advantages in territory, in money, in commercial benefit. We have taken nothing, and I am proud of it. We ask nobody to guarantee our boundaries. We have no territory we want to seize. We have no commercial advantages we want to take. But as we ask nothing, surely we shall have a right to say what our burden shall be when we enter the league.

"I am not disturbed by the cry of isolation. You can not isolate the United States. It may be, as I heard an eloquent orator once say, that eminence is always isolated. It may be that we have a high level. But we shall have our share in the affairs of the world.

"Now I have told you briefly what this is—a political alliance. Here are the reservations—those you have indorsed and approved in your platform, for an agreement upon which I have been laboring all summer long. They are known by my name. I have not been willing to take less—I have not sought to get others, although others will no doubt be offered.

RIGHT OF WITHDRAWAL.

"The first refers to the right of withdrawal. In the first draft you could not withdraw at all. Owing to some expostulations on the part of Senators and of other perverse people outside, like Mr. Root, they came back with a provision giving the right of withdrawal on two years' notice. But they added to it a proviso that all international duties and all duties in the league must be fulfilled, and the vote would have to be unanimous.

"Under the rules of the league one vote could prevent withdrawal. The council is not only to see whether we had fulfilled our duties to the league, but, in case we asked to withdraw, whether we had fulfilled all our international obligations, and it would go over all our treaties and ask whether we had kept our faith. Now, we have never yet broken faith in a treaty, and I object to submitting the good faith of the United States on international matters to a council of nine members, of which we have one.

"The next is Article X—the famous article which provides for a guaranty against external aggression of the territorial integrity and political independence of all the members of the league. It is an individual guaranty; it requires no action on the part of the league to operate. We to-day are guaranteeing Panama for obvious reasons. If there were 10 other countries guaranteeing Panama joined with us, and Panama called upon us for the fulfillment of the guaranty, we are bound, no matter whether she calls on the other indorsers or not.

AS TO OBLIGATIONS.

"This Article X guarantees every boundary in the world, and the political integrity of every country, and once decided by this treaty, they can never be changed.

"Here is a case which might arise very easily: Suppose China wanted to aid the people of Shantung who had risen in revolt against the Japanese Government—and it is a harsh government—we should be bound under that treaty to send troops to aid Japan to put down China. I can not consent to give to any other nations the power to enter into war or to send American soldiers and sailors abroad without the consent of the American people and their representatives in Congress.

"The obligation, they say, is a moral one. Ah, Mr. President, I can draw no distinctions between moral and legal obligations when the United States sets her name to a treaty. All treaties, except those under duress—like the one imposed on Germany—rest on moral obligations, and I want it made clear as the sunlight that no foreign nations can ever order United States troops or United States ships anywhere without the free action of Congress, untrammeled by any obligation. I will vote—I say it to you frankly, for I have no secrets—I will vote to reject any treaty which contains a provision that gives to foreign nations any possible control over the United States.

DOMESTIC QUESTIONS.

"The next reservation covers domestic questions. There are contingencies in which the league would have the power to pass upon our domestic questions, and if we were a disputant we could not vote. I will take only one example. I can never vote to permit any country to say who shall come into the United States. The right regarding entrance is essential to any country, and the country which does not control admission to its citizenship and its shores is a subject and a conquered country, whether it is such by treaty or by arms. We can not assent to that. When the President—whose illness we all deplore—presented the article about the Monroe doctrine to the conference he said it was new, and that was all he said. The delegates of Great Britain explained—and it has never been contradicted—that if any question about the Monroe doctrine arose under article 22 the league would decide. It is called 'a regional understanding.' It never has been an understanding. An understanding requires more than one in international law. It is our policy—it is all our own. We never asked anybody to accept it. We have never asked anybody to share it. We have sustained it, and we propose to continue it, to have it our own doctrine, to be interpreted by us alone.

ONLY WAY TO SAVE TREATY.

"These are the reservations. When I studied the situation in Washington it became perfectly clear to me that that treaty could be saved in but one way, if it was to be saved at all, and that was by reservations. If those reservations I have described should fail to be put in, that treaty is dead. Three days ago that would have been merely my assertion, just as true three days ago as it is to-day, but on Thursday we demonstrated it.

"The Fall amendments were simply intended to take our commissioners—out of 30 or 40 commissions to settle boundaries—to take them out of the commissions in regard to business which did not concern us which were not vital. They will all be covered in the reservations. The first one was a very unimportant one, and, in a full Senate, even that amendment had 34 votes. If anyone takes the trouble to calculate one-third of 96 and then add two to 32, he will find there were two more than a third. The next one showed 37 on a full vote of the Senate, and the last one, which involved troops in Silesia—we have just sent two regiments to see to the plebiscite—that one on a full vote of the Senate would have shown 41 votes.

OBTAINED AN AGREEMENT.

"If those amendments, all to be covered by reservation, received such votes as that, what chance do you think that treaty has unless the reservations I have described are made? There would be nearly half the Senate voting against it without the reservations. People forget what is the truth with many Senators to-day on this question. They do not care a straw what becomes of them or their fortunes; personally, they have been deaf and are deaf to cries of party expediency either for or against. They believe, rightly or wrongly, down in the depths of their being, that that treaty as it stands puts America in danger. They will not let it live unless it is safe for the United States.

"There are men there, strong men, too, who would kill it at all hazards. I have stood there trying to get an agreement on these four reservations. I think I have succeeded completely, and if those reservations are adopted the treaty will be saved—saved probably with not more than one amendment. Why, Mr. Taft has come out twice last week, deploring the President's attitude and urging the adoption of reservations. And they must be real reservations—they must mean something. Shams—"interpretive" shams. The purpose of a reservation is distinct from an amendment in that it applies to the reserving power alone; it takes the reserving power out so far as the reservation defines it. Those reservations must make the United States safe. They must be real reservations. They will be.

NEVER A PARTY QUESTION.

"This is not a party question, never has been, can not be. It is an American question. At the same time, as the discussions have gone on, we have to-day practically all Republican Senators agreeing on these reservations. The chairman of the national committee is for them; an overwhelming number of the members of the national committee are for them. I am getting telegrams day by day from State committees all over the country who are for them. Even Mr. Taft has found them necessary, and the Republicans of Massachusetts, in my judgment, are strongly for them, too.

"One word more and I have done. The fight I have made has been in the interests of America, in the interests of the United States. If I have gone too far, that is the height of my offending, and I would rather go too far in defense of the interests of the United States than go too short a way.

"I wish for peace—no one more than myself. No one who has had to take the dread responsibility of declaring war can ever want anything but peace. But beware that a great and good name is not used for unhappy purposes, as a cover for evil methods. The highest aspiration of man is the religious aspiration by which he tries to lift himself from earth to heaven. And yet what crimes, what wars, what persecutions from the dawn of man's recorded history have been made in the name of religion.

LEAGUE ENDANGERS INDEPENDENCE.

"A great French woman, we are told, stood on the guillotine in the French Revolution and said, 'O, liberty, what crimes are committed in thy name.' There is no nobler impulse in the human heart, no finer desire than liberty. Tacitus, the great Latin historian, in his 'Life of Agricola,' puts into the mouth of a British chieftain trying to rouse his people against the Roman Empire the words, said of the Romans, 'They make a solitude and call it peace.' That is one bad method by which to get peace. There are others almost equally bad.

"There may be bad methods for a noble purpose. I know thousands of good men and women who desire peace, the peace of the world, who ask for this league, but who have not stopped to study it. This league, this political alliance, as it stands, will, in my judgment, cause more wars than would have ever come without it. But however this may be, it is certain that it will endanger the welfare, the sovereignty, and the independence of the United States.

"We can do more for the world, strong, free, disinterested, than we can by tangling ourselves in every quarrel in Europe. They say the world looks to us. The world looked to us in 1917. Did we fail? We went in and turned the wavering scale. No league sent us there. The United States will always go to the defense of human liberty and civilization. Under the pressure of the great menace of German autocracy, I helped to send the United States on that mission. On a like demand I would do it again, much as I hate war. But I will not, if I can prevent it, have my beloved country tangled in every petty broil of Europe. We shall all be better liked by them, stronger to help them, if we are true to ourselves. That is not selfish. Keep the United States strong, keep her free, keep her untrammeled. I tell you that is the best service we can render to the peace of the world, for when the United States fails, the world and peace fail with her."

INDUSTRIAL DISTURBANCE.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present an editorial from the Manufacturers' News, of Chicago, relating to some labor agitation. I ask to have it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none.

The Secretary read as follows:

[From the Manufacturers' News.]

"WHY SHOULD THEY BE TOLERATED.

"Why a few people are permitted to create the industrial disturbance that now exists in this country without being locked up is something no man can answer. Such is the case, however, and as long as such conditions do obtain it is the duty of every decent citizen to recognize his obligation to the community, put his shoulder to the wheel and do his part toward maintaining peace and quiet. We have had all the 'safe for democracy' talk we want. We would like to see some kind of a government where each citizen recognizes the right of each and every other citizen; a government where property and the individual rights of each and every other citizen are recognized, and a government that gives protection.

"The Fitzpatricks, and the Fosters, and the Gompers, and their kind of people are a very small portion of the community. Why should they be tolerated? Why should they have the power to stop a great business like the steel industry, starve a lot of people, break up homes, ruin families, deprive babies of their milk, and bring on as much distress and suffering as the plague brought to the children of Israel? Yet Mr. Fitzpatrick has the entree to the Executive Mansion. He is recognized by other public officials and men in authority and yet, politically, he can not lift a pound. There is not a politician of any note in the State of Illinois who gives 2 cents for what John Fitzpatrick thinks or does from a political standpoint.

"He was brought before the bar of the house of the Illinois Generaly Assembly a few years ago, sputtered and stewed, made threats—and never carried out one of them. No one was defeated. No one was the worse off and Fitzpatrick was forced to take his medicine like a spoiled child. In Illinois, from a political standpoint, he is a joke and a shining example of the biblical saying, that a prophet is not without honor save in his own country."

STRIKE OF STEEL WORKERS.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, in a recent issue of the Washington Post appeared the following Associated Press dispatch, which I will read:

PITTSBURGH, PA., October 3, 1919.

While the virtual deadlock continued to-day in the steel strike in the Pittsburgh district, leaders of the organized workers were making plans to finance a prolonged struggle.

The 24 international presidents of the unions involved in the strike will meet with the executive council of the American Federation of Labor at Washington Monday for the purpose of discussing plans for the paying of strike benefits, it was announced at national headquarters here. The federation is expected to levy assessments on all its members to aid the benefit fund, it was stated. The individual international unions are reported to have large defense funds available for paying benefits.

The average benefit paid by some unions is $7 per week for single men and $9 for married men, H. C. Hughes, international president of the coopers' union, said. The amount varies in the different unions. He estimated that $2,000,000 per week will be necessary to cover the benefit fund.

From this article I suppose that every Federal employee who is a member of the Federal Employees' Union, which is affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, will soon be paying money that he has drawn from the taxpayers of the country, through the United States Government, to keep up a strike which is actively led in part by William Z. Foster, who was recently, if, indeed, he be not now, a notorious syndicalist, revolutionist, and enemy of organized government and of all orderly society.

It was testified recently, I understand, before the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia that the police forces of 37 cities in this country are now unionized and affiliated with the American Federation of Labor. If this article be true—and I suppose it is, coming from an authentic source—I assume that very soon each one of the policemen of the police forces of those 37 cities of the United States will be contributing money to maintain a strike and maintain industrial unrest and disorder, led by a man who has been very recently an acknowledged enemy of all organized government, and it is generally believed that he has not changed his heart on that subject any more than he has changed the color of his skin, and that he is now just what he was recently, in that respect. I do not believe he has changed a particle, and I think few others, if any, believe it.

I see the steel strike is resulting in riot, lawlessness, and defiance of the duly constituted authority of the land; that the United States armed forces have been called out in two States—Indiana and Illinois—to preserve the peace and to defend peaceable people against the attacks of strikers who resort to lawlessness. Yet if this article be true—and I have no doubt it is—the policemen who are affiliated with the American Federation of Labor and every employee of the Government who belongs to the Federal Employees' Union, which is affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, will soon be paying taxpayers' money, which they have drawn through appropriations by law, to support those strikers who are indulging in rioting, lawlessness, and disorder, and who are led by a man who was very recently, if he is not now, an enemy of this Government and of all organized society.

I simply mention these matters in order to call attention to some of the results of the unionization of Federal employees when affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, and especially to the result of policemen being affiliated with the American Federation of Labor. The police force of the District of Columbia is now affiliated with the American Federation of Labor; it has a charter from that organization, and the affiliation is complete. It is true a good many of the policemen, doubting the wisdom of the action, have withdrawn, but I am informed the majority of them remain affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, and, based on this information, I suppose that those policemen of the District of Columbia who are now affiliated with the American Federation of Labor will very soon be contributing money out of their pockets, which Congress has voted to them, taxpayers' money, in order to keep up this industrial unrest, this disturbance, this strike, which is led by a man who is generally believed to be just as much an enemy of this Government and of organized society to-day as he ever was—William Z. Foster, acknowledged former syndicalist and revolutionist, now active in the steel strike, which, in my opinion, is one of the most unjustifiable strikes which was ever precipitated upon the American people.

PEACE TREATY AND LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, on yesterday morning the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], with the consent of the Senate, had inserted in the RECORD several pages of a telegram sent to him by the California branch of the League to Enforce Peace. I now send to the desk a letter received from that organization by a constituent of mine and ask that the Secretary may read it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

"LEAGUE TO ENFORCE PEACE,
"New York, September 29, 1919.

"To friends of the league of nations:

"In the past the nations of the world have been organized for war; the league of nations proposes to organize them for peace. It proposes to substitute the rule of international justice for the rule of force. Without the league of nations the world faces a crushing race of armaments, another war more destructive than all former wars, and the suicide of civilization.

"And yet in the face of these alternatives the league is now facing a bitter partisan attack in the United States Senate. The next few weeks must decide whether or not the United States shall enter the league of nations, whether or not, indeed, there shall be a league of nations; for as the opposing Senators themselves have said, 'Without us the league is a wreck, and all the gains from a victorious peace are imperiled.'

"There must be courageous action. Public opinion in every State must be organized and trained on Washington. The campaign must go on until the Senate vote on ratification is taken.

"All this will require funds, immediate and adequate. We are going ahead with our work, confident that the real patriots of America—those who understand why our country fought this war—will rally to the call. Are you one of them?

"We are not asking you to sign a pledge card; the time is too short for that. Won't you send your check to-day? Next month may be too late.

"Yours, very truly,

"HERBERT S. HOUSTON,
"Treasurer."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, the "suicide of civilization" is, of course, of some interest, but I think comparatively slight as compared to the "coin"; certainly the exhortation to send a check to-day is extremely interesting. That communication was preceded by a telegram which I will now ask the Secretary to read. This league lets no grass grow under its feet, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

"NEW YORK, September 17, 1919.

"Personal and confidential.

"Humanity, commerce, industry, labor, and the whole social order need immediate ratification of the peace treaty and the covenant of the league of nations. It is vitally important that you shall communicate with your Senators, preferably by telegraph, urging them to ratify promptly and unreservedly. If you have already done so, do it again in a positive and conclusive manner, get others to do the same. This is the time for us to strike straight from the shoulder with all our strength behind the blow. There is no time to lose.

"LEAGUE TO ENFORCE PEACE."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, if you have done it already, "hit 'em again." Mr. President, here is the sequel. They do not "weary in well-doing," and it is profitable to the telegraph companies, I have no doubt. I ask that the Secretary read the telegram which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read the telegram.

The Secretary read as follows:

"NEW YORK, October 2, 1919.

"Mr. EDWIN BINNEY,
"Sound Beach, Conn.:

"The League to Enforce Peace—William Howard Taft, president, A. Lawrence Lowell, chairman—is conducting an active and necessarily expensive campaign to secure an expression of public opinion that will compel ratification of the peace treaty without reservations that would require resubmission to the Paris conference or a separate treaty with Germany. Will you not help the cause by a substantial contribution?

"HERBERT S. HOUSTON,
"Treasurer,
"GEORGE W. WICKERSHAM,
"VANCE MCCORMICK,
"CLEVELAND H. DODGE,
"OSCAR S. STRAUS,
"Finance Committee."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, of course it is necessarily "very expensive," but such poor men as Cleveland H. Dodge and Mr. Straus have to be helped out in time of trouble. I ask the Secretary to read the response of my constituent to that pathetic appeal.

The Secretary read as follows:

"THE LEAGUE TO ENFORCE PEACE,
"Bush Terminal Sales Building, New York:

"I'm strongly opposed to league of nations covenant unless it be properly amended to protect America.

"If quick action is necessary, suggest you appeal to President Wilson to remove his objections to proper amendments.

"EDWIN BINNEY."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. They will not take no for an answer, Mr. President, so they come again. This is the way the money they ask for is being spent. I ask the Secretary to read the communication I send to the desk.

The Secretary read as follows:

"LEAGUE TO ENFORCE PEACE,
"New York, October 3, 1919.

"MY DEAR MR. BINNEY: This is to confirm the telegram of our finance committee, as follows:

"'The League to Enforce Peace—William Howard Taft, president, A. Lawrence Lowell, chairman—is conducting an active and necessarily expensive campaign to secure an expression of public opinion that will compel ratification of the peace treaty without reservations that would require resubmission to the Paris conference or a separate treaty with Germany. Will you not help the cause by a substantial contribution? Herbert S. Houston, treasurer; George W. Wickersham, Cleveland H. Dodge, Vance McCormick, Oscar S. Straus, finance committee, Bush Terminal Sales Building, New York.'

"The alternative to a league of nations is a crushing race for armament, another war more destructive than all former wars, and the suicide of civilization. The crisis is at hand. We must act quickly, and trust that you will send us the largest check convenient by return mail.

"We need your help and cooperation at this time if we are to overcome the vast amount of studied and intentionally confusing misinformation with which the country is being flooded regarding the provisions and working of the league of nations as organized in the Paris covenant. All this will require funds, immediate and adequate. We can go ahead with our work only as those who understand why our country fought this war rally to the call.

"Yours, very truly, HERBERT S. HOUSTON,
"Treasurer.

"Mr. EDWIN BINNEY,
"South Beach, Conn."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, it is too bad, the rate at which civilization is committing suicide. I thought, once dead, it would stay put; but no; the "suicide of civilization" has become a weekly occurrence. Mr. President, I have another letter written by Mr. Binney to me, which I ask the Secretary to read.

The Secretary read as follows:

"NEW YORK, October 6, 1919.

"Hon. FRANK B. BRANDEGEE,
"United States Senator,
"Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

"MY DEAR SIR: While I presume you have seen all this stuff, I am handing you the circular letter, folder, etc., from the League to Enforce Peace, which followed the telegrams I mailed to you on the 4th instant.

"Very truly, yours, EDWIN BINNEY."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, it is very edifying to observe public opinion in the process of being manufactured by the contributions of patriotic and deluded citizens. I do not know how many people in other parts of the country have been taken into camp by this persistent and expensive propaganda, but I think there are a few in my section of the country who estimate this sort of an appeal at about what it is worth. For the people who contribute their hard-earned money to this sort of scheme I have little sympathy, because if their money is not taken from them by this organization they are sure to have it taken from them by somebody else. It helps the telegraph companies and the printers and stationers. Col. Sellers said that there was "a sucker born every minute," and I presume the birth rate in that line continues uniform. I judge it must, from the constant output of this sort of literature.

Mr. President, we are all familiar with the character of propaganda. Hardly a measure comes before the Senate that somebody does not appoint himself a solicitor of funds to ask the "come on" people who are scattered throughout the country to please help finance the propaganda. So far as I am concerned I shall pay no more attention to this matter; but I simply wanted the Senate and the country to realize that this sort of stuff, as my constituent so well calls it, will not change a vote in this body. Votes in the Senate are not affected in that way.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I should like to add something to the Senator's statement. Connecticut is not the only sufferer from this foray. My own mails are filled with literature of the same kind. It all makes frantic appeals for instant contributions to relieve a depleted exchequer. It varies in the form of circular letters, telegrams, and typed letters, but it all amounts to the same thing—that they are in urgent need of funds, and now.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I send to the desk, and ask to have read, a telegram which explains itself.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

MESA, ARIZ., October 6, 1919.

Senator SMITH,
Washington, D. C.:

We, the members of the Methodist Episcopal Church in congregation assembled, representing a membership and constituency of 500, do declare in favor of a league of nations as the most feasible plan to prevent war and promote the Christian democracy and brotherhood for which Christ and His Church stand. We therefore urge our Representatives in Congress to vote to ratify the peace covenant, thus taking immediate steps in the name of God and humanity to allay the unsettled condition now confronting the world.

FIRST METHODIST CHURCH,
W. R. STEWART,
Special Committeeman.
D. H. REID, Pastor.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, in explanation of the resolution of the church in Arizona that the Senator from Arizona has just introduced, in order to show the origin of it, and that it was not altogether spontaneous interest in the league of nations on the part of that congregation, I submit and ask to have read a letter from the national committee on the churches and the moral aims of the war, signed by Henry Atkinson, secretary. I will say that this, also, will explain the flood of letters and telegrams from ministers throughout the country on this subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

NATIONAL COMMITTEE ON THE CHURCHES AND THE MORAL AIMS OF THE WAR,
New York, September 22, 1919.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: This committee, as you undoubtedly know, carried on a very extensive campaign in behalf of the war. It has been clear from the very beginning that the war would not be won, and the moral aims for which it was fought achieved, until a league of nations is established. A determined effort is now being made, however, within the United States Senate to defeat this necessary end.

Public sentiment alone will convince our Senators that America is resolved to help put an end to war by helping to control the forces which make war inevitable.

It would seem that the churches had done everything possible to impress the Senate with their determination to have the covenant adopted, but in the present exigency we feel that they must make one final effort. Anything less than this would be to fall short of our duty.

There are four things which can be done which will be of inestimable value in this crisis, and which may turn the scale and save the covenant:

(1) Write to your two Senators and send a copy of the letter to the Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE, chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee. Make your letter brief but emphatic, asking for speedy ratification of the peace treaty, including the covenant for a league of nations without any amendments which would send the treaty back to Paris.

(2) Influence at least 10 of your most influential friends to do the same thing.

(3) Arrange for a community meeting or a meeting in your church, where the matter may be discussed, and a new set of resolutions adopted to be sent to the Senators and to the Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE.

(4) Preach one more sermon on the subject.

Inclosed you will find copy of statements made by leading church bodies and a leaflet by Dr. Frank Crane.

I am also inclosing a postal card asking for your signature and permission to use it in a monster petition that is to be sent to Congress. If you will sign this card and mail it so that it will reach me by return mail, we shall very greatly appreciate your cooperation.

Yours, in behalf of a league of nations,
HENRY A. ATKINSON, Secretary.

P. S.—Please sign and mail the inclosed postal card at once.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I am very glad the Senator from Washington has had this letter inserted in the RECORD, because I am glad to know that a new organized effort is being made among the churches of the country for this great purpose. It is very true that religious sentiment may be overwhelmingly in support of a measure and yet may not make itself felt without an organized effort. Even the great work of the Red Cross and the universally supported work of selling bonds during the war had to be organized; and so it seems to be necessary in this case to make an effort to show what the real religious sentiment of the people is on this great moral question now before the country. The Senator from Washington has done a distinct service in showing that an organized effort is now being made among the churches to develop the sentiment.

One thing is very evident. There will be no organized effort among the churches of the country to oppose the league of nations. There is not enough sentiment of that sort to organize; and the fact that the churches are being appealed to to organize anew for this great work is very good evidence that the sentiment is there. It may not reach some of the Senators here who have made up their minds to stand through thick and thin, but it is going to show and it is going to be shown in the future development of sentiment on this subject in this country.

Mr. President, it is not only the churches, but it is the women of the country, it is the business men of the country, it is the laboring interests of the country, it is the public-spirited sentiment of the country, that is making itself felt, and it will make itself felt more and more the longer this fight lasts. I send to the desk a telegram from the Woman's Club of Central Kentucky, which I ask to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

LEXINGTON, KY., October 6, 1919.

Hon. G. M. HITCHCOCK,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

At the opening session of the Woman's Club of Central Kentucky the following resolution was passed:

"Resolved, That the Woman's Club of Central Kentucky request the United States Senate to ratify without delay and without amendment the peace treaty and the covenant of the league of nations, and that a telegram to that effect be sent to HENRY CABOT LODGE, leader of the majority, and to G. M. HITCHCOCK, leader of the minority of the United States Senate."

Mrs. SAMUEL HAMPTON HALLEY, President.
Miss N. ISABEL SCHMIDT,
Recording Secretary.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, it is very significant that these various organizations, representing the various elements of society, are speaking for the league of nations, and nowhere against it. Everywhere it is the women speaking for the league of nations; everywhere it is the churches speaking for the league of nations; everywhere it is the business organizations like the chambers of commerce speaking for the league of nations; everywhere it is the labor organizations speaking for the league of nations, and the bar associations. All of the high-class and intellectual and vital organizations of the country, wherever they speak, speak for the league of nations and for the ratification of the treaty.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a Senate document the various addresses of the President on his recent trip, already printed in the RECORD. I ask to have them printed as a Senate document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, in reply I should like to say to the Senator from Nebraska that my purpose in introducing the appeal from Mr. Atkinson, secretary of the Church Union on the Moral Aims of the War, was to show that this sentiment which is being expressed in telegrams and resolutions from church congregations and ministers is not indicative of any interest in the league of nations, or any information in regard to the contents of the covenant for a league of nations on the part of those persons who are communicating these telegrams and resolutions, but that on the contrary it is a manufactured propaganda, that it is being sent in at the request of this permanent organization, of which the Church Peace Union founded by Mr. Andrew Carnegie, whose name appears on the letterheads, is one of the principal agencies; that it is in response to requests sent out by a paid official, who is not a minister of the gospel in the sense that he is preaching the gospel in a church, but who is a man who earns his living by the activities of this organization, and that it is in response to his appeal from that one central source that this great propaganda has manifested itself.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, in partial answer to what the Senator says, I want to call his attention to the fact that it was necessary, even in organizing the Red Cross for the great work that it performed, to spend money on organization. It was necessary to organize and pay men in selling bonds of the United States in that great campaign. No organization that can be nation wide can be operated without the expenditure of money.

I received a telegram yesterday giving important news from California—a telegram comprising nearly 2,000 words. That had to be paid for by somebody. What is done is done openly; what is done is done legitimately and very properly.

I want to say to the Senator, in conclusion, if he wants to see the organized effort against the league of nations, let him look at the socialist and anarchist meetings of the country, the Bolshevik meetings of the country, the newspapers published in the interest of the anarchists and socialists and Bolshevists of the United States. Every one of them, without exception, is fighting the league of nations. They are his allies. They are his organs in this fight.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, the Senator talked a great deal about the Bolsheviki and it is not very long since he was talking about the pro-Germans being opponents of the league. It seems to be quite a bold attitude for a Senator to take who, while the fighting was good between the Allies and Germany, was doing what he could to retard it instead of forwarding it, at least up to the point where the United States declared war; who on various occasions introduced bills and resolutions in Congress for the purpose of thwarting the efforts of our allies in their war with Germany and to cut off the supplies of munitions that were necessary for them in order to carry on the war; who declared on various occasions in Congress that he sympathized with the Germans, and on other occasions that he was neutral in this war; who was not conspicuous at any time, even after we entered the war, in this great campaign that he speaks of, which was carried on for the purpose of waging it to a victorious conclusion. He only becomes prominent in his anti-Germanism and his denunciation of pro-Germanism after the fight is over, after the victory has been won.

There is always a certain type of men who safely place themselves on the very outskirts of a fight while the fight is going on, to observe, apparently, how it is going, and after it is over they immediately take the center of the stage and become exceedingly belligerent.

I remember also, while this great contest for civilization that the Senator from Nebraska speaks of was being waged, when one of the nations that were allied in the struggle against Germany abandoned the fight, made peace with Germany, and deserted its allies, those who are now advocating continued animosity toward Germany, who are launching their philippics against pro-Germans and Bolshevists, leaders, I may say, in this movement for a league of nations, were eulogizing the Bolsheviks, were then proposing that we should make peace with Germany ourselves on the same terms that the Bolsheviks made peace with them, quoting the language of the Bolsheviks, saying that the terms that they stated were the terms which appealed to reasonable men everywhere.

It is quite enlightening to refresh our minds on the attitude of these gentlemen by looking back over the records of Congress for a few months, comparing their attitude when the war was on with their attitude after the war is won.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator's reply is no answer to my statement that all the Bolshevists of the country, all the anarchists of the country, all the lawless elements of the country, are opposing this league of nations.

The Senator has charged me with being pro-German. He has charged me with not being a sincere supporter of the war. The Senator should remember that it was I who conducted the fight here in the Senate for the resolution for armed neutrality. The Senator should remember that it was I who conducted through to its passage the resolution declaring war on Germany. The Senator has no ground for saying that during the war which has passed I did not support the war to the uttermost of my strength, doing everything that I could to add to the efficiency of our departments fighting the war. The Senator knows that very well.

The Senator knows very well also that I have not charged him with being pro-German. I am talking about socialism and anarchy and Bolshevism organized to defeat this league of nations, not only in the United States but in every country in the world.

The Senator lugs in here the question of my record before the war. It is true that I did not get into the war until Congress voted the war. It is true that I was not a participant in the war when the United States was neutral. I stood for the neutrality of the United States, and I stood for it in my own way, independently. But when it came time for the United States to act, the Senator knows very well that I was one of those who did act here in the Senate, and I think the Senator will not find another Senator who acted more promptly or more energetically. He simply drags in now the charge of pro-Germanism, when I have not talked about pro-Germanism. I have not denounced Germany. I have not charged anybody with pro-Germanism. The time has passed to be either pro-German or pro-British. Now is the time when the question is whether we are going to stand for peace, a peace settlement that is going to be permanent.

I repeat my assertion that all the splendid elements of this country, the religious element, the high professional element, the organized working element, the organized women of the country, the organized laboring element of the country, all the organizations of the country that are nonpartisan and struggling for the good of the country, have spoken.

The Senator says we are organizing them. Why does not the Senator and some of the bitter-end fighters against this treaty seek to organize them? It can not be done, because the overwhelming sentiment of the country among all those nonpartisan organizations is for the league, and they know it. They can not organize them; they can not appeal to them. The influence that they can appeal to, and the only organizations in this country they can appeal to, are uncompromising, bitter partisanship, the anarchists, the Bolshevists, and the lawless elements of the country, which, like the lawless elements of all other countries, are against any effort to stabilize government and make the peace settlement secure and permanent.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator whether he included the Friends of Irish Freedom in the list of imposing organizations mentioned by him? I did not quite catch whether he did.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I did not include that. I will be very glad to include it if the Senator has any evidence.

Mr. PENROSE. I have no evidence. I was interested in knowing whether he had included them in the brilliant galaxy of associations that had indorsed the league.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the letter which I send to the desk be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

"CHICAGO, ILL., October 3, 1919.

"The Hon. MEDILL MCCORMICK,
"United States Senator,
"Washington, D. C.

"HONORABLE SIR: Propaganda which seems quite unfair is being carried on by an organization calling itself 'The National Committee on the Churches and the Moral Aims of the War.' As a clergyman, I have received some communications from this committee, and inclose one just received, thinking you might be especially interested in it, and that possibly some counterpropaganda in favor of the proposed amendments to the league document might be carried on.

"I was at the Auditorium at the meeting on the league of nations over which you presided, and greatly admire the splendid stand which you and your colleagues have taken.

"Respectfully, yours,

"PERCY W. STEPHENS."

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, I send up another letter from a clergyman, one of a great many, and ask that the last paragraph be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

"I am a Christian minister, but I would rather give up my church, take a gun and fight than see the United States knuckle down to the present half-baked 'covenant.' My best wishes to you in your efforts to secure a square deal for China and for the United States.

"Very sincerely, yours,

"EDWARD J. WEBSTER."

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, I merely wish to call the attention of Senators who have received copies of these letters of the League to Enforce Peace and of the National Committee on Churches and the Moral Aims of the War to the duplication, the overlapping, of the names of the distinguished gentlemen who are on the staff of the two organizations, Hon. William H. Taft, Alton B. Parker, Hamilton Holt, Sydney Gulick, of pro-Japanese fame. The same gentlemen patriotically enough, earnestly enough, generously enough, are engaged in the organization of the League to Enforce Peace and the National Committee on the Churches. They are within their rights, availing themselves of the funds supplied to them by other patriotic gentlemen, like Mr. Lamont and his colleagues in that house. Those of us who differ from the proponents of the league have not the financial resources to carry on this tremendous propaganda; but I venture to state that other Senators have received, as I have, letters from very many clergymen objecting to the propaganda as carried on.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska inadvertently referred to the bar association of the Nation twice in his eloquent remarks. I assume he referred to the American Bar Association, which is the great national bar association of the Nation.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I did not really refer to the national bar association, because I understood it was only the executive committee of that association which reported in favor of the league.

Mr. SPENCER. May I say to the Senator that he is mistaken about the executive committee. The fact of the matter is that the president of the association, perhaps without authority, appointed an independent committee of five to make a report on the league of nations. This committee of five reported three in favor of a league of nations and two opposed to it. One of the three, at the meeting of the bar association in Boston, which I had the pleasure of attending, was prompt in telling me that he did not agree with the report which he had signed with a majority of the committee. When that report came before the association, the association promptly refused to consider it, and postponed the entire matter for a year.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. TRAMMELL presented a petition of sundry citizens of Tampa, Fla., praying for the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Hastings, Starke, Baldwin, and Palatka, all in the State of Florida, praying for Government regulation of the meat-packing industry, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. PENROSE. I present a memorial from the Philadelphia Board of Trade opposing the so-called Plumb plan for the ownership and management of the railroads of the country. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented a petition of sundry citizens of Croswell, Mich., and a petition of sundry citizens of Dimondale, Mich., praying for the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of Local Grange No. 697, Patrons of Husbandry, of Kalkaska, Mich., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty unless amended to meet certain requirements, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of Local Union No. 431, Brotherhood of Railway Carmen of America, of Bay City, Mich., and a petition of the Odd Fellows Lodge, of Bay City, Mich., praying for the granting of a Liberty bond to each discharged soldier, sailor, and marine for every month of service, which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of Iron Post, No. 17, American Legion, of Iron River, Mich., praying for an investigation into the alleged unnecessary wrongs inflicted against officers and soldiers of the American Expeditionary Forces, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, of Lansing, Mich., praying for an investigation into the recent race riots throughout the country, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of the Common Council of Detroit, Mich., praying for an increase in the salaries of postal employees, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of Artesia Chapter No. 253, Order of the Eastern Star, of Artesia, Calif., and a petition of the Parent Teachers' Association, of Burbank, Calif., praying for the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. ROBINSON presented a petition of sundry citizens of Black Rock, Ark., praying that a tax be placed on the importation of pearl buttons, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. NEWBERRY presented a petition of sundry citizens of Grand Rapids, Mich., praying for the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, of Lansing, Mich., praying for an investigation into the recent race riots in the United States, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of the Common Council of Detroit, Mich., praying for an increase in the salaries of postal employees, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. TOWNSEND, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to which was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 151) to provide additional compensation for employees of the Postal Service and making an appropriation therefor, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 253) thereon.

Mr. OVERMAN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (S. 2323) to amend an act entitled "An act to repeal section 3480 of the Revised Statutes of the United States," reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 254) thereon.

Mr. PAGE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 1356) for the relief of Patrick Savage, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

ISSUANCE OF SECURITIES.

Mr. OWEN. On September 26 I reported favorably from the Committee on Banking and Currency the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 88) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense, and, for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to supervise the issuance of securities, and for other purposes," which is now on the calendar, being Order of Business No. 187. I desire at this time to submit, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, a report to accompany the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be placed printed.

THE POSTAL SERVICE.

Mr. TOWNSEND. From the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads I report back favorably, with an amendment, the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 151) to provide additional compensation for employees of the Postal Service and making an appropriation therefor, and I submit the majority and minority reports thereon.

I desire to say that to-morrow morning, or as soon thereafter as possible, I shall call up this joint resolution for consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be placed on the calendar.

POSTAL SERVICE IN HAWAII.

Mr. TOWNSEND. From the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads I report back favorably, with amendments, the bill (H. R. 7972) to improve the administration of the Postal Service in the Territory of Hawaii, and I submit a report (No. 252) thereon. This is an emergency measure brought to our attention by the Postmaster General and calls for no appropriation. I ask for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendments were, in line 4, after the words "Islands of Hawaii," to insert "in Porto Rico and the Virgin Islands," and in line 6, after the word "Honolulu," to insert "San Juan and Charlotte Amalie, respectively," and at the end of the bill to insert the following proviso: "Provided, That the Postmaster General be authorized to fix the salary of the postmaster at Honolulu at not to exceed $4,000 per annum," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster General is hereby directed to establish in the Islands of Hawaii in Porto Rico and the Virgin Islands, under appropriate regulations to be prescribed by him, such branch offices, nonaccounting offices, or stations of Honolulu, San Juan, and Charlotte Amalie, respectively, as in his judgment may be necessary to improve the service and as may be required for the convenience of the public: Provided, however, That such branches, nonaccounting offices, and stations shall be conducted under the name of the existing post offices affected so as to maintain the identity of the offices concerned: Provided, That the Postmaster General be authorized to fix the salary of the postmaster at Honolulu at not to exceed $4,000 per annum.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to improve the administration of the Postal Service in the Territory of Hawaii, in Porto Rico and the Virgin Islands."

RED RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. JONES of Washington. From the Committee on Commerce and for the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (S. 3096) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Red River at or near Moncla, La., and I submit a report (No. 251) thereon. This is a bridge bill, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, and it was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Parish of Avoyelles, in the State of Louisiana, be, and is hereby authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Red River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near Moncla, in said parish and State, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COURT IN RENSSELAER COUNTY, N. Y.

Mr. OVERMAN. From the Committee on the Judiciary I report back favorably, with an amendment, the bill (S. 2999) to authorize the holding of terms of the United States district court in Rensselaer County, N. Y. I call the attention of the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] to the bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I ask for the consideration of the bill reported by the Senator from North Carolina.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendment of the committee was to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That section 97 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, be, and it is, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 97. The State of New York is divided into four judicial districts, to be known as the northern, eastern, southern, and western districts of New York. The northern district shall include the territory embraced on the 1st day of July, 1910, in the counties of Albany, Broome, Cayuga, Chenango, Clinton, Cortland, Delaware, Essex, Franklin, Fulton, Hamilton, Herkimer, Jefferson, Lewis, Madison, Montgomery, Oneida, Onondaga, Oswego, Otsego, Rensselaer, St. Lawrence, Saratoga, Schenectady, Schoharie, Tioga, Tompkins, Warren, and Washington, and with the waters thereof. Terms of the district court for said district shall be held at Albany on the second Tuesday in February; at Utica on the first Tuesday in December; at Binghamton on the second Tuesday in June; at Auburn on the first Tuesday in October; at Syracuse on the first Tuesday in April; and, in the discretion of the judge of the court, one term annually at such time and place within the counties of Saratoga, Onondaga, St. Lawrence, Clinton, Jefferson, Oswego, Franklin, and Rensselaer as he may from time to time appoint; such appointment to be made by notice of at least 20 days, published in a newspaper published at the place where said court is to be held. The eastern district shall include the territory embraced on the 1st day of July, 1910, in the counties of Richmond, Kings, Queens, Nassau, and Suffolk, with the waters thereof. Terms of the district court for said district shall be held at Brooklyn on the first Wednesday in every month. The southern district shall include the territory embraced on the 1st day of July, 1910, in the counties of Columbia, Dutchess, Greene, New York, Orange, Putnam, Rockland, Sullivan, Ulster, and Westchester, with the waters thereof. Terms of the district court for said district shall be held at New York City on the first Tuesday in each month. The district courts of the southern and eastern districts shall have concurrent jurisdiction over the waters within the counties of New York, Kings, Queens, Nassau, Richmond, and Suffolk, and over all seizures made and all matters done in such waters; all processes or orders issued within either of said courts or by any judge thereof shall run and be executed in any part of said waters The western district shall include the territory embraced on the 1st day of July, 1910, in the counties of Allegany, Cattaraugus, Chautauqua, Chemung, Erie, Genesee, Livingston, Monroe, Niagara, Ontario, Orleans, Schuyler, Seneca, Steuben, Wayne, Wyoming, and Yates, with the waters thereof. Terms of the district court for said district shall be held at Elmira on the second Tuesdays in March and November; at Rochester on the second Tuesday in May; at Jamestown on the second Tuesday in July; at Lockport on the second Tuesday in September. The regular sessions of the district court for the western district for the hearing of motions and for proceedings in bankruptcy and the trial of causes in admiralty shall be held at Buffalo at least two weeks in each month of the year, except August, unless the business is sooner disposed of. The times for holding the same and such other special sessions as the court shall deem necessary shall be fixed by rules of the court. All process in admiralty causes and proceedings shall be made returnable at Buffalo. The judge of any district in the State of New York may perform the duties of the judge of any other district in such State upon the request of any resident judge entered in the minutes of the court, and in such cases such judge shall have the same powers as are vested in the resident judge."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to amend section 97 of the act entitled 'An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary,' approved March 3, 1911."

THE COMMITTEE ON IMMIGRATION.

Mr. CALDER, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred Senate resolution 204 submitted by Mr. COLT on the 2d instant, reported it favorably without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Immigration, or any subcommittee thereof, be, and hereby is, authorized, during the Sixty-sixth Congress, to send for persons, books, and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer at a cost of not exceeding $1 per printed page, to report such hearings as may be had on any subject before said committee, the expense thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate; and that committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during any session or recess of the Senate.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. LODGE:

A bill (S. 3172) to authorize the President of the United States to arrange and participate in an international conference to consider questions relating to international communication; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

By Mr. CALDER:

A bill (S. 3173) to provide for increasing the rank and grade of officers and enlisted men of the Army on retirement, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. KENYON:

A bill (S. 3174) granting a pension to Ella Blake (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN:

A bill (S. 3175) granting an increase of pension to Cecelia B. Chauncey; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. DIAL:

A bill (S. 3176) to authorize the President of the United States to appoint Marion C. Raysor an officer of the Army; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. POINDEXTER:

A bill (S. 3177) authorizing commercial service by naval radio plants; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

A bill (S. 3178) for the establishment of a light vessel to mark the entrance to Grays Harbor, Wash.; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. NEW:

A bill (S. 3179) granting an increase of pension to William A. Downs; and

A bill (S. 3180) granting a pension to Louis J. Boling (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. ELKINS:

A bill (S. 3181) granting an increase of pension to John Walton; and

A bill (S. 3182) granting an increase of pension to George W. Lyons; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. NELSON:

A bill (S. 3183) authorizing and directing the Interstate Commerce Commission to conduct investigations and to make orders relating to warehouse facilities of certain common carriers at certain ports; to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

A bill (S. 3184) to provide for the punishment of officers of United States courts wrongfully converting moneys coming into their possession, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

EXCESS IMPORTATIONS OF FOREIGN GOODS.

Mr. SMOOT. I introduce a bill and ask that it be read, and then I am going to ask the Senate to indulge me for just a few moments to speak upon it.

The bill (S. 3171) to promote domestic industry by prohibiting the dumping of foreign goods in the United States, and for other purposes, was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, as follows:

A bill (S. 3171) to promote domestic industry by prohibiting the dumping of foreign goods in the United States, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That this act may be cited as the antidumping act.

SEC. 2. That when used in this act—

The term "person" includes an individual, partnership, corporation, or association.

The term "cost of production" means the average cost, within a period to be prescribed from time to time by the Tariff Commission, of producing by the same producer at the same place of production merchandise of the same kind as that offered for importation.

The term "foreign market value at the place of production," when used in reference to any imported merchandise, means the average price, within a period to be prescribed from time to time by the Tariff Commission, at which merchandise of the same kind is freely sold or offered for sale for local consumption in wholesale quantities at the principal markets of the country where such imported merchandise was produced. If the Tariff Commission finds that such merchandise has no foreign market value at the place of production or that such market value is less than the cost of production as above defined, the term "cost of production" shall be substituted for "foreign market value at the place of production" wherever used in this act.

The term "foreign market value at the place in which purchased," when used in reference to any imported merchandise, means the average price, within a period to be determined from time to time by the Tariff Commission, at which merchandise of the same kind is freely sold or offered for sale for local consumption in wholesale quantities in the principal markets of the country in which such imported merchandise is purchased. If the Tariff Commission finds that such merchandise has no foreign market value at the place in which purchased, or that such market value is less than the cost of production, then the term "foreign market value at the place of production," shall be substituted for "foreign market value at the place in which purchased," wherever used in this act; except that if the Tariff Commission finds that such merchandise has no foreign market value at the place of production, or that such market value is less than the cost of production as above defined, then the term "cost of production" shall be substituted for "foreign market value at the place in which purchased" wherever used in this act.

The terms "foreign producer" or "importer" include any person acting for, in combination with, or accounting to, the foreign producer or importer, respectively.

The term "United States" includes the possessions of the United States except the Philippine Islands, the islands of Guam and Tutuila, the Virgin Islands, and the Isthmian Canal Zone.

The term "comparable domestic merchandise" means merchandise produced in the United States which is closely comparable to foreign produced merchandise imported or offered for importation, as respects the process of production, value, quality, or use to which it is applied.

SEC. 3. That the dumping duty provided in section 4 shall be levied, collected, and paid, under the provisions of existing law, upon any merchandise imported from any foreign country into the United States whenever the Tariff Commission certifies to the Secretary of the Treasury that an industry in the United States is being or likely to be injured or is prevented from being established, by reason of the application of any of the following methods in connection with such merchandise:

(1) The purchase of such merchandise in any foreign country by or for the importer at a price below the foreign market value at the place of production or purchase;

(2) The offering for sale of such merchandise in the United States by or for the importer, at a price which gives the importer less than a fair profit over and above the sum of (a) the foreign market value at the place in which purchased, or in case the importer is the foreign producer, the foreign market value at the place of production of such merchandise; (b) the value of any wrapping, package, container, or covering; (c) the value of packing materials; (d) the value of other costs, charges, or expenditures incident to placing such merchandise in condition for shipment; (e) the cost of transportation to the United States, including insurance; and (f) customs duties and excise tax upon such merchandise;

(3) The importation of such merchandise into the United States under any agreement, understanding, or condition that any person shall not use, purchase, or deal in or shall be restricted in his use, purchase, or dealing in the merchandise of any other person; or

(4) The employment in connection with any such merchandise of any other method which places at an unfair disadvantage purchasers in the United States as compared with foreign purchasers of the same kind of merchandise.

SEC. 4. That if the imported merchandise is purchased by or for the importer previous to importation, the dumping duty shall be twice the difference between (1) either the foreign market value at the place of production if purchased from the foreign producer, or the foreign market value at the place in which purchased if purchased from a person other than the foreign producer, and (2) the purchase price.

If the imported merchandise is imported by or for the foreign producer, the dumping duty shall be twice the difference between (1) the foreign market value at the place of production plus the sum of the items in clauses (b) to (f), inclusive, of subdivision (2) of section 3, and (2) the price at which such merchandise is offered for sale in the United States by or for the foreign producer or at which other imported merchandise of the same kind is sold or offered for sale in the United States by or for the same foreign producer.

Any dumping duty shall be in addition to any other duty or excise tax now or hereafter imposed by law.

Any dumping duty in respect to imported merchandise shall continue in effect until the Tariff Commission certifies to the Secretary of the Treasury that the conditions which led to the certification to the Secretary of the Treasury in respect to such merchandise no longer exist.

SEC. 5. That whenever the Tariff Commission is of the opinion that merchandise offered for importation may be made subject to a dumping duty as provided in section 3, but has not information sufficient to determine whether it should certify the necessary facts to the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of the Treasury shall forbid entry to such merchandise until the Tariff Commission completes such hearings, investigations, and proceedings as it deems necessary.

Whenever any importer or producer refuses to make available to the Tariff Commision in respect to merchandise imported or offered for importation such information as may be necessary for its hearings, investigations, and proceedings under this act, the Secretary of the Treasury shall forbid entry to such merchandise until the Tariff Commision notifies the Secretary of the Treasury that such information has been made available.

The Secretary of the Treasury may release under such bond as he deems sufficient and permit temporary entry of any merchandise forbidden entry under this section.

SEC. 6. That the Tariff Commission shall give such notice and afford such hearings with opportunity to offer testimony, oral or written, as it deems sufficient to a full presentation of the facts involved in any proposed certification under section 3. No certification under section 3 shall be made to the Secretary of the Treasury until after due notice and hearing. Any such certification to the Secretary of the Treasury shall include such facts as will aid such officer in ascertaining the rate of the dumping duty to be levied, collected, and paid upon the imported merchandise in dispute and upon similar importations.

SEC. 7. That the Tariff Commission is authorized to hold such hearings and enter upon such investigations and proceedings as may be necessary to the administration of this act, under such rules and regulations as such commission may prescribe. The powers granted the Tariff Commission under section 706 of the revenue act of 1916 shall also be available for carrying into effect the provisions of this act.

SEC. 8. That the Tariff Commission is authorized to make all rules and regulations necessary for determining (1) that a method has been employed in respect to any merchandise imported or offered for importation that is or is likely to be injurious to or prevents the establishment of an industry in the United States, and (2) what constitutes comparable domestic merchandise.

The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to make any rules or regulations necessary in connection with levying, collecting, or paying any dumping duty or in administering the provisions of section 5.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, just a moment. I promise the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] that I will occupy but a few minutes of the time of the Senate.

Mr. President, the House of Representatives has passed five bills covering certain commodities which are manufactured and produced in this country. On September 26, 1919, the House passed a bill to regulate the importation of coal-tar products and to promote the establishment of the manufacture thereof; on August 21, 1919, a bill to promote the production of tungsten ore and manufactures thereof; on September 2, 1919, a bill to establish and maintain the production of zinc ores and manufactures thereof; on September 2, 1919, a bill for the increase of tariff on buttons of shell and of pearl; and on August 2, 1919, a bill to establish and maintain the manufacture of laboratory glassware, laboratory porcelain ware, optical glass, scientific and surgical instruments.

I presume every Member of the Senate is receiving untold numbers of letters from manufacturers of the articles which are enumerated in the bills to which I have just referred, and asking for favorable action on them. I thought this would be a proper time to have Congress consider an antidumping bill and enact it into law, even though the bills referred to shall be placed upon the statute books. We should have had an antidumping law years ago, but never in the history of the country has one been so necessary as at the present time. I simply desire to refer to two of these bills, but, perhaps, what I shall say in relation to those two bills will be equally applicable to the other three.

In reference to the manufacture of coal-tar products, I desire to state that since the beginning of the war wonderful strides have been made in that industry in the United States; in fact, at the present time, with the exception of a very few of the very finest and most delicate colors, the manufacturers of such dyes in the United States are producing all that are required in this country; but to-day there are stored at the ports of embarkation in Germany coal-tar products sufficient to furnish the United States with all we shall need for at least two years to come.

The policy of Germany in the past has been whenever coal-tar products were successfully produced in the United States to sell the German product for very much less than the cost of their manufacture, if necessary, until they could thereby close the American establishments. If the American manufacturers of such products to-day are compelled to close their factories for two years—and I have no doubt that Germany would gladly place such goods upon the market at far below the cost of manufacture in order to do so—the American industry, Mr. President, will be destroyed. The enactment of an antidumping law would prevent such an undertaking on the part of Germany, or at least prevent such an action from becoming successful. It is for that reason that I hope the legislation suggested in the bill which I have just introduced will be enacted into law at a very early date.

Take, for instance, the manufacture of scientific and surgical instruments. The House has passed a bill to take care of the manufacture of those articles. Before the war America made none of those instruments worth speaking of, the amount manufactured in the United States being so small that it was but a fraction of 1 per cent of what was required of that class of goods. Since the war industrial establishments manufacturing surgical and scientific instruments have sprung up in different parts of the United States, until to-day there is manufactured in this country a sufficient quantity of this class of articles to furnish all of the needs of the people of the United States; but I have recently seen copies of at least 50 orders which have been placed with Germany for such instruments at prices which make it absolutely impossible for the American manufacturer to compete; and if we are going to maintain this industry, either the bill which was passed by the House must be enacted into law or an antidumping law must be placed upon our statute books.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator made the statement that Germany is willing to sell certain products at a loss, and will do so for a period of years, if necessary, in order to run out the American manufacturer. Whatever the condition in that respect might have been before the war, does the Senator think that at present Germany can afford to manufacture and sell articles at a loss?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that so far as coal-tar dyes are concerned they are already manufactured. Germany required the by-products of coal-tar manufactures for the munitions of war; she had to manufacture coal-tar dyes; and such dyes have piled up, as I have said, at ports of embarkation to-day in Germany in quantities sufficient not only to furnish the general trade of the world, but to furnish enough of these products to the United States to fill the requirements of all the manufacturers of the United States for two years.

I simply wanted to say this much upon the bill which I have introduced.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that on Thursday next, when the Senate goes into open executive session, I shall submit some remarks on the pending treaty with Germany.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I shall ask the indulgence of the Senate to-morrow, not to exceed one-half hour, to submit some remarks on the treaty of peace.

THE RAILROAD SITUATION.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I present and desire to have inserted in the RECORD two articles on the railroad question.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Dallas Morning News.]

"THE CUMMINS BILL.

"Judge Cowan, of Fort Worth, speaking as chairman of a joint committee created by the Southwestern Traffic League and the Texas Industrial Traffic League to make a study of the several measures which have been proposed for the solution of the railroad problem, issued the other day what may be called a preliminary criticism of the Cummins bill. Whether this bill was chosen for that kind of treatment because of the belief that it enjoys an advantage in having for its author the chairman of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce or because of the belief that it is the most pernicious of all the proposals that have been made one is left to conjecture. Our own guess would be that it is to this last-named circumstance that it owes the distinction of being singled out for attack. Certainly one must infer from Judge Cowan's statement that he and the committee of which he is chairman regard it as the worst and most indefensible measure on that subject that has been offered, excepting, of course, the Plumb plan.

"With some of the criticisms of Judge Cowan the News can not agree. For example, it is not a fault of the bill, in the News's opinion, that it provides for the consolidation of all the railroads in the country under the ownership of from 20 to 35 corporations to be chartered by the Federal Government. The News believes that even a greater consolidation than is thus contemplated could be effected without depriving the country of any competition that is desirable. Neither is it a fault of the bill, in the News's opinion, that it recognizes and affirms the supremacy of the Interstate Commerce Commission's authority in rate making, even to the extent of permitting it to readjust intrastate rates when it finds them to be out of alignment with interstate rates. The News thinks that some such centralization of authority is essential and that if exercised as this bill contemplates only on such occasions as that which was presented in the Shreveport rate case the States will have no just reason to complain.

"But while not in harmony with these criticisms of Judge Cowan's, and perhaps some others, the News is much inclined to concur in his judgment that the Cummins bill is defective in ways so fundamental as to render it doubtful if it can be made a foundation for such a structure of railroad regulation as needs to be built. These defects, if fundamental, are also varied in character. It seems to the News, for example, that it is at least questionable if the Constitution could be cajoled into countenancing either that section which provides for compulsory consolidations or that which would empower the Government to expropriate all earnings in excess of the 'fair return,' which is left to the determination of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Whether constitutional or not, that provision would be unjust, for the reason that, in addition to the fact that what constitutes a fair return is left to the determination of the Interstate Commerce Commission, it affords no guaranty that any of the railroads would be allowed to earn a 'fair return.' For, while the commission is specifically directed to make such rates as will enable them to earn a fair return, it provides no redress for the railroads in the event the rates should fail to yield such a return. In essence, the Government would become the lessee of the railroads without giving a guaranty that the lessors would receive a fair compensation for the use of their property. Such an inequitable proposition is unjust, and it ought to be unconstitutional.

"It is evident, and rather painfully so, that Senator CUMMINS has tried to make his bill strike a compromise as between those who have proposed that the Government guarantee a fixed rate of return to the owners of the railroads and those who have proposed that the employees shall share in the earnings of the railroads. But it is doubtful if his bill would realize one or the other of those proposals to a degree that would reconcile either group to it. There is no guaranty in it for the owners of the railroads, but only a promise, and one which, although specific, will command no great confidence in the money markets; and since the problem is largely that of restoring railroad credit, it is there that any bill must win approval if it is to be successful. Neither does it afford employees an assurance that they would derive anything from the operation of the railroads in excess of their wages. Its stipulation is that if earnings for any year should be above the amount decided to be a 'fair return,' plus 'a just allowance to provide reasonably for future years in which there may be insufficient earnings'—a surplus, namely—the excess shall accrue to the Government. Of that excess, half is to be the portion of the employees. But it would not inure to them in the form of additional wages, necessarily, nor even probably, one might think. That half of the excess earnings—assuming always there would be any—is to be used '(a) for the promotion of invention and research to ameliorate the conditions of labor and lessen the hazards of employment; (b) to extend and improve hospital relief; (c) to supplement existing systems of insurance and pensions; (d) to afford opportunities for the technical education of employees; (e) to establish a system of profit sharing by employees.' A promise so phantom-like as that is not likely to excite a more attractive expectation among the proponents of the Plumb plan than will the promise of a 'fair return' among those owners of the railroads whose demand is for a guaranty of a fixed rate of earning.

"In thus criticizing this overture to the employees, the News does not mean to commit itself to the idea that the employees are entitled to share in the earnings of the railroads beyond the extent that they would do so in receiving liberal wages for their services. Ethically, the proposal to give a share of railroad earnings to the employees in the form of a bonus is at least questionable. For that additional remuneration can not be given to them except at the cost either of the owners of the railroads or of the patrons of them, the general public, whose industry is the source of both wages and dividends. To create a fund for distribution among the employees without depriving the stockholders of anything they are entitled to, rates of transportation must be above the fair cost of the service. There may be some reason of expedience for making that exaction of the public, but what moral warrant is there for doing so? If the employees are fairly paid for their services—and assuredly they should be not only fairly but liberally paid—what ethical reason is there for levying an additional tax on the commerce of the country in their behalf and for their profit? This is not to say that some such partnership scheme may not be advisable; considerations of expedience may show it to be desirable. It is merely to challenge the notion of growing popularity that the employees have inherently a moral right to share in the earnings of the railroads without themselves contributing more toward their success than they are obligated to in return for their wages and without sharing in the losses to which the railroads would be liable under the provisions of the Cummins bill."

RAILROAD MEASURE OPPOSED BY COWAN—PROPOSED CONSOLIDATIONS WOULD ELIMINATE COMPETITION, HE DECLARES.

"The following statement relative to the Cummins bill has been received from S. H. Cowan, of Fort Worth:

"'Referring to your editorial of the 21st regarding my statements about the new railroad bill recently introduced by the subcommittee of the Committee on Interstate Commerce, by Senator CUMMINS, the chairman, I desire to say:

"'The News states that in the opinion of its editor it is not a fault in the bill that it provides the consolidation of the railroads of the country under the ownership of 20 to 35 corporations to be chartered by the Federal Government, and that even a greater consolidation could be effected without depriving the country of competition, if desirable. Thus the issue on that point is squarely drawn, and that is the most dangerous part of the bill. It would scarcely be denied that there is no precedent whereby Congress can compel the railroads, simply because they perform a transportation service in interstate commerce under a charter granted by the State, to become incorporated under an act of Congress. Many States have aided the construction of railroads in the beginning, by donations and otherwise, and in many instances have exacted a promise, at least, that when the earnings exceeded a certain per cent the same should be paid to the State in one form or another. Your idea seems to be that the Government can spit on the slate and wipe them off.

CAN NOT COMPEL OPERATION.

"'That the Government can provide for the incorporation of railroads there is no doubt. The Government may have the power to acquire the railroads, but it can not compel one railroad company, whether it is chartered by the Government or by the State, to take over and operate another road, to purchase it, or to sell a part of its property to another. To my mind, that is very clear, unless, of course, it would be in case where a railroad was incorporated under an act of Congress reserving to the Government that right or providing for it by charter. I proceed upon the belief that only such consolidations as both or all of the consolidated railroads entering into the arrangement shall see fit to make can take place under this bill or any other bill that falls short of exercising the powers of the Government to take over the railroads in the first instance.

"'If I am correct in that, then it need not be expected that these separate railroad corporations will take the opportunity of permissive consolidation, except for some advantageous reasons. The only one that I have observed and that has been put forward at all, wherein the public would be benefited, is the reduction of expenses of operation and increased efficiency. A correct analysis of the situation or respective lines of railroads which may choose to consolidate will demonstrate that such benefit is more imaginary than real. The stronger companies naturally do not want to take over the weaker ones unless it would benefit them. The weaker company would not want to sell out unless it gets a price that suits the owners of it.

ELIMINATE COMPETITION.

"'The elimination of competition or the equivalent of pooling earnings is certain to be the objective in all such consolidations as do not amount to the acquisition of lines which merely extend the geographical area to be served by the stronger company which acquires the smaller lines. There is no obstacle now to accomplishing that if both parties see fit to do it. When it comes to an analysis of what goes to make up the operating expenses of the railroads, we find that unless the traffic can be increased so as to have a greater number of units of traffic for a given cost, consolidation does not lessen the expenses per unit, unless it involves large investments of capital in the improvement of the line, so as to reduce expenses in that way.

"'Presently there is no disposition to enter that field, nor does this law require it after such consolidation may have been made. The matter of improvements to better the condition of transportation or service on the weak lines is missing.

"'The operating expenses consist of the five subdivisions, viz: First, maintenance of way and structures; second, maintenance of equipment; third, the conducting of transportation; fourth, the traffic expenses; and fifth, general expenses, to which should be added taxes, not precisely as an expense but as a fixed charge.

NO REDUCTION IN EXPENSES.

"'Space forbids an analysis of each one of these, but there are more than 100 accounts in making up these grand subdivisions, and if any one will examine he will find so little that can be eliminated or reduced by consolidation that it would not amount to anything. Furthermore, if he will examine into the consolidations which have taken place he will find there was no reduction in expenses. In Texas, for example, take the Texas Central, which was taken over by the Missouri, Kansas & Texas. There is a possible elimination of a small amount in the matter of superintendence and general expenses. I don't mean a reduction that has, in fact, taken place in such instances, but that which is possible, and which might amount to one-half of 1 per cent. Did the Government reduce expenses on any line by unification? Just tell us about that.

"'Now, this bill permits the consolidation of competing lines and leaves it to the board of transportation to determine what will be permitted, and there is no remedy to prevent it. Who selects these systems? Answer: The railroads themselves. There is also a provision in this bill prohibiting the construction of any new line except by permission of this board or the Interstate Commerce Commission. Looking at past experience and viewing the matter from a rational standpoint with full knowledge that the expectation in all consolidations will be to make money out of the transaction, I am willing to indulge myself in the prophecy that only those consolidations will take place which eliminate competition and ultimately will be injurious to the public interest if permitted. Where does the demand for it come from? If the Government would now provide to lend money to railroads for extensions or the purchase of physical property of lines which will extend existing systems further, and thus enable them to concentrate under one head and one control the aggregate of tonnage from a wider geographical area that will enable the extension of railroad systems in such way as will benefit the public interest by the economies resulting from the concentration of a large volume of traffic on their trunk lines and not abolish the incentive for the development of the country to produce that traffic it would create the incentive. The plan proposed will not accomplish that; it will retard it.

"'My effort in behalf of live-stock interests in these remote places is to wake them up in time to stop this thing.

"'The man who thinks there has been a change of heart in the railroad world so that they now have become benevolent institutions looking to benefit the public interests when it does not at the same time benefit their own is simply making a mistake.

SHOULD NOT TAKE SURPLUS.

"'There is one section to the bill and that is the taking of the surplus from the railroads that earn more than what may be denominated by the commission as a fair return to be devoted one-half to the purchase of equipment and facilities to be rented out to the roads that need it and the other to be put into an employees' welfare fund.

"'It would seem preposterous to turn the roads back to private ownership when they must pay a reasonable wage for all services performed and then make use of the surplus of roads that have been wisely constructed and are efficiently operated for any such purpose or to take it away from the roads which earn it. What they earn belongs to the corporations operating the properties, and it is nothing less than confiscation to take it. If the rates are too high, then they should be reduced, but the carrier should not have its revenue taken and devoted to some purposes, however benevolent.

"'The constitution of Texas makes many provisions in regard to the incorporation and operation of railroads in this State and their rights, duties, and liabilities, and prohibits the railroads from owning or having under their control parallel or competing lines, and prohibits the consolidation of any railroad company organized under the laws of this State and any railroad organized under the laws of any State or the United States, and it provides that no railroad corporation which was in existence at the time of the adoption of the constitution should have the benefit of any future legislation except on condition of complete acceptance of all of the provisions of the constitution applicable to railroads.

"'If this bill becomes a law, then Congress will have by the enactment placed it within the power of every railroad company in the State of Texas to abolish the constitution as applicable to them and to escape any and all manner of regulation by the State. Of course, they would do that. Does the News advocate that, I wonder? The purpose of the bill can not be carried out without accomplishing that.

TO AVOID STATE CONTROL.

"'The plan for this legislation was propagated by a conference participated in and under the control of those connected with the railroads themselves, their securities, finances, and manufacturing interests, which interests have from the beginning opposed the regulation by the State, the enactment of the Hepburn bill, or extending the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission for the shippers. They held 22 meetings between December, 1918, and June, 1919. Their plan is set out in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, together with the bill that they propose, of date September 15. This bill is very largely the same as the Senate bill in the superstructure and practically the same in its effect in abolishing State control. The Senate bill, however, has a proviso in section 43 reflecting the view against the abolishing of State control of the Senate subcommittee, as follows:

"'"Nothing in this act shall be construed to amend, repeal, impair, or affect the existing laws or powers of the States in relation to taxation or the lawful police powers of the several States, including the power to make and regulate intrastate rates, except as in this act otherwise provided." The exception, however, destroys the reservation. The bill was proposed in its essence by this aggregation that stands behind this legislation and the prime object of it was to get away from State control and regulation rather than preserve it as this proviso does. So it comes to the point that you must favor abolishing the State constitution or oppose this consolidation and national incorporation. It is a matter of paramount concern.

"'I can not believe that this revolutionary method of abolishing the State constitution, even if the railroads see fit to comply with the requirement, without question should be considered for a moment, and I have no idea that the subcommittee of the Senate or Senator CUMMINS, its chairman, intends to accomplish that end, because the foregoing proviso in the bill expresses a negative idea, but I am perfectly satisfied that it is the intention of the proponents of the scheme and superstructure on which the bill is founded to accomplish that end.

"'Lest there might be the misconception from the criticism I have made of the bill that the criticism extends to Senator CUMMINS and the subcommittee which reported the bill, I wish to say that I know of no man in public life more alive to the public interests or better qualified than Senator CUMMINS, as evidenced by his record of years in the public life. Both in point of ability and high standing, the same can be said of the other members of the subcommittee, and hence it may appear presumptuous to challenge this bill, but those who have made a study of it from the shippers' viewpoint are constrained to conclude that the necessary results would be to accomplish the complete dethronement of the States as factors in regulation which is the prime purpose of the proponents of the bill, as they admitted in their statements recently made before the House committee in proposing the same scheme.'"

ARTICLE BY GEORGE W. PERKINS.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD an article on profit sharing by George W. Perkins, which I think is a very important and interesting contribution.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PROFIT SHARING, OR THE WORKER'S FAIR SHARE.

[By George W. Perkins.]

"'The worker's fair share' has been a real problem ever since the world began. It has changed greatly as civilization has progressed, and has crowded harder and harder for solution as intelligence and education have spread and broadened.

"The worker's fair share was an unsolved problem when the expression that designated the relationship between the man of capital and the man of labor was 'owner and slave.'

"It still existed when the expression of relationship became 'master and man.'

"It still exists in these days when the expression of relationship is 'employer and employee.'

"These very changes in the expressions used to designate the relationship between capital and labor show that steady progress has been made toward solving the problem of the worker's fair share.

"I take it that everyone believes that we can not go back to the old conditions; that we must move forward to an even better relationship than that expressed by the term 'employer and employee.'

"You ask, 'What is this newer relationship to be and what term will express it?' I answer that I believe it must be 'partners.'

"If I am right, then the next question is how can this relationship be worked out so as to bring the best results to all concerned?

"This problem has greatly interested me for 30 years. I have studied it earnestly, not from books but from experience obtained in the hard knocks of everyday work in the various business undertakings with which I have been connected.

"Twenty-five years ago I became convinced that only through profit sharing that was real, honest, and open could we hope to find anything like a satisfactory and permanent method of arriving at the worker's fair share.

"Ever since that time I have improved every opportunity to spread the gospel of profit sharing and to have its principles adopted by business organizations, and I have greatly appreciated the honor of serving as chairman of your profit-sharing committee since it was organized.

"I recall that I read a profit-sharing paper before this organization about 12 years ago, and I find little, if anything, to change in the basic principles then laid down. I believe the work that has been accomplished meanwhile has been worth while and that the time is now ripe for us to push it harder than ever along constructive lines.

"I have found that my views on profit sharing, and my beliefs as to how to apply it, differ radically from those of many other people; that the plans I have been instrumental in having adopted are very different in application and in results from many other so-called profit-sharing plans. I want, if possible, to point out wherein these differences lie.

PROFIT SHARING NOT PHILANTHROPY.

"In the first place, I do not look upon profit sharing as philanthropy or a form of benevolence.

"I do not put it in the same class with gifts at Christmas time or bonuses at the end of the year. I do not approve or believe in any plan that even savors of giving a man something for nothing.

"I do not believe any self-respecting man wants any such arrangement, and I do not believe that any broad-minded, self-respecting employer can, in the long run, afford to have any such arrangement.

"The profit sharing I believe in is the kind that is real; the kind that promotes thorough and efficient cooperation between employer and employee; the kind that makes partners of employees; the sort of profit sharing that is practiced between partners in a business.

"Anything short of this is bound to result in failure and will widen rather than narrow the breach between employer and employee.

"Close observation, coupled with considerable experience, has convinced me that practically all the many failures in profit sharing, both in this country and in Europe, have occurred because at bottom the plans were not honestly devised nor equitably worked out.

"In nine cases out of ten, at some point in the practical application of the plans that have failed, the fact has developed that they were not mutually beneficial; they either did not enhance the efficiency of the men in such a way as to satisfy the employer, or else did not distribute profits in such a way as to benefit and satisfy the employees.

"No partnership where the profits are shared by two or a half dozen partners could last any length of time unless mutually beneficial, and the same rule holds good in a larger partnership where the profits are shared among many partners.

"No man or firm or corporation that is thinking of adopting profit sharing can hope for success, unless prepared to approach the subject in this spirit and deal with it in an absolutely honest, open, and broad-minded manner.

"As I have said, the relation between employer and employee has changed with the centuries.

"Originally it was owner and slave; then it was master and man; now it is employer and employee, each stage of development bringing the employer and employee into closer cooperation. What has caused this change in relationship?

"In my judgment, the cause is found in the vast and broad educational forces that have been at work in the world.

"Since we founded this country we have spent approximately as much money on our educational systems as on our railroad systems.

"We consider our railroads financially successful if they earn dividends.

"If our educational systems are successful the dividends we get from them are minds that think better, more clearly, more independently.

"Right now this country is getting such dividends from its vast investments in educational plants.

"In the industrial world, in the relations between capital and labor, between employer and employee, we are getting these very dividends, and getting them direct and in cumulative fashion on the wage question.

"In the past the man who was not educated or trained to think independently struck because he wanted $2 a day if he was only getting $1.75; and for quite a period labor differences were settled on this basis.

"I believe that we are rapidly passing out of that period, for our laboring people are so well educated and so able to think independently that, in many cases, they are no longer striking for a definite increase in wages, but for what they regard as a fairer proportion of the profits of the business in which they are engaged.

"If I am right about this, then we are rapidly leaving behind the period when labor disputes could be settled by a mere increase in wages and are entering the period when profit sharing in some form must be practiced.

"Therefore the question is, How can it be practiced effectively?

OUTLINE OF A CORRECT PROFIT-SHARING PLAN.

"A good many years of actual experience have made me very optimistic regarding profit-sharing plans worked out along the following lines:

"First. Every business has, first of all, to earn operating expenses, depreciation, and fair returns on honest capitaliz tion.

"Second. I believe that every business should consider that the compensation paid employees is for the purpose of earning a sum of money sufficient to pay the above-mentioned items.

"Third. I believe that any profits over and above such sum should, on some percentage basis, be divided between the capital used in the business and the employees engaged in the business.

"Fourth. I believe that in neither case should these profits be immediately withdrawn from the business; that they should be left in the business for a reasonable length of time, to protect and increase its financial strength and safety; that, in the case of capital, its share of these profits should be carried to surplus; that, in the case of employees, their share of these profits should be distributed to them in some form of security representing an interest in the business, and that each employee should be required to hold such security for a reasonable length of time, say three to five years.

"Fifth. I believe that the employees' share of these profits should be allotted to them as nearly as possible on the basis of the compensation they receive. Up to date, this has proved to be the best method.

RESULTS ATTAINED BY A PROPER PLAN.

"Now, let us see what such a plan means: In the first place, it means that under such an arrangement each employee becomes a working partner in the business.

"He is on the same footing as the financial partners, for if the concern is a partnership with, say, four or five members, the partners themselves are drawing out each year what, in a way, might be called salaries, namely, approximately the amount of money necessary to meet their general living expenses, leaving their surplus profits in the business.

"Any partnership or any profit-sharing plan that divided up the profits and withdrew them in cash at the end of every year could not last very long.

WHY SOME PROFIT-SHARING PLANS FAIL.

"Many profit-sharing plans have divided profits with employees on a cash basis, and turned the money over to the employees every so often, usually once a year.

"The result has been that if a man earning $1,000 a year received $200 at the end of the year from a profit-sharing plan, he promptly lifted his living expenses from a $1,000 basis to a $1,200 basis, and began to look upon his income as $1,200 rather than $1,000, and the extra $200 did little to increase his activity and efficiency, or to promote his intellectual efforts in the business concerned.

"Then, if a period came when business was dull or poor and he did not get the extra $200, he found fault with the owners of the business and became grouchy and inclined to lose interest in his work.

"If he did not use the $200 for his living expenses, he probably invested it in a suburban lot or in some stock that was recommended to him, or in something that he knew little or nothing about.

"Then, if his investment began to go wrong, he worried about it, and part of the time which he was being paid to devote to the business in which he was engaged would be expended in worrying about his investment in the business in which he was not engaged; whereas, if his money were invested in the business in which he was engaged, his desire to see his investment succeed and bring him further profits would be converted into efforts that would be of some practical benefit, not only to himself, but to the stockholders and his coworkers.

"In short, little real substantial benefit comes from a profit-sharing plan where the profits are paid out in cash, except perhaps where a man uses the money toward buying a home.

"There is therefore a serious weakness somewhere in such a plan, and the weakness lies in the fact that profit sharing can not be really beneficial, either for employer or employee, unless conducted on a partnership basis and coupled with profit saving.

"Looking at it from the viewpoint of capital, the object to be accomplished through the adoption of profit sharing is added interest in the business on the part of employees, which in turn brings higher efficiency.

"Looking at it from the standpoint of the employee, the object to be accomplished is a fairer remuneration for services rendered.

"Therefore any profit-sharing plan that fails to accomplish both of these results breaks down sooner or later.

FULL PUBLICITY NEEDED ABOUT THE BUSINESS.

"In establishing profit sharing it is of the utmost importance that the entire organization, the wage and salary earners, know in advance exactly what they are expected to accomplish.

"I mean by this that, on entering a new year, they should know exactly what the preceding year's accomplishments have been. The annual statement of the concern should be full and explicit, so that every man engaged in the enterprise will know what business was done in the preceding year and on what basis profits were and are to be distributed.

"An honest, detailed annual statement tells him officially what the profits were, if any, and this fixes a minimum goal for the coming year, which everyone, individually and collectively, will bend every energy to reach and exceed by as large an amount as possible.

"Under such an arrangement as this, each man, in place of working solely for himself in his own department, will pass on to other departments any ideas that occur to him that might help that other department, and in that way benefit the organization as a whole.

"In my judgment, some profit-sharing plans are radically wrong in this respect. They distribute profits by departments or in some way other than on the basis of the company's success as a whole.

"This narrows the vision of the individual, and he lacks the proper incentive to help wherever he can, whether in his own or another department.

"The right kind of profit sharing offers definite goals that an organization, individually and as a whole, can buckle down and work for, and it is astonishing how such a plan of profit sharing will heighten the esprit de corps.

"It removes petty jealousies; it makes a man eager to pass his ideas on to the man in the next department, and causes them to vie with one another to reach and exceed the figures reached in the preceding year.

"A detailed annual report by the company is not only necessary to show the organization in prosperous years how the profits were arrived at and what they amounted to, but equally necessary in lean years to show how the losses were arrived at, what they amounted to, and why there are no profits to distribute. Gradually, as the employees in the organization become part owners in the business, you broaden and deepen their interest in their work.

"They begin to think and speak of the business as their business; they work for it as their business, not your business or somebody else's, and in place of 'knocking' it they praise it and 'boost' it in every way they can, for they have become part owners through being security holders and are receiving their interest or dividends at the same time and in the same manner as other security holders receive theirs.

"In other words, once the employees become security holders, they share in interest or dividend distributions and other profits, not only as security holders but as employees.

SOME OBJECTIONS TO THE PLAN ANSWERED.

"Many people have said to me: 'Oh, but it takes a long while for a man who is only saving a small sum each year to acquire much of a financial interest in the concern by which he is employed.'

"I have always found that such criticism comes from some one who has not given sufficient thought to the subject, for a small interest means as much to the man having a comparatively small salary as a large interest does to the man of large affairs.

"Let us summarize some of the advantages of this method of profit sharing:

"First. It is real; it is genuine. The organization, as a whole, and each individual in it has a definite goal for the year's work;

"They know at the beginning of the year how much money must be earned to cover what we will call fixed charges;

"They know that they are being paid salaries to earn those fixed charges;

"They know that they share in all profits over and above those fixed charges; and

"They know the basis on which they share, and that the amount of such profits largely depends on the individual and collective effort of each individual in the organization.

"This in itself is of great practical value to the business from a dollar-and-cent standpoint. There is no philanthropy about it.

"The employees have a certain definite goal to reach. If they reach it, they are paid a definite percentage for doing so.

"It is a definite business proposition, based on the principle of profit sharing as practiced in partnerships.

"Second. Having reached the goal set, the money over and above the salaries they are paid—in other words, their profits—is invested in the business in which they are engaged and on which their whole time and thought and energy should be centered.

"What a great advantage this is to the employer and what a spur and incentive to the employee!

"What more valuable insurance policy could an employer have against a year of poor earnings?

"What a real, genuine interest it arouses in the worker for the business in which he is engaged!

"The whole atmosphere, the whole relationship is changed.

"The employer need give little thought to whether or not his men are 'soldiering' on him, whether or not they are really giving to their work the best that is in them; and the employee need spend little time wondering whether or not he is being properly compensated.

"The whole relationship is placed on a new basis, not antagonistic as heretofore, but cooperative.

"This plan is vastly different from the one now practiced by which one set of men working in a business, viz, the capitalists and partners, leave most of their profits in the business, while another set of men, working shoulder to shoulder with them, viz, the employees, each year take their profits out of the business and put them somewhere else.

THE KIND OF A PROFIT SHARING THAT DOES HARM.

"It is also vastly different from the many bonus schemes in vogue.

"It differs greatly from the plan of arbitrarily setting aside in a prosperous year a certain lump sum of money and dividing it on a percentage basis among the employees.

"Under such an arrangement no man who gets any of the money has any very definite idea of what he did to earn it, what it represents, or what he individually can do to insure the receipt of some such sum during the following year.

"In fact, I am convinced that such bonus giving, erroneously called profit sharing, has done more harm than good, for in many instances it has caused employees to feel that said bonuses were given them because the business was earning fabulous sums of money, a tiny little bit of which was thrown to them as a sop to make them feel kindly disposed toward the owners or in order to ward off a demand for a general increase in wages.

"In short, such bonus giving simply stirs up trouble rather than alleviates it.

"Profit sharing on the basis I favor is sometimes objected to by men or concerns who do not wish to let even their own employees know how little or how much money they are making each year.

"To such men I always say—and each year I am more and more certain that I am right in saying it—that they are very shortsighted if they do not hasten to change their policy.

"If they are not making enough money and the business is running on a close margin each year, then by all means they should set their situation before their men, adopt such a profit-sharing plan as I have outlined, and get the genuine cooperation of every man toward increasing the profits and putting the business in a prosperous condition.

"They are now paying wages and salaries, and many a night go home wondering whether the employees are really earning their salaries.

"Under such a profit-sharing plan as I have outlined they have a substantial guaranty that the salaries will be earned because in aiming to share in profits over and above fixed charges the men are all the more certain to earn at least the fixed charges.

"And would any proprietor or manager hesitate to pay a handsome premium each year for an insurance policy guaranteeing that every employee in the business would have the business on his mind and work as hard for its success as the proprietor or manager does?

"One more thought in this connection.

"The man who is running on a small margin and making little profit may object to making his business affairs public property, on the ground that he would be putting a weapon into the hands of his competitors.

"Such a man's best protection against his competitors is a loyal, closely knit organization of the highest efficiency, and this important advantage he can only secure through a bona fide profit-sharing plan.

"As for the man who is making so much money that he is afraid to let even his own employees know how much he is making, to that man I say that he is the man who, more than any other, is responsible for the serious differences to-day existing between capital and labor, for with the growing intelligence of the masses, how can he expect such a situation to continue?

"Every year, yes, every day, it becomes clearer and clearer that such a condition will no longer be tolerated and must speedily pass away.

"Would it not be better for him to use some intelligent foresight and meet what clearly are to be the immediate future demands of public opinion?

"As for the man who is making large profits, but who objects to profit sharing on the ground that he wants to put those profits away against the day when business may be poor.

"To such a man I say that he had better use some of those profits to more deeply interest his men in his business, and do this to such an extent that if the dark days come he can be pretty certain that his men will stand by the business in a way that capital alone never can.

"Profit sharing on the basis I favor is also sometimes objected to by concerns whose securities are closely held. There are many ways to obviate this difficulty.

"Some concerns can increase their capital.

"Others that can not, or can not do so for a time, can obviate the difficulty by issuing certificates of participation that will draw the same percentage of profit as the regular securities of the business.

"In other words, where there is a genuine desire to share profits a way can always be found.

"The day of secretive methods is passing rapidly. The day of publicity is at hand. The change is a perfectly natural evolution due to broader education and improved intercommunication, and has also come about because it is second nature to be less suspicious and afraid of that which is known than of that which is unknown.

"Any profit-sharing plan without an open, honest balance sheet and detailed annual report will never succeed.

"I am convinced that labor is entirely willing that capital should have its fair reward and proper protection, but in this country we have had too many instances where capital had demanded improper protection and taken exorbitant reward; and one of the main reasons why the serious problems confronting us to-day are so difficult of solution lies in the fact that too many men of capital are still arrogant and unreasonable, and absolutely unwilling to look with sufficient care and fairness into the causes that are producing the views and opinions so largely held by our people at this time.

"On the other hand, one of the most serious drawbacks to increased output and economical production is the listless, indifferent service rendered by a large percentage of employees.

"Making partners of employees, through profit sharing, would correct this as nothing else could.

PROFIT SHARING THAT HAS BEEN A SUCCESS.

"Some companies with which I am connected have realized the trend of the times and have for some time been practicing profit sharing along the lines I have indicated.

"They believed that profit-sharing plans based on such principles would so knit their vast organizations together, and would so strengthen and develop the esprit de corps, as to make it possible for the companies to increase their business and their earnings, and they were willing to share this increased success with their employees.

"So far they have every reason to congratulate themselves on the results.

"In all parts of their business, at home and abroad, in the office force, in the factories, in the sales department, everywhere, the individual employee's interest in the business is much greater than formerly.

"The saving in waste everywhere is noticeable.

"The employees are vying with one another more and more to improve their respective and other branches of the business.

"All this means success for the company, profits for the stockholders, extra compensation for the employees.

"It means getting men on salaries and wages to have a live, keen interest in the management of the business.

"It means getting an organization of men to work as real partners.

"It means recognizing the right of the employee to a fairer share of the earnings of the business in which he is engaged.

"In short, it means cooperation that is complete, in that it benefits stockholder, employer, and employee.

"While all this can more readily be accomplished in a large business, it can also be successfully accomplished in a small business if approached in the proper spirit; and if applied generally it would remove to a considerable degree the dangers that are menacing modern industry, and which are largely caused by the feeling on the part of the masses that, through wages, they are not getting their proper proportion of the money earned in a given industry.

"An industrial democracy of the most ideal sort is found in true profit sharing; an industrial democracy that makes real partners of capital and labor, and yet preserves the right of private property; that preserves and promotes the great business asset that comes from individual initiative; that retains the capitalist's incentive to enterprise, while giving the worker a new inspiration for effort that humanizes large organizations of men; that promotes good will and industrial peace.

"All these things this country of ours needs now as never before.

"The shelves of the world are bare. The entire world needs supplies—supplies of food, clothing, building material, everything.

"As long as the supply of these things is so low and the demand for them all over the world is so great, the cost to the consumer will remain high.

"Therefore one of the surest paths leading to a reduction in cost to the consumer is to raise and manufacture a large supply of these necessities as quickly as possible.

"Linked with the desire to supply ourselves with food, clothing, and other necessaries at low cost is our desire to furnish the world with these and other articles, in order to extend our trade and foster the prosperity of our people as a whole.

"But as practically every other nation hopes to secure a large part of this trade for herself, is it not a certainty that competition among the nations will be keener and sharper in the immediate future than it has ever been in the history of the world?

"How can we possibly meet this increased competition if we are divided among ourselves?

"Could there be two more potential reasons why we Americans should have the closest possible cooperation between capital and labor?

"Could anything bring higher efficiency, greater production?

"The only way to secure this cooperation in the highest degree is by eliminating the distrust that has existed between capital and labor for so many years and establishing confidence in its place.

"Nothing will do this except frank, open dealing, publicity as to earnings, and a fair division of earnings.

"Since the beginning of time no country has ever had such an opportunity to extend its trade, increase its prosperity, and better the material condition of every one of its people as has the United States of America at this very hour.

"The only factor missing is that of close cooperation here at home among ourselves.

"It seems inconceivable that we will fail to realize where our weakness lies and fail to adopt the one and only remedy for it.

"In the strenuous competition with the rest of the world that this country is on the eve of facing, could we have a stronger weapon than complete cooperation between capital and labor at home?"

ZION NATIONAL PARK, UTAH.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 425) to establish the Zion National Park in the State of Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House, request a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to, and the Vice President appointed Mr. SMOOT, Mr. FALL, and Mr. MYERS conferees on the part of the Senate.

LANDS FOR SCHOOL PURPOSES.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 794) granting lands for school purposes in Government town sites on reclamation projects, which were: On page 1, line 3, after the word "be" to insert "and he is"; and on page 1, line 7, after the word "lands" to insert "not exceeding 6 acres in area."

Mr. MYERS. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

LANDS IN FLORIDA.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 55) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to adjust disputes or claims by entrymen, selectors, grantees, and patentees of the United States against the United States and between each other, arising from faulty surveys in townships 36, 37, and 39 south, ranges 29 and 30 east, Tallahassee meridian, in the State of Florida, and for other purposes, which were: On page 1, line 7, after the word "in" to insert "township 29 south, range 28 east; also in"; on page 3, to strike out lines 20 to 24, inclusive, and on page 4, lines 1 and 2, and to amend the title so as to read: "To authorize the Secretary of the Interior to adjust disputes or claims by entrymen, selectors, grantees, and patentees of the United States against the United States and between each other, arising from faulty surveys in township 29 south, range 28 east; also in townships 36, 37, and 38 south, ranges 29 and 30 east, Tallahassee meridian, in the State of Florida, and for other purposes."

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 2945. An act to authorize the sale of certain lands at or near Minidoka, Idaho, for railroad purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

RETIREMENT AS LIEUTENANT GENERAL.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any further morning business?

Mr. KING obtained the floor.

Mr. KNOX rose.

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania, if he desires to call up the measure which was under consideration yesterday.

Mr. KNOX. That was my purpose in rising.

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. KNOX. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 173, being Senate bill 2867.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2867) to authorize the President, when Maj. Gen. Crowder retires, to place him on the reired list of the Army as a lieutenant general.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment is that offered by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN].

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. May I ask the Senator whether his amendment contemplates retiring men with the rank of lieutenant general who have only reached the grade of major general or brigadier general?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. If they desire to retire; and I am including only those men who have distinguished themselves in the war.

Mr. THOMAS. I am aware that some of those named by the Senator's amendment are major generals, and one or two of them brigadier generals. That is the reason of my inquiry.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. If it comes to that, I may say that but for the act of April 27, 1914, 38 Statutes at Large, 356, Gen. Crowder himself, after his retirement from the office of Judge Advocate General, would have gone back to the rank of colonel in the Judge Advocate General's department.

Mr. THOMAS. I had in mind one of the names included in the list in the Senator's amendment just read by the Secretary. I think he was a brigadier general.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will give the Senator from Colorado the rank of each of these gentlemen:

Lieut. Gen. Liggett and Lieut. Gen. Bullard; permanent rank, major general.

Maj. Gen. McAndrew, Chief of Staff, American Expeditionary Forces; permanent rank, brigadier general.

Maj. Gen. Harbord, Chief of the Supply Service, American Expeditionary Forces; permanent rank, brigadier general.

Maj. Gen. Ernest Hinds, Chief of Artillery, American Expeditionary Forces; permanent rank, colonel of Field Artillery.

That, possibly, is one of the names the Senator from Colorado has in mind.

Maj. Gen. Merritte W. Ireland, chief surgeon, American Expeditionary Forces, now Surgeon General of the Army under a four-year commission; permanent rank, colonel of the Medical Corps.

Maj. Gen. Harry L. Rogers, chief quartermaster, American Expeditionary Forces, now Quartermaster General of the Army under a four-year commission; permanent rank, colonel, Quartermaster Corps.

Maj. Gen. Langfitt, chief engineer, American Expeditionary Forces; permanent rank, colonel, Corps of Engineers.

Maj. Gen. Kenly, American Expeditionary Forces, Chief, Air Service, United States Army; permanent rank, colonel, Field Artillery.

Maj. Gen. McCain, The Adjutant General of the Army under a four-year commission; permanent rank, colonel, The Adjutant General's Department.

Maj. Gen. Charles P. Summerall, who commanded the First Division and later a corps; permanent rank, colonel, Field Artillery.

Maj. Gen. Leonard Wood, senior major general of the Regular Army.

So the Senator from Colorado will see that some men whose rank is below that of major general—as low as the rank of colonel—are included in my amendment for retirement as lieutenant generals when they do retire. As I said a while ago, but for the saving grace of the act of April 27, 1914, Thirty-eighth Statutes at Large, page 356, Gen. Crowder would, upon his failure of reappointment, either have gone back into private life, if his place had been filled, or he would have gone back, if a place had been left open for him, to the rank of colonel in the Judge Advocate General's Department. That would have been his status.

But the act of 1914 provided that "whenever the President shall deem it inadvisable to reappoint, at the end of a four-year term, any officer who, under the provisions of section 26 of the act approved February 2, 1901, or acts amendatory thereof, has been appointed for such a term, in any staff corps or staff department, to an office with rank above that of colonel, but whose commission in the lower grade held by him in said staff corps or staff department at the time of his appointment under said act to an office of higher grade has been vacated, the President may, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint said officer to be an officer of the grade that he would have held, and to occupy the relative position that he would have occupied, in said staff corps or staff department if he had not been appointed to said office with rank above that of colonel; and if under the operation of this proviso the number of officers of any particular grade in any staff corps or staff department shall at any time exceed the number authorized by law other than this act, no vacancy occurring in said grade shall be filled until after the total number of officers therein shall have been reduced below the number so authorized."

I can not see any reason for the recognition of the services of Gen. Crowder over and above the services of the distinguished men whom I have named, and I might say others in the service who are equally entitled to the distinction. I myself voted at one time to increase the rank of Gen. Crowder. I have no disposition to minimize the services he has rendered the country. But by his very preferment, under the terms of this bill, we do minimize the services of other men who did as great service as he, if not greater.

The basis for this proposed distinction is the service that he rendered the country as Provost Marshal General. It is true that those services were valuable from more points of view than one. It is true that Gen. Crowder, or Gen. Crowder's office, prepared the original or groundwork of the so-called selective-service act, which was submitted to the House of Representatives and to the Senate in 1917. But he was not the author of the idea of compelling every man of military age and fitness to serve, because the idea had been advanced by many men in the country before Gen. Crowder ever thought of it or at least ever urged it. Washington urged it in the Revolution, as has every military leader since. I remember very well that Mr. Gardner, of the House of Representatives, from Massachusetts, who later gave up his life in the service of his country, was a most ardent advocate of the system long before Gen. Crowder prepared the bill. There were other Members of the House and Senate who advocated not only compulsory service but universal compulsory military training as one of the steps necessary for the preparation of this country for defense, or, if need be, for offensive war. The President of the United States, in his war message, advocated compulsory service, and all of this, if you please, was before Gen. Crowder had prepared the bill, and long before any utterance of his upon the subject that I remember.

But the selective-service act, as it finally passed, did not require a man of any peculiar brains or extraordinary capacity to carry into effect its provisions, and without attempting to minimize the service which Gen. Crowder rendered under it, I am going to call attention to this fact: The bill as it was prepared by Gen. Crowder in its substantial provisions, and particularly in the provision which made it a popular measure and which enabled the civilian population of the country to participate in the execution of the law, was prepared by the Military Committees of the House and Senate; and whenever the committee of the Senate or the committee of the House desired assistance and advice from the Judge Advocate General's department, who came to advise with them? Gen. Crowder? No. The man who came before the committee, both before it passed either body and after it got into conference, was Mr. Warren, a distinguished civilian lawyer from Detroit, Mich.

May I say, parenthetically, that the Secretary of War and the Judge Advocate General seem to have resolved themselves into a mutual admiration society, because whenever the Secretary of War has occasion to address Gen. Crowder it is in complimentary terms, and whenever the Judge Advocate General has occasion to address the Secretary of War it is practically in the same kind of terms.

[At this point a colloquy occurred, and the bill went over until to-morrow.]

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, when the Senate went into executive session yesterday I was discussing the propriety of recognizing Gen. Crowder by having him appointed a lieutenant general after his retirement, while ignoring the men who abroad had done the actual fighting, and men in this country who had rendered just as efficient and just as effective service in the prosecution of the war as Gen. Crowder did as Provost Marshal General. Without any intent to minimize the service of Gen. Crowder, but rather commending him for what he did, it seems to me he is not entitled to any higher commendation than other men who, whether at home or abroad, did their patriotic duty in prosecuting this war to a successful conclusion.

The Secretary of War, in commenting upon the bill which is now before the Senate, says what I am about to read in a letter dated September 2, 1919, to the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee. After referring to the bill, he says:

> My own contact with Gen. Crowder, of course, began when I became Secretary of War in March, 1916, from which time until America's entry into the World War he continued actively in charge of the duties of Judge Advocate General and was in daily conference with me about difficult legal problems. I then conceived an admiration, which has daily increased, for his great range of knowledge and experience in questions of law, military and civil, and the detailed history of the Military Establishment of the United States. In 1917 Gen. Crowder prepared, in consultation with me, the selective-service law, and I appointed him Provost Marshal General to execute that law, a service delicate and intricate, requiring the institution of nation-wide machinery which would function harmoniously and with such visible and obvious justice as to commend both the law and its execution to public favor. This service he performed with conspicuous ability, and it is one of the outstanding features of America's military mobilization that, although we resorted to conscription there is a general consensus of opinion to the effect that the law was executed without fear or favor, and that justice and wisdom characterized its interpretations and applications.

That, Mr. President, may be all true; and yet why should Gen. Crowder, as I said awhile ago, be recognized over and above any of these other men who participated in the splendid work of prosecuting the war? I remember that the Secretary of War not very long ago sent to the Senate the names of Gen. Bliss, Gen. Liggett, Gen. March, and several other officers, in a bill that would have had the effect of promoting these distinguished officers of the Army. That was before he sent in the bill in behalf of Gen. Crowder. Why are they omitted now, and why is Gen. Crowder's name singled out from all the rest?

Mr. President, I am going to show from the record that the part of the selective-service law that made it popular as well as possible with the American people was not prepared by Gen. Crowder. I am going to show from the record itself that if Gen. Crowder's bill had become the law not only would the selective-service law have been a failure, but it would have been one of the most unpopular laws that was ever passed by the Congress, because it might have left the conscripting of the youth of America largely in the hands of the Military Establishment. In order to prove what I say, I call the attention of the Senate to the so-called selective-service law as introduced in the House of Representatives on the 19th of April, 1917.

In that bill, in section 3, is this proviso:

> That the President is authorized and empowered to constitute and establish throughout the United States tribunals for the purpose of enforcing and carrying into effect the terms and provisions of this act, together with such regulations as he shall prescribe and determine necessary for its administration. A majority of the members of each tribunal shall be citizens of the United States not connected with the Military Establishment: Provided further, That upon the complaint of any person who feels himself aggrieved by his enrollment or draft as is herein provided, any court of record, State or Federal, having general jurisdiction in matters pertaining to the writ of habeas corpus, according to local laws or by act of Congress, shall have jurisdiction, by proceedings in the nature of the writ of habeas corpus, to hear summarily and determine the rights of such person.

In other words, it left to the Judge Advocate General the power to appoint the men who were to pass upon the qualifications of these young men; and if there was any appeal at all, it had to be to the several courts rather than to tribunals in the locality from which the young men came.

That bill was introduced by Mr. DENT in the House, and that particular provision was amended in committee. The House tried to popularize what might have been entirely a military measure by modifying it so as to bring it a little nearer to the people; but the provision as amended by the House Military Affairs Committee and as adopted by the House did not bring it entirely within the jurisdiction of the local civilian authorities. When the bill came into the Senate, the Senate still further undertook to amend it so as to remove its enforcement as far as it was possible to do so from active military control.

Now, Mr. President, I am going to read the provision as it passed the Senate:

> The President shall make rules and regulations to carry out the terms and provisions of this section, and provide for the issuance of certificates of exemption or partial or limited exemption, and for a system to exclude and discharge individuals from selective draft.

Now, note:

> There shall be created under the direction of the President local tribunals in the several States or subdivisions thereof, composed of the members of the local civil government, to decide all questions of exemption under this act, and also all questions arising under the draft for partial military service or for including or discharging individuals or classes of individuals from the selective draft, which shall be made under the rules and regulations aforesaid, and shall also provide for an appeal tribunal.

That amendment for the first time provided that local tribunals should have to do with the young men who were being taken into the Army under the selective draft. Now, that was not sufficient to do it.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. STANLEY. What was the date of the introduction of that bill?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The 19th of April, 1917.

Mr. President, that provision was not entirely satisfying to the Military Affairs Committee, and I think my colleagues will bear me out in that statement. However, when the bill passed the House and was referred to the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate, the Senate committee substituted this bill for the measure as it passed the House. It went back to the House, and the Senate amendments were disagreed to, and the bill, of course, went into conference.

Now, Mr. President, the one thing in that measure that was discussed in conference with great deliberation was the question of local tribunals where the young men could have their claims for exemption properly adjudicated.

Did Gen. Crowder come before the conferees to assist them? Not at all. It was recognized by some of the members of that committee, at least, that Gen. Crowder was not the man to undertake to popularize that measure. The man who was called into consultation was Mr. Charles Warren.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Charles Warren, of Detroit, Mich. He afterwards went into the service.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I think the Senator will remember that Mr. Warren was in the Provost Marshal General's Department, and really was the next man and ranked next to Crowder, and came before us by direction of Gen. Crowder.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; that is right.

Mr. WARREN. I think he was a lieutenant colonel.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. He was when he went out of the service. I am not criticizing that. I am suggesting the fact that the man who was sent before the committee for the purpose of assisting in perfecting this bill and bringing the local communities into touch with the Military Establishment was a civilian lawyer of distinction from Detroit, Mich., as I have before stated; and I want to pay him the compliment of saying here and now that there never was a man who appeared before the committee who tried harder to give to the country the best service that was in him, without fear or favor.

and without any regard to what effect his course might have upon himself.

Now let us see what the conferees did in reference to that matter.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. FLETCHER. The whole plan of the draft was all settled, decided on, arranged for, and prepared before Mr. Warren came to the department at all, was it not?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not know whether that is a fact or not. The bill may have been prepared long before it was introduced on the 19th day of April, 1917, and it may be that Mr. Warren was not in the department. It may be that he did not participate in its framing. It is claimed, however, by the Secretary of War that practically all credit is due to Gen. Crowder after consultation with him. However that may be, the man who did assist the conferees in order to try to get a tribunal that would not only be fair but whose decisions would satisfy the communities in which these young men lived was Mr. Warren.

Now, Mr. President, let us see what the conferees did.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, at this point, referring to the contention made by the Senator that popularizing the draft was due to the introduction of the Dent bill to control the discretion of the draft boards, while it is perfectly true that Mr. Dent did introduce that bill, which was a most exemplary measure, it appears from the records that it carried out the preconceived notions of Gen. Crowder. There was no difference of opinion between them.

In a letter prepared several days beforehand—because it was sent to all the governors of the United States, and to me among them—he said, if the Senator will permit me to read just a line:

A permanent board in each county, composed of citizens who could be relied upon * * * to provide for avoiding the misery that war brings to dependents at home and for a choice of those whose military service the Nation most needs and whose civil and domestic service can best be spared—

Should be selected.

He not only suggests a civilian board, but he suggests the exercise of that power in such a way as to entail no unnecessary hardship upon the people of the country.

I thought it was due to Gen. Crowder that I should make that statement.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Of course, Mr. President, I can best judge what was in Gen. Crowder's mind by the bill that he is said to have prepared, and I have read that particular section to the Senate. Under that bill he might or might not have carried out the things that he had in his mind, and, judging from some of the things to which I shall refer a little later on, I am disposed to believe that he never would have done anything to take away from the strong arm of the military any modicum of power that he might see fit to exercise. I am willing to do him the credit of saying that he had in his mind the appointment of distinctively civilian boards in the various counties, but the bill did not compel him to do it, and that is what I am complaining about. Neither did the Senate bill compel him, although the Senate bill as amended did provide that there should be civil local tribunals to handle the situation. When the conferees of the House and Senate got together here is what they provided:

The President is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to create and establish throughout the several States and subdivisions thereof and in the Territories and the District of Columbia local boards, and where, in his discretion, practicable and desirable, there shall be created and established one such local board in each county or similar subdivision in each State, and one for approximately each 30,000 of population in each city of 30,000 population or over, according to the last census taken or estimates furnished by the Bureau of Census of the Department of Commerce. Such boards shall be appointed by the President and shall consist of three or more members, none of whom shall be connected with the Military Establishment, to be chosen from among the local authorities of such subdivisions or from other citizens residing in the subdivision or area in which the respective boards will have jurisdiction under the rules and regulations prescribed by the President. Such boards shall have power within their respective jurisdictions to hear and determine, subject to review as hereinafter provided, all questions of exemption under this act and all questions of or claims for including or discharging individuals or classes of individuals from the selective draft, which shall be made under rules and regulations prescribed by the President, except any and every question or claim for including or excluding or discharging persons or classes of persons from the selective draft under the provisions of this act authorizing the President to exclude or discharge from the selective draft "persons engaged in industries, including agriculture, found to be necessary to the maintenance of the Military Establishment, or the effective operation of the military forces, or the maintenance of national interest during the emergency."

Mr. President, there was the bringing home to the citizens of a community the power to pass upon the claims of the young men who went from that community to fight for their country.

Further:

The President is hereby authorized to establish additional boards, one in each Federal judicial district of the United States, consisting of such number of citizens, not connected with the Military Establishment, as the President may determine, who shall be appointed by the President. The President is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to establish more than one such board in any Federal judicial district of the United States, or to establish one such board having jurisdiction of an area extending into more than one Federal judicial district.

Mr. President, there was an appeal to no military satrap, to no military autocrat, but an appeal from a local board that passed upon the claims for exemption of these young men, and then an appeal to another tribunal of the same State, both entirely civilian boards.

One would think, from the encomiums passed upon the Judge Advocate General, acting as Provost Marshal General, that he was entitled to all of the credit for formulating as well as for putting the law into execution. I say that the American people are entitled to at least a little of that credit. The law itself was written in terms so plain that anybody might have carried out the provisions of it. It did not require any excess of brain to enforce it. If a man had the money furnished him by the Government of the United States and had the men under him to do what he desired to have them do, there was not any question about how it should be carried out, because the law said exactly what should be done.

What was done—not under the bill as written by Gen. Crowder but under the bill as it was finally passed by Congress—and who did it? Let us see.

Referring to the second report of the Provost Marshal General in 1918, page 478, Appendix, Table 91–A, we find that the force that was at work to make this law successful were the following:

In State headquarters: 54 governors, 49 adjutants general, 49 assistants to the adjutants general, 49 medical aids, 624 civilian clerks, 174 enlisted clerks.

District boards: 155 district boards, 915 members of district boards, 124 additional members, 944 civilian clerks, 145 enlisted clerks, 411 industrial advisers.

Local boards: 4,648 local boards, 14,416 members, 9,227 civilian clerks, 3,218 enlisted clerks, 4,679 Government appeal agents, 12,039 additional examining physicians.

Legal advisory boards: 3,646 legal advisory boards, 10,915 members, 108,367 associate members.

Medical advisory boards: 1,319 medical advisory boards, 9,577 members, 411 civilian clerks, 246 enlisted clerks.

Boards of instruction: 2,952 boards, 16,055 members.

A total civilian personnel of 192,688, most of them acting without pay, and all for much less than their services were worth.

These distinguished citizens who gave their services and neglected their business for months at a time in order to serve their country I do not believe have been recognized even by a vote of thanks. I may be mistaken about that, and if I am I hope some Senator will correct me. The question of their fitting recognition has been before Congress a number of times. It may be, as the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] says, that Gen. Crowder had it in mind to do the very things that were done. But there was nothing in his proposed bill to compel it. The law as passed by the Congress compelled it, and these men were volunteers to assist in putting it into execution. They are the people who made the law popular. They are the men who made the carrying out of the law possible.

Mr. President, may I digress here to remark that there was a time under the old volunteer system where whole communities were unrepresented in the Army, and in those communities where there was no such representative, treason sometimes dared rear its head. But under this system, where every community in the United States had one or more representatives in the Army of the United States, treason became practically impossible, because every man, whether of military age and fitness or not, as well as every woman and child, saw to it that those who were guilty of anything that squinted toward treason were promptly brought to the bar of public opinion and sometimes to the bar of justice and punished for their disloyalty.

When it is claimed by the partisans of Gen. Crowder that he conceived the idea of the draft for the raising of an army I call attention to the fact that the Southern Confederacy resorted to the draft in the first days of the War Between the States, and the Union Congress followed very shortly afterwards, because it learned, as all countries have learned by experience, that an army the size of that proposed to be raised by the United States could not be raised to carry on the war except under some form of compulsion.

I think the ablest paper I ever read in support of the draft, its feasibility, its advisability, and its constitutionality, was written by President Lincoln himself. I do not think it can be successfully contended that Gen. Crowder was the author of the idea, and I think I have shown, that he did not frame that portion of the law which gave every community a voice in passing upon the qualifications and claims of the young men who went to make up the Army.

I think, without detracting from Gen. Crowder's efforts, that his supporters might at least be willing to concede some of the glory to the men from civil life who were acting from purely patriotic motives. I believe it was Admiral Schley who, in speaking of the battle in Santiago Harbor, said there was glory enough for all. There is glory enough for all who participated in making this war a success, and in making the draft law a success as well.

Passing over that, what is Congress going to do for men like Gen. McCain, who rendered such signal service as Adjutant General of the Army, a man who could always be approached by civilian and soldier alike, and one who could always be found at his post ready to give information and advice to all comers without any military red tape to be cut in order to approach him?

Gen. McCain was removed from his post as Adjutant General almost between suns and another put in his place. I doubt if there is a man in either branch of Congress who will claim for a moment that Gen. McCain did not render splendid service to his country as Adjutant General and did not do as much in a more quiet way as Gen. Crowder or anyone else. You never saw his name in print; you never saw him out undertaking to get eulogistic letters from the Secretary of War or anybody else; but he was at his post just the same all the time, undertaking to and doing his duty as a gallant and splendid soldier. The military conscience, as well as the civilian conscience, was shocked at the removal of this distinguished man. The Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate called on the Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff to find out why a man who had discharged his duty so efficiently, so promptly, and so well was removed from a post when there seemed to be no complaint against him. These gentlemen, in a hearing before the committee, testified to his splendid work, testified to his efficiency, and assured the committee he was not being removed because of inefficiency, but the lame excuse, which everybody who heard the testimony believed was a subterfuge, was given that they wanted fighting men, and they sent him up to train and command a division in Massachusetts, I believe, a duty that he had never performed before; but, like a soldier, he did not raise his voice in protest or complain to anybody for the injustice being done him. I think I may say, without violating any confidence, that I talked to Gen. McCain and asked him if possibly any of his friends might speak a kindly word to the Secretary of War or the Chief of Staff in his behalf, and he said: "No; I am a soldier. I go wherever I am ordered, and I shall try to make good, no matter where I may be called to serve."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon who were the officials of the War Department who resorted to what the Senator calls a subterfuge?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will say to the Senator that I do not hesitate to give names when I make a statement to the Senate. The men responsible were the Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff, of course. If that be treason, make the most of it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am not so much interested in whether it is treason or not; I assume it is true, and it was the source of my regret, that it is true there was such a charge.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. We called the men up who we thought were responsible for it and had them give Gen. McCain a clean bill of health as to efficiency, courage, and soldier-like conduct and character.

Now, Mr. President, Gen. McCain has only the temporary rank of major general, I believe, and will in due course revert to the rank of a colonel. There is no saving grace for him in the act of 1914. Why pass him by while we are granting distinguished certificates to gentlemen who rendered service for our country at home? It hardly seems right to me. And what of Gen. Liggett, who commanded troops on the firing line in France, and whose name was at one time presented in the form of a bill by the Secretary of War for higher and permanent rank in the Army because of his distinguished service? Why pass him by? And then, too, what of Gen. Bullard, who commanded over there and rendered distinguished service, baring his breast to the bullet of the Hun? Why pass him by? And Gen. Summerall? I think he is recognized in the Army as one of the most distinguished men who ever commanded a division or corps. Why pass him by?

It is not necessary, if it is intended to honor these, to retire them as a condition to conferring such honor upon them. All that is necessary is to adopt the amendment I suggest and provide for the retirement, and let them retire or not as they please. Many of them are young men and probably would not avail themselves of it by retiring.

It is necessary to dwell upon all the names indicated in the proposed amendment of mine. Everyone knows of their services. My proposition is not to leave heartburnings in men who have rendered distinguished service to their country in emergency by recognizing the merits of one and discriminating against all others.

Mr. President, I sometimes fear that some of the swivel-chair artists here in Washington receive greater recognition than some of the officers and men who were on the firing line and doing their duty overseas. I might name some who were on the battle front and who received the croix de guerre, who came back to America and were promptly reduced to their original rank in the Army. Why pass those men by? And now, by the recognition of the services of one man, say to the balance of the Army, "He stands par excellence the man that ought to be promoted in this magnificent Army of ours."

But, Mr. President, if for the sake of the argument we concede to Gen. Crowder the right above all others to be recognized by this distinguished rank upon his retirement, if we concede that he was not only the author of the idea of the selective draft, but that he prepared the law, if we concede that he put it into effect, if we concede that he has done all that was necessary to raise the army which was raised, then, Mr. President, there ought to come with it and he ought not to attempt to share the greater responsibility for the proper care and attention and protection of the young men for whose service in the war he was so absolutely responsible under the contention of some of his friends. If all these things be conceded, the man who was able to accomplish so much and the man who was responsible for raising the Army ought to have seen to it, if it was humanly possible, that the Army which was raised by him received justice at the hands of those who administered the law in the Army. I do not hesitate to say that the man who had the power to do that was Gen. Crowder himself.

I see one of my colleagues upon the Committee on Military Affairs smiling. I know he differs from me.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I was not smiling.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I thought the Senator was smiling. I was not offended by it, even if the Senator was. I have too high a regard for the Senator. We may differ quite radically occasionally, but they are always friendly differences, and out of differences there ought sometimes to come the proper adjustment of conditions.

But I say the one man who was responsible, the one man who by his word might have changed the conditions with regard to the administration of military law in the Army, was Gen. Crowder. I entertained a very different opinion of Gen. Crowder up to the time the controversy about the court-martial system arose from the opinion which I have reluctantly formed of him since that controversy arose. Gen. Crowder, while he was acting as Provost Marshal General, was holding down pretty tight another job of equal if not greater importance, and that was the position of Judge Advocate General of the Army. It is true, he had a distinguished officer as Acting Judge Advocate General a part of the time while he was Provost Marshal General, but when the differences over the administration of military law became acute between the Judge Advocate General and the Acting Judge Advocate General, the latter had to step aside and finally step out of the Army of the United States, occupying, as he did, a position which no honorable man could occupy under the situation that developed in the differences to which I am going to allude.

Let us see about that. There were men in the Judge Advocate General's Department who looked upon a court-martial as simply an executive agency. There were others in the Judge Advocate General's Department who looked upon the courts-martial as courts under our system of jurisprudence, but the later decisions of the courts are that they are, in fact, courts under our system of jurisprudence, just as much so as the civil courts. But, however that may be, I am going to call the attention of the Senate to the text of the provision of the law about which all the storm has raged about the court-martial system, and incidentally the harshness of the sentences and the cruelties practiced against American troops.

Section 1199 of the Revised Statutes provides as follows:

The Judge Advocate General shall receive, revise, and cause to be recorded the proceedings of all courts-martial, courts of inquiry, and military commissions, and perform such other duties as have been performed heretofore by the Judge Advocate General of the Army.

The construction placed upon that statute by the Judge Advocate General was that the power to revise gave no other or greater power than to advise the commanding officer who appointed the court in all cases where the court had jurisdiction and the trial was regular. While those who differed from him held that the power to revise gave power to the Judge Advocate General as an appellate tribunal to reverse and to modify and to change the decisions in cases where prejudicial error was disclosed by the record.

Mr. President, this matter was first brought to the attention of the department of military justice by a flagrant case or flagrant cases that happened in the administration of military law in Texas prior to November, 1917. That was where 12 or 15 noncommissioned officers of Battery A, of the Eighteenth Field Artillery, who were charged with mutiny, were tried and sentenced to dishonorable discharge and long terms of imprisonment. Those cases came up to the office of the Judge Advocate General, and it was conceded by everybody—there was not any difference of opinion, I believe, upon the subject—that those men ought not to have been convicted of mutiny. But it seemed that the court had jurisdiction and the trial was regular, and in that view there was no appellate relief for the accused except clemency.

Here were 12 or 15 honorable men, who had been faithfully serving their country, charged with a crime, of which they were not guilty under the law. In view of that, on the 10th day of November, 1917, the Acting Judge Advocate General prepared a memorandum of great length and of distinguished ability urging upon the Secretary of War for his personal consideration that the authority vested in the Judge Advocate General of the Army by section 1199 of the Revised Statutes to "receive, revise, and cause to be recorded the proceedings of all courts-martial, courts of inquiry, and military commissions, and perform such other duties as have been performed heretofore by the Judge Advocate General of the Army" carried with it the power to modify and to change the decisions.

Gen. Ansell, in the brief which he presented for the consideration of the Secretary of War and the Judge Advocate General, reasoned it out, showing by analogous decisions in connection with other legislative acts where courts had been called upon to determine the meaning of the word "revise" that the word meant more than simply the power to take up a record by the four corners, look at it, and send it back to the commanding officer and say that he was the reviewing and revising authority and alone had the power to revoke, modify, or set aside the sentence of a court-martial. I am not going to read that brief, but I hope that some of the Senators at least will read it.

It will be found in the hearings, part 2, on the Establishment of Military Justice, held by the Committee on Military Affairs, United States Senate, on S. 64, at page 57. I do not think, Mr. President, that any impartial lawyer can read that opinion and come to any other conclusion than that the power to revise meant more than the mere power to look over the papers and to say that the only power granted under the statute was the power to send a case back to the commanding officer who appointed the court.

Let us see who agreed with the opinion of Gen. Ansell when the memorandum was prepared by him and presented to the Secretary of War for his personal consideration. Gen. Ansell expressed the preference and hope that each one of the distinguished officers in his department would read the record and express their concurrence or dissent. These are the men who read it, assented to it, and concurred with Gen. Ansell: James J. Mays, lieutenant colonel, judge advocate; George S. Wallace, major, judge advocate, Officers' Reserve Corps; Guy D. Goff, major, judge advocate, Officers' Reserve Corps; William O. Gilbert, major, judge advocate, Officers' Reserve Corps; Lewis W. Call, major, judge advocate, United States Army; Edward S. Bailey, major, judge advocate, Officers' Reserve Corps; William B. Pistole, major, judge advocate, Officers' Reserve Corps; E. M. Morgan, major, judge advocate, Officers' Reserve Corps; Eugene Wambaugh, major, judge advocate, Officers' Reserve Corps; E. G. Davis, major, judge advocate, Officers' Reserve Corps; Maj., later Lieut. Col. Alfred E. Clark, judge advocate, Officers' Reserve Corps; R. K. Spiller, whose rank is not given, judge advocate, Officers' Reserve Corps; Herbert A. White, lieutenant colonel, judge advocate.

These men all concurred in that opinion; and on the 27th day of November—just 17 days afterwards—Gen. Crowder prepared for the Secretary of War a memorandum in opposition to the contention that a revisory power was reposed in the Judge Advocate General.

There is no question that the opposition brief of Gen. Crowder was ably written, but he harks back to the days of the Civil War and undertakes to extract—and I think rather unsuccessfully—opinions of former Judge Advocates General and of the courts, if you please, that sustain his view of the proposition that the power to revise only means the power to look over a record and, where the court had jurisdiction, only to advise the commanding officer who appointed the court.

On the 11th day of December, 1917, Gen. Ansell prepared another brief on the subject. The incident which brought the matter to the attention of these men was the cruelty that had been practiced against the 12 or 15 sergeants in Texas. Oh, say some of them, there is only an occasional injustice, just as there is in the civil courts. Mr. President, if it is possible because of the system that any injustice may be done, something ought to be done to remedy the situation.

Mr. OWEN. They are not rare exceptions, either.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. They are not rare exceptions. I may say to the Senator that, although I have not done so, I have been threatening to place in the RECORD, and I am going to put in the RECORD, the cases to show that instances of injustice are not of infrequent occurrence. Without going into the subject, take the case of the negro soldiers in Houston who were convicted and sentenced to be shot. Without discussing the question of their guilt or innocence—for I assume that they were guilty—these men were executed, Mr. President, without anybody ever having seen the record except the commanding officer and those connected directly with the trial.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GERRY in the chair). Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. WATSON. Does the Senator claim that Gen. Crowder had knowledge of all of these cases, or that they were all brought to his attention?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Of course, for they happened during his term as Judge Advocate General.

Mr. WATSON. Yes; but I was wondering whether or not in the midst of the many burdens he was bearing and the many difficulties there were to encounter he had personal knowledge of the various transactions of which the Senator speaks.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. He had the time to prevent any reform of conditions. He had the time to write a very able brief in order to sustain the position he was taking, and I am referring to one right now. If he could not take care of both jobs he ought to have gotten out of one. I say that if he was responsible for organizing our huge Army—and he is given credit for it—he was responsible for these cruelties as long as he held the other position.

The execution of those colored men in Texas led to the adoption of a regulation—not a law but a regulation—that in cases where the death sentence was imposed the sentence should not be carried into effect until the reviewing authorities had an opportunity to pass upon it; but the cases of these men did not reach the reviewing authority until the daisies were growing over the graves of the convicted men. Anything permitting such a thing in America is outrageous. It makes no difference what the color of an American soldier's skin is, he is an American citizen just the same, fighting for his country, and he is entitled to have the benefit of a fair, honest, and impartial trial.

Gen. Crowder wrote a brief, as I have said, in opposition to the views of Gen. Ansell. That was perfectly proper; I make no objection to that—and he presented the subject ably. I am merely calling attention to these matters, Mr. President, to show you that the subject has been a storm center.

Again Gen. Ansell prepared a memorandum in answer to the latter brief, which was concurred in by the distinguished officers associated with him. Maj. Wambaugh prepared a separate brief suggesting regulations that would measurably protect the soldier. Then Gen. Ansell prepared a special brief to show that the Judge Advocate General had reviewing and appellate power. Then, on the 17th day of December, 1919, Gen. Crowder presented another brief, and, without calling attention to the number of them, I ask Senators who are interested in the subject—and they will become interested in it because their hearts will become involved—to read the arguments pro and con by these distinguished Army officers and civilian officers temporarily in the Judge Advocate General's department.

Mr. President, to get down to a concrete proposition everybody in the Army recognized, Gen. Crowder amongst the rest, that there ought to be some appellate jurisdiction somewhere in somebody to cure the radical wrongs which all conceded to exist. Now, let us see whether or not I state the fact when I make that statement. I am going to dwell on it just a little while, because I have been criticized somewhat in connection with it, and I think I can justify the position which the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate took in reference to it.

The Secretary of War, after all these discussions had been had that I have been calling attention to about the power of the Judge Advocate General's office, sent up a letter to the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate, on the 19th day of January, 1918, just a month after the last brief had been submitted to him on the subject, and inclosed to me, as the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee, a bill that was to do what—to vest in some authority the power to revise and to reverse and to modify these unjust sentences. Now, I am going to read that letter to the Senate. It is very short. It shows, first, a recognition of the necessity of vesting appellate jurisdiction in some forum somewhere, with power to relieve these men; but it does more than that, Mr. President. It retains in the Military Establishment, which was responsible for these cruelties, instead of in some civilian or partly civilian tribunal, a power it ought not to have.

Now, let us see if I am stating it correctly. It was a proposed amendment to section 1199 of the Revised Statutes. It is as follows:

> The Judge Advocate General shall receive, revise, and cause to be recorded the proceedings of all courts-martial, courts of inquiry, and military commissions—

That is an exact copy, so far, of section 1199, as it is to-day. Then it goes on:

> And report thereon to the President, who shall have power to disapprove, vacate, or set aside any finding, in whole or in part, to modify, vacate, or set aside any sentence, in whole or in part, and to direct the execution of such part only of any sentence as has not been vacated or set aside. The President may suspend the execution of sentences in such classes of cases as may be designated by him until acted upon as herein provided, and may return any record through the reviewing authority to the court for reconsideration or correction. In addition to the duties herein enumerated to be performed by the Judge Advocate General he shall perform such other duties as have been heretofore performed by the Judge Advocate General of the Army.

Mr. President, there is provided an appeal from Philip drunk to Philip sober. On the face of it, it is an appeal to the President of the United States. As a matter of fact, it is an appeal from the Judge Advocate General and through the Judge Advocate General to the Chief of Staff. It was keeping the control of military justice within the power of a military autocracy.

Mr. President, that bill was introduced in the Senate by me at the request of the Secretary of War. The distinguished chairman of the committee will agree with me when I say that we usually introduce these bills in the Senate at his request, whether they meet our approval or not. Then the bill goes to the committee for discussion. That bill was introduced in the House by the then chairman of the House committee, Mr. DENT, and was then referred to the committee. The House held some hearings on it, and never reported it out. The Military Affairs Committee of the Senate did not act on it, for the simple reason that it was not necessary. It not only did not relieve the situation that then existed, about which there was so much complaint, but it made the situation actually worse.

I want to call attention to the fact that the proposed amendment sustains me in charging that the Judge Advocate General was turning over the subject of military justice to the Chief of Staff. Now, the Chief of Staff might on occasion be a very just, a very learned, and a very tender-hearted man, but there may be occasions when he may be a very hard-hearted man, wholly unskilled in the law. Let us see what the power of the Chief of Staff is under the General Staff act of 1903. It provides:

> The Chief of Staff, under the direction of the President, or of the Secretary of War under the direction of the President, shall have supervision of all troops of the line and of The Adjutant General's, Inspector General's, Judge Advocate's, Quartermaster, Subsistence, Medical, Pay, and Ordnance Departments, the Corps of Engineers, and the Signal Corps, and shall perform such other military duties not otherwise assigned by law as may be assigned to him by the President.

In other words, Mr. President, the Chief of Staff, in the last analysis, has jurisdiction and power over the Judge Advocate General. So that the addition which was intended to be put on section 1199 of the Revised Statutes made the last condition of the soldier worse than the first condition. It simply meant that these appeals that professed to be taken to the President of the United States went from the Judge Advocate General to the Chief of Staff, and never reached the President at all; and, in the very nature of things, we know that it is a physical impossibility for the President of the United States to consider or to revise these hundreds of thousands of court-martial cases—a physically, humanly impossible thing to be done. It proposed to place the jurisdiction over the life, liberty, and limb of the private soldier in the hands of the Chief of Staff, and practically gave him, as the military adviser of the President and the Secretary of War, the right to say whether or not these cases should be even considered by the President of the United States.

Mr. President, if anybody doubts the effect of this in practical life, I call his attention to the fact that the Chief of Staff now is practically the only man who can reach the Secretary of War, while men who come here with honorable and honored service can not reach him. The thing must go through military channels or it does not go there at all. So these poor, unfortunate fellows against whom harsh sentences have been rendered can only reach the President through the Judge Advocate General first, and then through the Chief of Staff; but even if they all reached the President, as the Secretary of War said in one of his letters the other day in referring to his own position, it is impossible for him to look over all of these cases.

But this is not all. Look again at that bill and you will see that in other respects it perpetuates the very worst features of the existing system. It expressly authorizes the Chief of Staff, acting for the President, (a) to set aside an acquittal and have the accused, though acquitted, tried again; (b) to substitute a conviction of a more serious offense for a less serious one; (c) to increase the punishment; and (d) to return the proceedings to the court, with directions to reconsider, for the purpose of doing all these things. Of this Gen. Crowder expressly approved in his statement before the House committee.

Now, Mr. President, if the Judge Advocate General and the Secretary of War, when they proposed that amendment to the Congress in 1918, really wanted a revisory power that meant something, all in the world they had to do was to construe the law as the Acting Judge Advocate General and his corps of assistants construed it, and say that the power to revise gave the power to modify and to change the sentence in the court below. In order to sustain his position, the Judge Advocate General had to go down into dusty tomes and shelves and dig out dicta of courts and dicta of Judge Holt and others who had acted in the distinguished capacity of Judge Advocate General.

That was all he needed to do, Mr. President. In view of the fact that he saw fit to place a harsher construction upon the statute, in view of the fact that he has constantly held, and the Secretary of War has stood by him, that where the court had jurisdiction the Judge Advocate General could only send the record back to the commanding officer with his advice upon it, which the commanding officer could pay some attention to or disregard, as suited his own sweet will, I make the suggestion, and sustain my position by the record, that that proposed amendment was not offered in good faith. Now, I am going to show you why, and I appeal to the record to sustain the suggestion I now make.

That proposed amendment came to the Military Affairs Committees of the House and Senate at a time when this storm had not only brewed but was raging around the cruelties that were being practiced against American troops in France, and not only in France but in the United States. About the time that that proposed amendment was presented to Congress by the Secretary of War, Gen. Kreger was sent over to France as the representative of the Judge Advocate General, and was later appointed acting judge advocate there, so that he could be on the ground as the representative of the Judge Advocate General, and hear these cases, and, may I say, revise the sentences in France, and advise the commanding officers appointing the courts. The only effect that appointment had was to save the time necessary to send records of courts-martial from France to the United States. It meant no change in the court-martial system, and no change of policy in the course of the Judge Advocate General with regard to the law.

In other words, it quickened action, whether it was just or unjust. It did not help the soldier who had been unjustly convicted or who had been harshly sentenced.

The suggestion I make is that that acting judge advocate general was sent to France as the representative of Gen. Crowder as a piece of camouflage, because trouble was brewing here, both in and out of Congress, as to the views and course of the Judge Advocate General, and an investigation of the system was threatened, and therefore something had to be done, and that, too, promptly, to allay the feeling that was being engendered, because these boys, notwithstanding the strict censorship, were writing to their homes; and this was done to act as oil upon the troubled waters in the discussion which was taking place within the department itself, and discussions which were suggested by the very cruelties themselves.

Now, here is what happened: It seems, from the correspondence which followed, that Gen. Pershing did not like this new policy very well. As a good soldier—and he was a good soldier—he did not say, "I will not have it," but he rather disliked the idea of having a man come over there to practically supplant a man like Gen. Bethel, who was the chief judge advocate on his staff. That is what it amounted to. Crowder then wrote a letter to Gen. Bethel, the judge advocate over in France on Gen. Pershing's staff, and that letter leads me to make the suggestion that this proposed amendment was not made in good faith, and I am going to read it.

It is not very long, Mr. President; but on the 5th day of April, 1918, shortly after this proposed amendment to section 1199 had been submitted to Congress, Gen. Crowder wrote the letter referred to to Gen. Bethel. It is as follows:

APRIL 5, 1918.

Brig. Gen. WALTER A. BETHEL,
American Expeditionary Forces, France.

MY DEAR BETHEL: I am going to spend the necessary time out of a very busy day in an attempt to clear up the situation in respect to the establishment in France of a branch of the Judge Advocate General's office, regarding which matter there seems to have been more or less misapprehension at your headquarters. You are, of course, familiar with the cable correspondence which has passed on the subject.

I would like to see that cable correspondence. We have never had it.

For your convenience in reference, however, I inclose a copy of a memorandum that I have had prepared for the Chief of Staff—

Reporting always to the Chief of Staff, which was proper in his view of the matter—in which that correspondence is reviewed and set out in sequence.

First, let me say that it is difficult for me to understand why, upon receipt of the two cablegrams of January 20, 1918—

Bear that in mind, Senators. The proposed amendment was sent to the House and Senate on the 18th day of January, 1918, and the cablegrams having reference to sending over a representative of Gen. Crowder were sent over to France on the 20th day of January, 1918—one cabling Gen. Pershing the contents of General Order No. 7, and the other designating you as Acting Judge Advocate General, the branch office of the Judge Advocate General was not immediately established. I assume that it was in operation from that time, and continued of this view until the receipt of Gen. Pershing's cablegram of February 25, 1918, wherein he says:

"Brig. Gen Walter A. Bethel has not established branch office and will not do so pending further instructions."

You see, Gen. Pershing did not want it. He had a good man over there as his staff judge advocate.

This leads me to comment upon the situation which is presented by Gen. Pershing's cablegram No. 779, which seems to imply some dissent from the action here taken in establishing the branch office. He appears to view it as a possible obstruction to the administration of military justice and as a mistake of judgment.

I do not blame Gen. Pershing for not wanting to have the affairs of this chaotic office here transferred to his command.

I wish you would assure Gen. Pershing (whom I would address directly but for the reason that I know he has no time to read letters) that every thought of this office, and I believe every thought of the War Department, is directed toward the discovery of ways and means to help him in his enormous task; that our idea was to expedite and not delay, and that he will understand better the occasion for this order if he will consider the following:

This is what I call the attention of the Senate to, and this is what makes me suggest that the proposed amendment in January, 1918, was not made to Congress in good faith. I continue reading:

Prior to the issue of General Order No. 7 it had become apparent that, due to the large increase in commissioned personnel, which included many officers with little or no experience in court-martial practice, a large number of proceedings were coming in which exhibited fatal defects. A congressional investigation was threatened and there was talk of the establishment of courts of appeal.

Think of it!

The remedy for the situation was immediate executive action which would make it clearly apparent that an accused did get some kind of revision of his court-martial proceedings other than the revision at field headquarters, where these prejudicial errors were occurring. At this point permit me to say that very few errors have been discovered in cases coming up from your headquarters. It was primarily with reference to errors occurring at field headquarters other than in France that this step was taken.

Accordingly we formulated the scheme of General Order No. 7. The Secretary of War gave personal consideration to the matter, and on three or four occasions discussed it exhaustively with this office. He finally approved the order and contemplated, as I did, the establishment of the branch office promptly upon the receipt of our two cables of January 20. I may say here that at other headquarters the scheme has worked beautifully It has silenced all criticism, and I believe that no invalid sentences are now beyond the reach of remedial action.

Your own intimate knowledge of court-martial procedure makes it quite unnecessary for me to enter upon a lengthy discussion of the merit of the new system which, I feel quite sure, will not fail to commend itself to you as a substantial step in the right direction. As stated in my memorandum to the Chief of Staff, it is believed that had Gen. Pershing fully understood the purpose and operation of General Order No. 7 his cablegram No. 779 of March 24, 1918, would not have been sent. I trust that the cablegram which I have recommended be sent him in reply, a draft of which is contained in the concluding paragraph of the inclosed memorandum, will serve to convince him of the wisdom and propriety of the issue of this order and that the procedure it contemplates will materially aid rather than obstruct the prompt and efficient administration of military justice in the American Expeditionary Forces.

With best wishes, I am,
Very truly, yours,

E. H. CROWDER,
Judge Advocate General.

The italics are mine.

Think of the Judge Advocate General of the Army sending a letter the information contained in which was to be communicated to Gen. Pershing, giving as a reason for his proposal to create a branch of his office in France that an investigation was being threatened, that there was talk of the establishment of a tribunal of appeal, and that it was necessary, in this state of the public mind, to make it appear that an accused should get some kind of a revision of his court-martial sentence.

Mr. President, was there ever committed to paper a more outrageous proposition than that to mislead and to deceive the mothers and the fathers of the young men who were serving in France and the young men themselves who were suffering under the sentences of these courts-martial? That is the reason I say that when these investigations were being threatened, and this storm was raging about the power of the Judge Advocate General to review and to reverse these sentences, the proposition for an amendment to the existing statute was not made in good faith, but was intended to deceive the American youths, half a million of them, if you please, who had undergone sentence of court-martial, summary and general, and make them feel and believe that they were getting some sort of revision of court-martial sentences. It is not stated that they would get it, but to make it appear that they were getting it. But the American youths were not deceived by any such pretense as that, and the American people are not being deceived by any such pretense as that, and there are those in the Senate and in the House of Representatives who will undertake to undeceive those few who have been deceived by it.

That condition in the administration of so-called military justice from April 5, 1918, to and through the latter part of the year, both in France and here, continued, and the cases of injustice were so numerous and so flagrant that reports of them continued to come to me and to many other Members of Congress. I am frank to say that the whole situation touched my heart very deeply. I felt that there ought to be some way to correct them. I felt that I ought to call the attention of the Senate to the situation. On the 31st day of December, 1918, the situation had become so acute and the complaints so numerous of these injustices that I addressed the Senate on the subject, calling attention to the situation. That was only supplementing what Gen. Ansell and other men in the establishment had called attention to, only they were limited in their criticisms by restrictive rules of the Military Establishment. But I was not restrained by any such rules, and I gave a few cases, and only a few, of extremely arbitrary action of and severe sentences imposed by courts-martial.

The Secretary of War immediately took up the cudgels and inclosed me a letter written to him by Gen. Crowder criticizing my statements as to the cases that I had cited, and the letter was so full of misstatements that I did not undertake to make it public. I did not want even to place Gen. Crowder or the Secretary of War in a position where they would be embarrassed by statements contained in that letter; and before the ink was dry on the letter of the Judge Advocate General he was sending letters through the Secretary of War to me, correcting criticisms that he had indulged in, both as to form and substance.

But Gen. Crowder was evidently not satisfied with my course. He gave to the press either the letter or the substance of it. I thereupon issued a public statement, Mr. President, which I ask may be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR CHAMBERLAIN.

Gen. Crowder, Judge Advocate General, has seen fit in the press to attack me concerning my position on the present court-martial system in the Army, to criticize statements made by me concerning that system in my speech to the Senate on December 31, 1918, and at the same time to defend the system.

Gen. Crowder's reply to my charges was also contained in a memorandum from the Secretary of War to me, which I received several weeks ago. His reply contained so many misstatements of fact that I hesitated to make it public, because I did not care to embarrass the Secretary by having him stand sponsor and be responsible for such erroneous and false statements in an official communication from the War Department to the Senate of the United States.

Since Gen. Crowder himself has made his reply public, apparently with the Secretary's consent, I no longer have this feeling of hesitancy. I therefore propose to show his misstatements, and, further, the insincerity of the entire defense of the present court-martial system.

In my speech I called attention to certain specific cases which illustrated the unfairness of the court-martial trials and the excessive sentences imposed by these courts. I based my criticism of the present system and my constructive suggestions as to the changes that should be made in it on the strength of those cases.

Gen. Crowder now says that had I asked him for the facts and circumstances of these cases before making my speech he would have supplied me with the "authentic data that would throw light on the correctness of my complaints." He attempts to furnish such data in his published statement. This data is wholly incorrect and misleading and is furnished by the general either with an astounding lack of knowledge of the facts or with a deliberate intention to mislead the public.

The first case cited by me in my speech was the following:

"A soldier doing military police duty who entered a shop during the night, because, according to his own story, he heard a noise which he thought was made by a burglar, was found in the shop and himself accused of burglary. The court-martial which tried him found him not guilty. The commanding officer who had appointed the court disapproved the verdict and 'recommended' that the court reconsider the case. The court did 'reconsider,' and found the man guilty and imposed a long term of imprisonment. The evidence was wholly circumstantial. On final review of the record in this case it was recommended that the verdict of guilty be set aside and the man discharged. The commanding officer, disapproving of this recommendation, has allowed the verdict to stand, and the man is now serving his sentence. This case, while not typical, illustrates the control which the military commander exercises over the administration of military justice."

Gen. Crowder in his endeavor to furnish me "authentic data" in this case says nothing about the court-martial first acquitting this soldier at his trial, and then subsequently, at the direction of the commanding officer who appointed the court, reversing itself and finding the soldier guilty and imposing a long term of imprisonment. He simply states "that the accused soldier's story was disbelieved, and he was found guilty." This statement is wholly inaccurate; I have read the record and he apparently has not.

The story told by the accused boy in this case was believed by the court which heard his testimony and that of the other witnesses—and mark this very important fact in these proceedings which is omitted from Gen. Crowder's statement of the case—that court did not find him guilty; it found him not guilty, and did "therefore acquit the accused." It was what happened after the court-martial had rendered a verdict of not guilty that aroused my particular objections to the handling of this case by the military authorities. There followed the exercise of an arbitrary personal individual control over the proceedings of the court the like of which can not be found in any other criminal tribunal in our jurisprudence. The camp commander, seated in his office away from the trial, without contact with the witnesses or the accused, disapproved the verdict of not guilty returned by the court and ordered the court to reconvene and reconsider. In his indorsement ordering reconsideration and practically conviction Brig. Gen. Burnham, the camp commander, stated that the facts raised a presumption which he declared to be very incriminatory.

The next criticism I made of the court-martial system, as the result of this case, was that the Judge Advocate General's office had no power to revise the finding made by a court and approved by a commanding officer, even though the record contained serious irregularities and insufficient evidence on which to base a conviction.

Gen. Crowder now states, in regard to the review of this case by his office: "On revision of the record no legal error could be found; this office reached the opinion that there was sufficient evidence to sustain the finding."

That is not an accurate statement of what the record in the case clearly shows. The Judge Advocate General's review, written by Maj. Millar, concluded with this emphatic statement: "After a careful consideration of the evidence, this office is firmly convinced of the absolute innocence of the accused." In the face of this declaration of the innocence of the accused Gen. Crowder's report says that his office reached the conclusion that "there was sufficient evidence to sustain the finding of guilty." This action may be negligent statement, but it looks like misrepresentation. This case throws an interesting light on the nature of the review which the Judge Advocate General's office makes of a record of this sort Despite the fact that the reviewing officer states that the evidence convinced the officer of the "absolute innocence" of the accused, the Judge Advocate General made no recommendation to the camp commander. Col. Mayes was then acting judge advocate. He but performed the function of his office as laid down by Gen. Crowder when he addressed the following note to the camp commander:

"At this stage of this case the matter of the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain a conviction is wholly within the discretion of the reviewing authority, the court having already passed thereon. However, since, in examining the case as to its legality, one of the assistants in this office has made a study of the sufficiency of the evidence, it is deemed to be in the sphere of propriety to say that this office entertains grave doubts whether the guilt of the accused is established by the evidence. This doubt seems to have been shared by the court in its first finding and acquittal. The guilt of the accused must, of course, be established beyond a reasonable doubt. In order that the reviewing authority may have the benefit of the study referred to, a copy thereof is inclosed herewith for such consideration as the court may deem advisable to give it."

It should be noted that the Acting Judge Advocate General himself refers to the result of his review, not as a decision, not as a recommendation, but as a "study," and in the subsequent papers filed in the record in this case there are many contemptuous references by the military authorities at the camp to this "study."

Continuing the statement of what happened in this case, Gen. Crowder's report says: "In such a situation no supreme court in the United States would interfere and set aside a jury's verdict." It is a fortunate fact that we are able to say for our civil jurisprudence at least that no supreme court ever gets a chance to pass upon a verdict of not guilty. Aside from this, however, I think it fair to say that no court would permit a finding of guilty to stand in the face of its conclusion from a review of the evidence that it was "firmly convinced of the absolute innocence of the accused."

It would seem difficult for anyone, in the brief statement of the facts of this case which is contained in Gen. Crowder's report, to make more misstatements of the important steps which were taken in the railroading of this soldier to the penitentiary than those which have already been outlined. But this is not all. That report says: "It (the verdict) was in fact reconsidered; but the court adhered to its finding." This can not be other than a deliberate misrepresentation. After the Acting Judge Advocate General had finished his "study" of the case it never went back to the court. That "study" was simply sent to the camp commander. The court which had tried and acquitted and then, under instructions from the commander, had convicted, never saw or considered this case or the record. What really happened was that the Acting Judge Advocate General's "study" went to the camp commander, who declined to be influenced by it and who eventually sustained and ordered executed the sentence which had been imposed. It is true, as Gen. Crowder's report states, that the judge advocate on the staff of the camp commander wrote a memorandum sustaining the conviction, but he was the same judge advocate who had recommended the trial, who had advised the camp commander to disapprove the verdict of not guilty, and of course the subordinate officer of the camp commander. Even in this review, however, the camp judge advocate refers to the fact that the court-martial was impressed "with the ring of sincerity" in the accused soldier's story when it voted for his acquittal, and he added that he himself had been similarly impressed when he first examined the accused.

As if determined to miss no opportunity for misrepresentation of the circumstances of this extraordinary case, Gen. Crowder's report proceeds to say that this judge advocate on the camp commander's staff who wrote this memorandum endeavoring to justify the conviction is a judge advocate "not commissioned in the Regular Army" but an "experienced lawyer fresh from civil practice." It is hard to believe that Gen. Crowder could have known the contents of this report when he attached his signature to it. The evident purpose of this description of this judge advocate was to indicate that he still retained the judicial views that characterize lawyers who have recently come from civil life. The facts are these: That judge advocate on the staff of the camp commander was commissioned in the Army from civil life in 1898. He served as a line officer from that time until 1916. Indeed, he was a typical line officer, a graduate of military schools at Leavenworth, where he was taught the military view that a camp commander absolutely controls his staff. Upon the opinion of this line officer, transferred to the staff as a camp judge advocate, Gen. Crowder relies for his statement that "the case is a good illustration of a feature in which the system of military justice sometimes does even more for the accused than a system of civil justice." Surely it may be admitted that in some cases military justice does more for the accused than does civil justice. It does it hard and a plenty.

But the most remarkable part of the effort made by Gen. Crowder's report to becloud and belittle the criticisms which I had made in this case and the conclusions which I had drawn from it lies in the fact that on the very day on which he signed that report he also signed a memorandum directed to The Adjutant General in which he recommended that the victim of this miscarriage of military justice should be released from the penitentiary and restored to his previous status in the Army. When I brought this case to the attention of the Senate this boy was in the penitentiary. He was there despite a court-martial's verdict acquitting him of the charge against him. He was there despite the Acting Judge Advocate General's emphatic declaration that he believed him absolutely innocent. He remained there until a few days ago, when as the result of my criticism the circumstances of his case were again reviewed, and as the result of this enforced review he has to-day been recommended by Gen. Crowder for restoration to his previous status. In his memorandum, which as I have said, he signed on the same day he signed the report in which he attempts to justify the sentence in this case, Gen. Crowder said: "This office is strongly of the opinion that an injustice may have been done to this man and that it should be righted as far as possible." Think of it. Arguing on the one hand, against my criticisms, that there was no injustice in this case and at the very moment entering this solemn declaration in another document that he believes injustice was done. It is a terrible indictment of so-called military justice that this man, whom everyone now seems to believe was the victim of rank injustice, served for nearly a year his penitentiary sentence. Such things happen in civil punishment, but not after a jury has acquitted the accused and not after a careful review has held the facts insufficient to sustain the verdict of guilty. These were the very features of this case which had impressed themselves on my mind and which seemed to me so forcibly to illustrate the defects and the dangers of our court-martial methods. At no point in the procedure in this case did the law intervene to assert its majesty for the protection of the accused. At no point was there a responsible law officer who had the power to break the purpose of the camp commander to send this boy to the penitentiary.

I have gone at length into the misstatements of Gen. Crowder concerning this case, so as to show conclusively how unworthy of acceptance his reply to me is. In regard to other cases cited by me, it is sufficient to state that the same false answers are made. If Gen. Crowder pursues his attack, I shall have more to say concerning these fabrications.

But there is one point in his reply which I must not overlook. He states with great emphasis that one of the virtues of the present court-martial system, as compared with the system of civil courts, is that it costs the accused nothing to be tried by these courts. Certainly this statement shows the utter incomprehension of the military mind to the spirit which prompts the present attack on the court-martial system—the blindness of that mind to all the considerations of humanity of administering real justice by which our soldiers shall be tried fairly and convicted according to their deserts. Certainly no mind which is not blind to the human side of military justice could in all seriousness make the statement that it costs the accused nothing to be convicted and sentenced to years of confinement in the military prison.

In making my original attack on the present court-martial system, I said that I did not regard the injustices done by courts-martial as directly chargeable to the Secretary of War, because I realized that he inherited the present system and did not himself create it. He came to the department heralded as a humanitarian, and I believed that if the facts of this system were made known to him he would without delay change the system. I have been much disappointed that he has permitted himself to be guided by the reactionary elements of the Army, and that he seems to be so completely under their domination that he can not acquaint himself with conditions as they really exist. Acting on their advice, he has placed himself in opposition to this most important and necessary reformation. But he has done more, judging by his reply to Congressman GOULD'S letter in reference to the demotion of Gen. Ansell. He is determined to demote Gen. Ansell by recalling Gen. Bethel, so that Gen. Anseli can not act as the Judge Advocate General during Gen. Crowder's absence in Cuba. The next step will be to reduce the rank of Gen. Ansell. No man who is not wholly impervious to the inhumanity of the court-martial system and to the opinion of the country could not only refuse to change the conditions but also punish the man who is responsible more than anyone else for the conditions being made known and for such steps as have been taken by the military authorities to change and correct them.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There is not a word or a sentence in that public statement that I desire to retrace or retract.

I have been charged with inconsistency in criticizing the court-martial system, because I opposed adopting the amendment suggested in 1918 by the War Department. The man who could have approved of such an amendment, Mr. President, with the knowledge I had of conditions in France and in America, would have been false to the interests of our soldiers at home and abroad. Notwithstanding the views of the Secretary of War and of Gen. Crowder, the purpose of that amendment was to deceive the American people and to confer upon the military authorities absolute and unconditional jurisdiction over the men composing the Army of the United States. Of course I did not stand for it; neither did the House stand for it; nor was it ever insisted upon again, because the people had come to understand just what it meant.

That did not end the controversy. No question is ever settled in law or in morals until it is settled right. This question has not been settled right, and the American people are not going to be satisfied until it is settled right.

The matter dragged along during the year 1918, and it is being considered and discussed in both branches of Congress still. It will continue to be discussed until it is finally and properly adjusted.

Now, I am going to call the attention of the Senate to the unusual methods adopted both by the Secretary of War and by the Judge Advocate General as well. It was determined by them that by fair means or by foul they were going to keep in force a system that was concededly unjust to the American soldier. I make that as a charge, and I think I can convict the gentlemen whose names I mention out of their own mouths and by the most convincing testimony that any man can offer, and that is the evidence of their own handwriting and over their own signatures.

Mr. President, I am going to call, as my first witness to sustain the charge that the War Department intended, by fair or by foul means, to maintain and sustain the system of military injustice, Mr. Baker himself. The Secretary of War addressed a letter to Gen. Crowder under date of March 1, 1919, couched in language that would indicate that the Secretary of War had not been in touch with the situation and did not know what was going on in the War Department when it had been under discussion for more than a year.

He starts out not by investigating but by prejudging the situation and by saying:

> I have been deeply concerned, as you know, over the harsh criticism recently uttered under our system of military justice. During the times of peace, prior to the war, I do not recall that our system of military law ever became the subject of public attack on the ground of its structural defects. Nor during the entire war period of 1917 and 1918, while the camps and cantonments were full of men and the strain of preparation was at its highest tension, do I remember noticing any complaints, either in the public press or in Congress or in the general mail arriving at this office.
> The recent outburst of criticism and complaint, voiced in public by a few individuals whose position entitled them to credit, and carried throughout the country by the press, has been to me a matter of surprise and sorrow. I have had most deeply at heart the interests of the Army and the welfare of the individual soldier, and I have the firmest determination that justice shall be done under military law.

How beautifully that is expressed! The whole letter is couched in tenderest language!

The criticisms referred to came from my humble self in the Senate, and from some Members of the House, and from the daily press. I have no apologies to make for those criticisms. I shall show that they compelled the reluctant War Department to loose the chains and tear off the manacles from the hands and feet of a splendid body of young men both in France and in America.

I ask that the letter may be printed in the RECORD without reading, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GERRY in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington March 1, 1919.

MY DEAR GEN. CROWDER: I have been deeply concerned, as you know, over the harsh criticisms recently uttered upon our system of military justice. During the times of peace, prior to the war, I do not recall that our system of military law ever became the subject of public attack on the ground of its structural defects. Nor during the entire war period of 1917 and 1918, while the camps and cantonments were full of men and the strain of preparation was at its highest tension, do I remember noticing any complaints either in the public press or in Congress or in the general mail arriving at this office. The recent outburst of criticism and complaint, voiced in public by a few individuals whose position entitled them to credit and carried throughout the country by the press, has been to me a matter of surprise and sorrow. I have had most deeply at heart the interests of the Army and the welfare of the individual soldier, and I have the firmest determination that justice shall be done under military law.

I have not been made to believe by the perusal of these complaints that justice is not done to-day under the military law, or has not been done during the war period. And my own acquaintance with the course of military justice (gathered, as it is, from the large number of cases which in the regular routine come to me for final action) convinces me that the conditions implied by these recent complaints do not exist and had not existed. My own personal knowledge of yourself and many of the officers in your department and in the field corroborates that conviction and makes me absolutely confident that the public apprehensions which have been created are groundless. I wish to convey to you here the assurance of my entire faith that the system of military justice, both in its structure as organized by the statutes of Congress and the President's regulations, and in its operation as administered during the war, is essentially sound.

But it is not enough for me to possess this faith and this conviction. It is highly important that the public mind should receive ample reassurance on the subject. And such reassurance has become necessary, because all that the public has thus far received is the highly colored press reports of certain extreme statements, and the congressional speeches placing on record certain supposed instances of harsh and illegal treatment. The War Department and its representatives have not been in a position to make any public defense or explanation and have refrained from doing so. The opportunity recently afforded the members of your staff to appear before the Senate Committee on Military Affairs has been an ample one, and it has furnished, I hope, entire satisfaction to the members of that committee. But of the proceedings of that committee I perceived no general public notice; the testimony, when published, will be somewhat voluminous, and its publication will not take place for some time yet, and it will certainly not reach the thousands of intelligent men and women who read the original accounts. And yet it is essential that the families of all those young men who had a place in our magnificent Army should be reassured. They must not be left to believe that their men were subjected to a system that did not fully deserve the terms law and justice. And this need of reassurance on the part of the people at large is equally felt, I am sure, by the Members of Congress in both Houses, who have, of course, not yet become acquainted with the proceedings before the Senate committee. It is both right and necessary that the facts should be furnished. It is indeed a simple question of furnishing the facts; for when they are furnished I am positive that they will contain the most ample reassurance.

Those facts are virtually all in your possession, on record in your office. I am aware that they are voluminous, and that a complete explanation and answer to every specific complaint is impracticable. But I believe that you are in a position to make a concise survey of the entire field and to furnish the main facts in a form which will permit ready perusal by the intelligent men and women who are so deeply interested in this subject.

I have been asked by a Member of the House of Representatives to furnish him with such a statement. And I am now calling upon you to supply it to me at your early convenience.

Faithfully, yours,

(Signed) NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

To Maj. Gen. E. H. CROWDER,
Judge Advocate General,
War Department, Washington, D. C.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Note this language in the body of the letter:

> I wish to convey to you here the assurance of my entire faith that the system of military justice, both in its structure as organized by the statutes of Congress and the President's regulations and in its operation as administered during the war, is essentially sound.
> But it is not enough for me to possess this faith and this conviction. It is highly important that the public mind should receive ample reassurance on the subject. And such reassurance has become necessary, because all that the public has thus far received is the highly colored press reports of certain extreme statements and the congressional speeches placing on record certain supposed instances of harsh and illegal treatment. The War Department and its representatives have not been in a position to make any public defense or explanation, and have refrained from doing so.

How innocently does the Secretary get around the situation! And no opportunity to make any public defense in explanation! And yet every once in a while and as often as they expressed a desire to come before any committee of the House or Senate they had an opportunity to do so.

On the 8th day of March, 1919, Gen. Crowder answered the letter of the Secretary of War. In that letter he undertook again to criticize those who complained of the system and to insist again that everything was lovely in his department and even and exact justice done to all. I ask that that letter be printed in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL,
Washington, March 8, 1919.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I was very glad to receive your letter of March 1, calling upon me for a brief statement of the facts concerning the organization for and the practice of the administration of military justice during the war. I agree heartily with you that there has been no opportunity for our people to hear through the press more than reports of fragmentary and inflamed criticisms based on sensationalized allegations, and that they are entitled to a statement of the case as it is recorded in and viewed by the department.

The circumstances that have most amazed me in my following of the press reports are that the public interest has been carried and sustained by a supposed controversy between myself and an officer of my department, Gen. Ansell, and yet that the exceedingly small margin of actual controversy is entirely lost to sight in a murk of supposed instances of harsh or unjust treatment of soldiers which bears little or no relation to Gen. Ansell's lack of concurrence with the views of the War Department. I think, therefore, that a clear statement of the organic basis of that difference of opinion will go far to clear the atmosphere and leave us in a position to discuss separately the allegations of harshness or injustice.

Gen. Ansell contends that there is a fault in the organic structure of the court-martial system in the fact that after a man has been tried by court-martial and the record of trial has been reviewed by the authority that appointed the court (usually a military officer of high rank) and by him finally approved and carried into execution there is no further appellate body or officer who can review the appointing officer's review and modify, affirm, or reverse his action.

With this I agree, and there is no controversy about it. I submitted and you approved in January, 1918, a draft of legislation vesting such a further appellate or reviewing power in the President. The draft was introduced, and died in the Senate Military Committee, which no doubt considered it of less actual importance than other pressing business of the war. If this were the only alleged difference of opinion within the department, therefore, it vanishes with this simple statement, and it is difficult to perceive a cause for unusual interest.

The storm centers, however, about three briefs—two from Gen. Ansell and one from myself—to you. Strange to say, these briefs were not addressed primarily to the desirability of such a power of review. That is conceded. They were addressed solely to the question of whether that power had not actually been granted by section 1199, Revised Statutes—a law that had been on the statute books for 55 years, with but a single attempt to deduce from it the grant of so broad a power in any officer of the Government. That single attempt was made in a desperate effort to obtain the release of a convicted soldier by habeas corpus. The precise question on which Gen. Ansell and I do not agree was carried into a circuit court of the United States and there decided once for all in a manner binding on all administrative officers sworn to execute the law as they find it. I shall not prolong this statement by discussion of that question. That any administrative officer would be justified in finding in the unequivocal language of a statute so old, against the reasoned judgment of a Federal court and the administrative practice of 55 years, a hidden meaning revolutionizing the entire system of military justice is simply preposterous. Gen. Ansell's argument was an eager, earnest plea for a forbidden short cut based on expediency rather than on reason. With the desirability of such an appellate power in the President you agreed, and forthwith requested it of Congress, which alone could grant it. Countenance of a plan to play ducks and drakes with a statute of the United States you refused. The briefs are in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD or in the reports of committee hearings, and they may confidently be left to the reading of any fair-minded man—lawyer or layman. That thread of the story is at an end.

But if the controversy is not over the advisability of such an appellate power and not in a substantial sense in the famous briefs, where is it? It lies in this: First, that Gen. Ansell believes that the power, when granted, should be vested in the Judge Advocate General, and that a complete judicial system with faithful analogies to the organization and procedure of civil courts should be substituted for the present simple and direct system of Army discipline, while the department believes that the power should be vested in the President; that with such a grant of power the faults of the existing system will be completely removed with the exercise of those powers and with the improvements that have been instituted in the last two years.

These are the real issues and the only ones.

The case is one of technical ramifications, and I am sorry that limitations of space will not carry to the American people the wealth of fact and argument to be found in the files of the department. Each of the points of controversy must be discussed briefly and without avoidable technicality.

What is proposed is to carry the principles of the civil code and civil court principles of procedure into our military system. Appeal is made to the Anglo-Saxon conviction of the net desirability for the guarded procedure, the technicalities of indictment and pleading, and the stays, delays, and rights of appeal, which characterize our criminal courts. The real effect of such a change has not been examined, but it is, in fact, a divorcement of the power to control discipline from the power to command armies. Indeed, an analogy has been suggested between an army and a government, and it is urged that our governmental distinction and separation between the executive and judicial system must be carried into the Army, and that no commanding officer should be permitted to appeal to the disciplinary measure of trial by court-martial without the concurrence of his law officer or judge advocate, who should be, and usually is, a man learned in the technicalities of civil practice. Thus, if a division commander intrusted with a major part of the Argonne offensive had contumaciously declined to carry out his part of the general plan, he could not be brought to trial by Gen. Pershing unless the judge advocate of the American Expeditionary Forces concurred.

Our civil code is good. It protects our most sacred liberties, but gentlemen who contend that it should be substituted for our military code—which is also good—forget that the purposes of the two systems are diametrically opposed. The civil code is designed to encourage, permit, and protect the very widest limit of individual action consistent with the minimum necessities of organized government. The military code, and especially our military code, is designed to operate on men hurriedly drawn from the liberal operation of the civil code, and to concentrate their strength, their thought, their individual action, on one common purpose—the purpose of victory.

The common purpose is the plan of action. The plan of action can not be, as we have heard it is in the Bolshevik army, the debated sense of the Army. The plan of action is and must be the plan of the commander. Therefore individual liberty of action inconsistent with that common purpose must be restricted. The military code is designed to accomplish that purpose.

The truth is—and our people have lately seen it demonstrated in a thousand ways—that peace and war both demand sacrifices of individual liberty to a common purpose, but such sacrifices in war are infinitely greater in number and degree than they are in peace. The soldier, from the day he dons his uniform, must be prepared to sacrifice much of his old freedom of action, and, indeed, he swears to do so in his oath to obey the orders of his commander.

What is the essence of all this? It is that for the purposes of peace we demand an intricate legal system, even at the cost of technicalities, delays, and abstruse rules of law; we demand the admirable system of checks and balances that is illustrated by the divorce of our executive from our judicial system. We intrust ourselves to these devices rather than to the fairness and justice in the hearts of men. The very nature of war is such that men forget the sordid views that made those checks and balances necessary. They give the Nation, willingly and eagerly, their fortunes and their lives, and in such a time of patriotic exaltation we willingly give over, and the peril is such that we must give over, this adherence to artificial safeguard of complex rules and trust our individual rights more and more to the principles of humanity, honor, and justice in the breasts of our fellow citizens who are offering their lives and fortunes, as we are offering ours, to the perpetuation of our institutions and for the common good. On this theory the soldier is remitted to the simple and direct procedure for the enforcement of discipline in the Army. His court has its inception in the old courts of chivalry and honor and the essential principle remains. His conduct is taken before his comrades who determine whether it is the conduct of a soldier or no.

In this lies the difference between the systems for civil and military justice. The War Department naturally adheres to the latter system. It repels the thought of an army in the field with two commanders—one in charge of its discipline and one in charge of its strategical and tactical maneuver. The picture is, to the student of war or to the man with the slightest familiarity with things military, nothing less than ridiculous.

I should be willing to rest with this statement were it not that it has been said that without such a radical change as is proposed, we have witnessed atrocities of injustice, and that they are traceable to faults in the existing system of military justice. I have said that there is one such fault. That fault is imposed by a statute of the United States. I presented it to Congress for correction and it was not corrected. The fault lies not in the lack of a civil judicial system, but in the lack of a power to reverse, modify, or affirm the action of a military commander on the findings and sentence of a court-martial. I think we have disposed of the contention that the power should lie in the Judge Advocate General. It should lie in the President.

But what actual harm has resulted from this fault? I have covered the facts in my letter to you of February 13. I can not repeat them here. It is only the executed portion of a sentence that the present power of the President does not reach. In order that such power as he now has may reach every case of injustice, excessive sentence, and illegality appearing in a trial by general court-martial, a mechanism has been created in the office of the Judge Advocate General that gives, I venture to say, a scrutiny more far-reaching and exacting than is possible under any civil system under the sun. I shall not repeat its description or its record as shown in my letter to you of February 13, but I shall content myself with an assertion that I stand upon its record and that its record is complete and open to the public.

That mechanism added to the power of final review in the President asked for over a year ago will make the system such that I am willing to stand or fall by it.

So much for the controversy that has been magnified in the press and on the floor of Congress. This statement would not be complete, however, without reference to the allegations that have shocked the Nation and in respect of which the Nation is entitled, most of all, to assurance. It is asserted and attempted to be established by example that the sentences of courts-martial during the war have been atrociously severe.

Let me say, first of all, that the criticism that they are severe is not a criticism of the system of military justice, it is not a criticism of my administration of that system. It is a criticism of the officers who imposed, for instance, sentences of death for sentinels convicted of sleeping on post, for soldiers willfully and contumaciously refusing to obey the direct orders of their commanding officers, and for desertion in time of war, and it is a criticism of the Congress which authorized a death penalty, in plain statutory terms to be assessed on convictions for these offenses. I do not mean to say that if criticism in the connection is due I am immune. I am not. I agree with the statute and shall defend it, but I am not responsible for it.

Considering the charges from the standpoint of the officers who assessed the sentences, let us see who they are. Are they military zealots—men ground in an iron and heartless system until the liberal views of civil practice are ironed out of their souls? They are not. They are men taken in a general dragnet through the Nation so lately that the civilian clothes they left behind them are not yet out of style. They come from every walk of life. There are 200,000 of them. They comprise a faithful cross section of our whole people and our national life.

What is this charge of severity by them? We have seen that it can not be an indictment of the system. It is simply a difference between the opinions of well-meaning and humane critics far removed from the scene of the offenses punished and with only a partisan, inadequate, and highly colored statement of that case to guide them, and the opinions of men who considered the facts under the solemn obligations of an oath to be honest, impartial, and fair, who lived in the environment of the offense and were steeped in the reasons making it grave, and who assessed the sentence in the performance of the highest civic duty of man—the defense of home and country.

These men can not merit the indictment and diatribe that has been heaped upon their action. As Burke has said, you can indict a few individuals but you can not indict a nation. These men are a portion of the Nation—the portion that has been dedicated to death, if need be, to save the Nation from destruction. Their expression, and not that of men 3,000 miles from the field of action, is certainly the voice of the Nation on the punishments that should be meted out to men who imperil its honor and its safety.

Why should the offenses by a soldier of sleeping on a post of the guard, desertion, disobedience of orders, be punishable by death? Because cities and fortifications and armies have been lost through the drowsiness of sentinels; because armies have been disintegrated and nations humbled by desertion; because battles have been lost and peoples sold into captivity by the disobedience of soldiers.

I can not enter this discussion further. To us at home, in comfort and in present peace, it is next to impossible to reconcile the almost unanimous view of soldiers in the field or theater of war on the gravity of these and many other lesser offenses by their comrades. Therefore the execution of not one sentence of death for these things has been approved by me, and not one such sentence has been executed. Also, as I showed you in my letter of February 13, heavy sentences have been reduced comprehensively and uniformly. But even with that said, I can neither condemn the 100,000 officers who assessed the sentences, nor the law of Congress nor the system under that law that made them possible.

There, Mr. Secretary, are the main issues of principle. I shall discuss at this place neither individual cases nor minor principles that have been put in issue. They all come back to the essential bases that are here stated. I am willing at the proper time to take up either subject or any variation under either. I can defend them all to the satisfaction of any fair-minded citizen.

Hostile critics will undoubtedly assert that the observations I have submitted commit me to a support of excessive sentences, which, of course, is not true. I only speak the probable viewpoint of the officers who have assessed these sentences. But it may be said with entire accuracy that on the day the armistice was signed, November 11, 1918, no person was serving the sentence of a general court-martial who had on that date entered upon the execution of the excessive portion of his sentence. As you are aware, shortly after my resumption of full charge of the office of the Judge Advocate General I recommended the convening of a board of clemency to undertake with the greatest expedition the adjustment of war-time punishments to peace-time standards, and that an admonition was issued, upon my recommendation, to courts-martial and reviewing authorities, both at home and abroad, to conform, unless special reasons influenced them to a contrary course, to the limits of punishment observed in time of peace.

I come now, with the utmost reluctance, to a few distasteful paragraphs of personal vindication. My motives and my actions have been attacked, and I have been advertised as having hampered the efforts of Gen. Ansell. I have been set off against him as reactionary.

It has been said that the present military code is archaic. I merely say that I began what proved a tedious and heart-breaking task of years to obtain a complete revision of the old military code early in my service, personally conducted that task beginning with my appointment as Judge Advocate General, and at the end of four annual disappointments obtained its complete revision in 1916.

During much of this time Gen. Ansell was one of the most promising and trusted officers in my office. During all the time that the code was in revision he never suggested to me, nor, so far as I can learn, to anyone else, any of the changes he is suggesting now. He participated in preparing the manual for courts-martial which was based upon the new code, but he advanced none of these new views.

Indeed, the first time that I was advised of such a view was in November, 1917, on the occasion of his presenting to you—not through me and entirely without consulting me—the first of the elaborate briefs about which so much has been made.

It has been charged that, as a result of that brief an order designating him as Acting Judge Advocate General was revoked, and further that he was relieved from his duties of supervising the administration of military justice. Nothing could be farther from the truth. He was never relieved from his duties supervising the administration of military justice except to take a trip to France, which he was eager to do, and this was considerably after the submission of the brief, and after the revocation of the order appointing him Acting Judge Advocate General and relieving me of my functions. That order was killed before I knew anything about the brief. It had never been published. It had been obtained by him from the Chief of Staff without consulting you and without your knowledge, and it was revoked by you because it was contrary to your wishes.

Gen. Ansell asked me in a formal written memorandum to help him secure an order appointing him Acting Judge Advocate General in charge of my functions. I did not wish to be relieved, but did not wish to embarrass you. I therefore replied in writing that he could take the matter up directly with the Secretary of War in his own way. He did not take the matter up with the Secretary of War at all. He took it up with the Acting Chief of Staff, with the remark that I concurred. Upon this showing the Chief of Staff marked the draft of an order that Gen. Ansell had prepared for suspended publication. By accident I learned of this order. This was before I had any intimation from any source of the preparation of the first brief, or any intimation that Gen. Ansell had reached a conclusion as to the desirability of an appellate power in the Judge Advocate General. I called your attention to the circumstance, and you directed that the order be not published.

While it is true that Gen. Ansell's attempt to secure an order giving him my functions as Judge Advocate General was concurrent with his preparation of a brief urging a revolution in the military system and his circulation of a document of such grave consequence among every officer in my office without giving me the slightest information of his efforts, it is not true that I knew of the brief until after you directed the rescinding of the unpublished order appointing him Acting Judge Advocate General. But I deem it unnecessary to enter this field of accusation further and discuss the many issues of fact which have been raised, as I am informed that the Inspector General of the Army has been designated to conduct a thorough investigation and make all the ascertainments of fact that are necessary to elucidate the administration of military justice during the war period.

(Signed) E. H. CROWDER,
Judge Advocate General.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Notwithstanding the statement of the Secretary of War that they had no opportunity to come before the public with their views, while impulsive and uninformed Congressmen were indulging in criticisms which were not just, that letter of Mr. Baker to the Judge Advocate General and the letter of the Judge Advocate General to Mr. Baker were released on the 10th day of March, 1919, and printed in full in all the newspapers of the country. I have no objection to that, Mr. President. I do not consider it lese majesty to criticize either Gen. Crowder or Mr. Baker, and they have the same right to criticize their critics. It is the right of every American citizen to criticize the acts of a public servant, even if he wears a uniform.

The remarkable thing about this letter was this: Immediately upon its publication, and on the 11th day of March, 1919, Gen. Ansell, who was largely responsible for calling attention of the right of these soldiers to a fair and just trial, addressed a letter to the Secretary of War giving his views of the law and his version of the controversy and asking that it might be given the same publicity that Gen. Crowder's letter was given.

Now, Mr. President, if the Secretary of War had intended to be fair, he would have given it the same publicity as he did the Crowder letter, because as a great public servant administering the War Department he ought to have been interested only in getting the truth before the American people. Now, it happened that the Secretary of War, with his Chief of Staff, was visiting the cantonments throughout the country, a very laudable thing to do. I wish he might have visited the prisons here and in France; maybe he did; I hope that he did, but I have not heard of it if he did. I immediately indited a letter to the Secretary of War and asked that I might be furnished with a copy of Gen. Ansell's letter. The Assistant Secretary of War, Mr. Crowell, courteous at all times, sent me a copy of the Gen. Ansell letter, but stated he was not at liberty to publish it or to act on Gen. Ansell's request that it be given the same publicity as Gen. Crowder's letter. It was a complete answer, it seemed to me, to the letter of the Secretary of War and of the Judge Advocate General.

Then, in the hope that the Secretary of War might be induced to let this go to the public, so that the public might have an opportunity to hear both sides of the controversy, I wired to him on March 16 making the same request at San Francisco, Calif. Mr. President, Gen. Ansell's request was refused, my telegram to the Secretary of War was refused, and here is what he said in his answer to my telegram:

> Your telegram received. More than a year ago I asked of the Military Committees, both Senate and House, legislation to correct the evils in present court-martial system. I shall renew request when Congress reassembles. There would seem to be, therefore, no controversy on the merits of the subject. Have not seen letter in question and can not imagine any reason why my consideration of it on my return will not be time enough.

In the meantime the Judge Advocate General had revised and much amplified his letter, and the Secretary of War was giving the greatest publicity to the Judge Advocate General's letter and his own view of the matter, and prejudicing the minds of the American people by stories in the press and by circular letters prepared by a coterie of officers of Gen. Crowder's selection, headed by a civilian lawyer in uniform at work at the Government expense, sending out over the country hundreds of thousands of these so-called Crowder and Baker defenses of the court-martial system. The Government was footing the bills for the work and for sending the matter through the mails in envelopes, in part at least, bearing the frank of a bureau which had gone out of existence with the ending of the war. I have no idea how much it cost the Government of the United States.

But we find the Secretary claiming that the military authorities had no way to get to the public, while he was expending public money maintaining a bureau in the War Department giving the people one side of this very much controverted question and paying no attention to the other side which had been submitted to him with equal force as had the side of Gen. Crowder.

His reason for not giving any other than one side of the controversy is the proposed amendment of January, 1918, which the Military Affairs Committees of the House and Senate declined to report out or to ask Congress to pass. He could see no reason, therefore, in view of the fact that over a year ago he had sent his famous amendment to Congress, why this letter of Gen. Ansell's should receive any consideration at his hands.

On the 19th day of March, 1919, after I got that telegram from Mr. Baker, I wrote him a letter, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

MARCH 19, 1919.

HON. NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

SIR: On the 16th instant I addressed you a telegram in which I asked that you give to the public a statement made by Lieut. Col. (formerly Gen.) Samuel T. Ansell, in reply to statements made by you yourself and by Gen. Crowder, the Judge Advocate General of the Army, in which you both gave warm support and approval to the present court-martial system, and in which Gen. Crowder besides indulged in severe personal criticism and accusation against Gen. Ansell, who in testimony recently given before the Senate Committee on Military Affairs had condemned the existing system of military justice and the administration under it. I asked you to make the statement public, primarily because it was a clarifying contribution to the subject now agitating the people, to which the people are entitled, and, secondarily, because it was only fair and just to this officer that you should do so. I believed that you would make this statement public, and do so immediately, in order that the people might have the opportunity of considering it as nearly contemporaneously as possible with the opposing views publicly expressed by you and the Judge Advocate General. In that I am disappointed.

I have just received from you the following telegram:

"Your telegram received. More than a year ago I asked of the Military Committees of both the Senate and House legislation to correct the evils in the present court-martial system. I shall renew the request when Congress reassembles. There would seem to be, therefore, no controversy on the merits of the subject. Have not yet seen the letter in question, and can not imagine any reason why my consideration of it on my return will not be time enough.

"(Signed) NEWTON D. BAKER,
"Secretary of War."

It is painful to me, Mr. Secretary, to find you fencing upon a question which means so much to the tens of thousands of enlisted men who have suffered injustice under the present system, a question which means so much to you, the Army, the Nation. In the instant telegram you say that more than a year ago you recognized the evils of the present court-martial system and requested legislation to correct them, and that inasmuch as you intend to renew that request, there can be no controversy on the merits of the subject.

Your present recognition of existing evils of the court-martial system is strangely irreconcilable with your published statement no more remote than March 10. In that statement of warm approval of the existing system, you seemed blind to any deficiency. You say therein:

"I have not been made to believe by a perusal of these complaints that justice is not done to-day under the present law, or has not been done during the war period, and my acquaintance with the course of military justice—gathered as it is from the large number of cases which in the regular routine come to me for final action—convinces me that the conditions implied by these recent complaints do not exist and had not existed."

You further say that you are "absolutely confident that the public apprehensions which have been created are groundless." And then you put the capstone upon your monumental confidence in the system by further saying:

"I wish to convey to you here the assurance of my entire faith that the system of military justice, both in its structure as organized by the statutes of Congress and the President's regulations and in its operation as administered during the war, is essentially sound."

And finally you call upon the Judge Advocate General to make a statement for the purpose of reassuring the people who "must not be left to believe that their men were subjected to a system that did not fully deserve the terms of law and justice"; and then you conclude, rather lightly, that after all it is but "a simple question of furnishing the facts, for when they are furnished I am positive that they will contain the most ample reassurances." On March 10 you were blind to any deficiencies in the existing system, as, indeed, the evidence abundantly shows you have been deaf throughout the war to complaints about the injustice of this system, complaints which should at least have challenged your earnest attention rather than provoked your undisguised irritation.

But, as you say, you did propose certain legislation to the committees which they did not see fit to recommend for enactment and which, very fortunately, did not become law. I can hardly believe that that bill, prepared by the Judge Advocate General of the Army and submitted by you, was a bona fide effort to reform the existing system, and the slightest consideration of the bill will show that had it been enacted into law it would have made the system even more reactionary, if possible, than it is now. I can hardly believe that this was a bona fide effort at reform, because you already had had an opportunity to establish in your department a legitimate and necessary revisory power over and supervision of courts-martial procedure. Gen. Ansell was at that time Acting Judge Advocate General of the Army, and his opinions were entitled to be respected as such, and in all other matters they were so respected.

In order to keep courts-martial procedure within just and legal limitations he wrote an office opinion, in which he clearly demonstrated that this power of supervision was to be found in existing law, and in that opinion all the officers of the department, among whom were many most distinguished lawyers from civil life, concurred. And yet, in order that that opinion might be overruled and that you might rely upon the theory that you were entirely without power, you either ordered or permitted Gen. Crowder himself, who was not at that time connected with the office, to return thereto and write for you an overruling opinion, which you approved, and in doing so voluntarily denied that it was your right and duty under existing law to supervise the system. You approved the opinion of the Judge Advocate General, which was to the effect that this supervisory power did not exist, and, furthermore, ought not to exist, inasmuch as the law military is the kind of law that should be left to be executed at the will of the camp commander. If you had really desired to establish a legitimate legal supervision of courts-martial you could have done so simply by approving the opinion of the Acting Judge Advocate General, which was not a personal opinion, but was an office opinion, which in ordinary course of administration would have been adopted. Advised to do the proper thing by your chief law officer and having been shown by him the way to do it, you declined to do so upon some slight legal technicality. This is evidence to me that you did not desire to do so.

You supplanted the officer who had seen fit to call to your attention at the beginning of the war the necessity of keeping the strictest supervision over courts-martial procedure, by an officer who contended that such supervision was not necessary, and that such supervision would derogate from the power of the commanding officer and destroy discipline. You elbowed aside the one officer who even then had the courage to condemn the system and the prevision to point out its terrible results, Gen. Ansell, and took into the bosom of your confidence a trio of men who are pronounced reactionaries—Gen. Crowder, the then Acting Chief of Staff, and the Inspector General—the last named of whom is even this day engaged, by your order, in a so-called "investigation" designed, in my judgment, to destroy the man who exposed the injustice of the present system. You accepted those views. But, in order that any future responsibility might be shifted from your shoulders to Congress, you presented a bill which, even if you did not, your advisers did, know could not be passed. Your advisers did not wish any modification of the existing system. They and you declined to accept the views of the Acting Judge Advocate General that would have gone far toward alleviating the situation on the ground that those views were not fully justified by the letter of the statute. You were thus solicitous that your power be found in the letter of the statute. And yet in the very bill proposed you asked for the power of suspension of sentences, when you were already suspending sentences by administrative order without one word of legal authority therefor.

There is another evidentiary circumstance that indicates the effort was not made in good faith, but was simply designed to allay public apprehension and inquiry by the appearance of doing something. It is shown by the records of your department that the Judge Advocate General of the Army, in correspondence with the senior officer of his department in France shortly thereafter, said, with respect to an administrative makeshift which he had proposed for adoption, and which you did adopt, that it was necessary to do something to head off a threatened congressional investigation, to silence criticism, to prevent talk about the establishment of courts of appeal, and to make it appear to the soldier that he did get some kind of revision of his proceedings other than the revision at field headquarters. How can it be said that such an attitude of mind is consistent with an honest desire to alleviate the situation? It is significant also that your interest upon this subject was not such as to produce that active participation of the department which characerizes its efforts when it desires to secure legislation.

The bill to which you refer and the nonenactment of which you plead as shifting the responsibility for the maladministration of military justice from you to Congress, if honestly submitted, is conclusive evidence that you yourself are entirely reactionary or that you have been imposed upon and deceived by advisers who are. That bill is Senate 3692, and provides, so far as immediately pertinent to this discussion, that section 1199, Revised Statutes, be amended to read as follows:

"The Judge Advocate General shall receive, revise, and cause to be recorded the proceedings of all courts-martial, courts of inquiry, and military commissions, and report thereon to the President, who shall have power to disapprove, vacate, or set aside any finding, in whole or in part, to modify, vacate, or set aside any sentence, in whole or in part, and to direct the execution of such part only of any sentence as has not been vacated or set aside."

Do you really know, Mr. Secretary, the purpose and legal effect of that bill? In the first place, it would have to be construed together with that statute which makes the Chief of Staff the trusted military adviser of the President and Secretary of War, whose authority he habitually exercises, on the one hand, and places him in supervision and control of all bureau officers, including the Judge Advocate General of the Army, upon the other hand. The President's power, therefore, as a matter of law, over the control of courts-martial cases would under that bill be habitually exercised by the Chief of Staff, an ultramilitary official, without the slightest competency to pass upon those errors of law which prejudice the rights of the accused and thereby render it necessary to modify the judgment and with a disposition to disregard such rights. And also, the Chief of Staff, and not the President, would be the one to exercise this power, in fact. There were some 350,000 courts-martial from the time we raised the new Army until July 1 last. Nobody would expect the President to review such a number or any appreciable part of them. Nobody, indeed, could expect the Chief of Staff himself to do so. The work would have to be intrusted to some military minion, inexperienced in law and the administration of justice, and whose training had disqualified him for such functions.

The Judge Advocate General, when he appeared representing you before the Military Committee, admitted that this would be the course of administration and contended that the Chief of Staff ought to have that power. He said that that was necessary in order to maintain discipline.

But worse than this, that bill would authorize the Chief of Staff to disapprove, vacate, and set aside a finding of "not guilty" and substitute upon his review of the evidence a finding of his own. Notice the language is that he shall have the power to disapprove, vacate, or set aside "any finding" and also to modify, vacate, or set aside "any sentence." This is a power which ought not to be granted to any man, and I feel safe in saying will never be granted by Congress. This alone was sufficient not only to condemn the bill in the mind of Congress, but to show the attitude of those who proposed it. Do you believe, Mr. Secretary, that the President of the United States, the Secretary of War, the Chief of Staff, or any other official, should have the power to set aside an acquittal and substitute for it a conviction, or to set aside one sentence and substitute for it a harsher one, or to set aside a finding of guilty of a greater one? That is what the bill which you proposed authorizes.

But the bill further provides "that the President may return any record through the reviewing authority to the court for consideration and correction." This power is on a par with and supplemental to the absolute power which I have just referred to. If the Chief of Staff were not satisfied with a finding of "not guilty," he could return the record to the court-martial with instructions to make a finding of guilty. If not satisfied with a light sentence he could instruct the court to award a heavier one. If not satisfied with a finding of guilty of a minor offense, he could instruct the court to find the accused guilty of a more serious one. Do you believe that the President, the Secretary of War, or the Chief of Staff, or any other official, should have such power? If you stand for that bill you evidently do.

The Judge Advocate General, who appeared before the committee in representation of your views, testified:

"I want the President authorized to return the record which we get here, back through the convening authority to the trial court, and ask a reconsideration of their action, so that he may proceed, if he desires, upon the revised findings of the court, and thus make the court participate with him in the final judgment."

When asked the question whether a commanding general could disapprove a finding of not guilty and send it back, he said:

"Yes; when in his opinion the finding is not sustained by the evidence"; and he argued that that power was necessary to the maintenance of discipline, was now possessed by all commanding officers, and ought to be possessed by the President and Chief of Staff. In further argument sustaining that view he said with respect to cases in which very small sentences had been awarded:

"I do not know anything that could attack discipline more if the commanding general, who is also the reviewing authority, or the Secretary of War, or the President, who will become the reviewing authority of that class of cases under this legislation, could not invite the attention of the court to the effect of such a sentence upon the discipline of the Army generally. I do not think this power would have survived throughout the centuries if it were intrinsically wrong."

Obviously he was unaware that this is one of the few countries in which such a barbaric practice has survived. These views you doubtless approved, inasmuch as in your letter to the committee you invited it to hear the views of the Judge Advocate General in explanation and support of the proposed legislation.

For the moment, at least, you now conceive that there should be a power of revision. That, to use your language, is "structural," "organic." The lack of a proper revisory power is a lack of legal control at the top. There are many other deficiencies of the same character. There is an absolute lack of legal control at the bottom and throughout the proceedings. You have said that the cases that come to you in regular routine convince you that the complaints against the system are groundless. Unfortunately, Mr. Secretary, you are not in touch, and apparently do not desire to get in touch, with the administration of military justice. You must know that under the existing system the Secretary of War sees and takes action only upon that relatively insignificant number of cases which are required under existing law to go to the President for confirmation. He sees none others. These few cases consist in the far greater part of a few sentences of dismissal of commissioned officers. These are not the class of cases in which appears the injustice of which I have complained. The courts-martial system is such, and the regard for rank in the Army is such, that a commissioned officer appears before a court-martial to far better advantage than does a private soldier. You do not see the system in operation. You do not see its tragic results. When you denied the department the revisory power over all courts-martial cases you denied yourself the opportunity to keep in touch with the administration of justice throughout the Army. Your knowledge is obtained from this insignificant number of cases of commissioned officers and from those persons surrounding you who are interested in supporting the existing reactionary system.

The existing system does injustice—gross, terrible, spirit-crushing injustice. Evidence of it is on every hand. The records of the Judge Advocate General's Department reek with it, and upon proper occasion

I shall show the people that this is true. The organization of the Clemency Board, now sitting daily and grinding out thousands of cases, is a confession of it. Clemency, however, can never correct the injustice done.

You have, of course, adopted the statement of the Judge Advocate General, which you invited and published. That statement is involved in as inextricable confusion and patent inconsistencies as your own pronunciamentos upon this subject. In one and the same breath it declares the system unusually excellent, and then blames Congress because it has failed to enact the bill which you proposed and has heretofore been referred to; it declares that military law can best be administered finally in the field, but at the same time argues that the system would be much improved by the establishment of a departmental appellate power; it contends that courts-martial should be subject, not to legal control, but only to the power of military command, and at the same time objects to assuming responsibility for the outrageously excessive sentences awarded when courts and commanding officers go wrong, without legal restraint. It admits that our soldiery must be hurriedly drawn from civilian life and from the operations of the more liberal civil code, but assumes that for that very reason the military law ought to be more harshly applied in order to obtain discipline. It argues that courts-martial are not courts of justice, but "courts of chivalry and honor," and concludes that since the soldier must on occasion yield up his life on the battle field, he should not be heard to complain if it be taken away by these courts of chivalry; it places courts-martial in high esteem, though admitting that they apply not the modern rules of right, but medieval principles that govern over lord and armed retainer. It says that the officers who sit in judgment upon the private soldier can not be military zealots, because it was only yesterday that they got out of their civilian clothes, but in the next paragraph asserts that they are most competent to award military punishments because of their military appreciations. It argues that the primary purpose of a court-martial is to maintain discipline, as though discipline in any real sense could be maintained in our Army without doing justice.

I beg to assure you that there is controversy on the merits of the subject. There is great difference between you and me. That would be relatively unimportant. But there is great difference between you and Congress, and there is great difference between you and the American people. I do not believe that a court-martial should be controlled from beginning to end by the fiat of military command. I do not believe that a commanding officer should order the trial of an enlisted man on a charge that is legally insufficient. I do not believe that he should order a court to overrule pleas made in behalf of an accused which upon established principles of law would bar the trial. I do not believe that the court and the commanding officer can cast established rules of evidence to the winds and insist upon the conviction of a man upon evidence that no court for a moment would entertain. I do not believe that the court and the commanding officer should be permitted to deprive an accused of the substantial right of counsel and railroad him, unheard and unrepresented, to a conviction. It was only yesterday that I was shown a record in which the counsel for the accused was intimidated from examining his superior officer as a witness by a threat made in open court by the superior officer that any question asked him, reflecting upon his credibility, would promptly bring charges against the youthful counsel. I do not believe that the conduct of a court should be controlled by a commanding officer. I do not believe that a court should be directed or instructed to reverse its finding of innocence or to impose a harsher punishment than that originally awarded. On the other hand, I believe, and I insist that the courts-martial having in their care and keeping the lives and liberties of every single one of our soldiers shall be courts of justice, acting as judges, controlled by and responsible to no man controlled by and responsible to their own oaths, and to the great principles of law which have been established by our civilization to protect an accused wherever he is placed on trial.

Surely you have been misled. Officers of your department who have supported the iniquitous system and who have imposed upon you, or most unfortunately persuaded you, have been busy preparing their defense. You have been presented lengthy reports designed to controvert the speech which I made in the Senate on this subject, which reports I have shown you to be misleading and utterly unreliable. Volumes of statistics are being prepared to show that, after all, the system is not so bad. Whether you do or not, the American people see and have the evidence; Members of Congress have the evidence. You have taken a terrible stand upon a subject which lies close to a thousand American hearthstones. The American people will not be deceived by such self-serving, misleading reports and statistics. Too many American families have made a Pentecostal sacrifice of their sons upon the altar of organized injustice.

Very sincerely, GEO. E. CHAMBERLAIN.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, it is not a pleasant duty that I have undertaken to assume. It is unfortunate that in times of war Congress is so engrossed with the forward movement of troops and the preparations for their successful advancement that they forget or do not have time to take up the things that so intimately touch the homes and hearts of the American people. I have no criticism about that, but the thing that distresses me most is the fact that with the thousands of letters coming to us all Congress can not lend an attentive ear to the suggestions which are being made to reform the military code, which has been in force and effect practically since 1806, so that there may be less of injustice done to our fighting men.

But they say, "Why, as chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs in 1916, did you not suggest some of these remedies?" Mr. President, these things had not then been done; and besides the Military Affairs Committee was listening to suggestions of Gen. Crowder. That revision was, in the main, a recodification of the laws that were scattered through the statute books involving changes of phraseology and the collating of the laws upon the subject. There were only two things inserted in that recodification that really have been of great benefit to the morale of the Army, and they were the suspended-sentence law and the establishment of the disciplinary barracks, where these young soldiers can be sent instead of being sent to the penitentiary, and can restore themselves to the colors. Those changes have been of great benefit, but aside from those and one or two other minor changes there was very little done in the revision of the Articles of War in 1916.

Mr. President, I have trespassed too long upon the time of the Senate, but I want to call attention to the statement that has been made by the Secretary of War, by Gen. Crowder, and by many of those who sustain their views that there is no inherent imperfection in the system, and that no injustice is perpetrated against the soldier by the system. With at least the knowledge and indorsement of the Secretary of War, a committee of the American Bar Association was appointed to hold hearings and to make suggestions with reference to creating an appellate tribunal and to suggest proper amendments to the Articles of War. There evidently seemed to be some little fear on his part that that committee would not do its duty strictly from the military viewpoint, and so a little later on the Secretary of War, for some reason which I have not had explained to me—and I did not expect to have it explained to me—appointed a strictly military tribunal on the subject and for the same purpose. There was not so much danger from them, apparently, in the minds of the authorities as there was in the committee of the bar association. Both of those committees recommended some sort of an appellate tribunal. It is true they differed as to the constitution of that appellate tribunal, but they both recommended it, and even Gen. Crowder favored an appellate tribunal of some kind. So the very appointment and the recommendations of these distinguished men are admissions that there are defects in the system. If there are no defects in the system, structurally or otherwise, and if no injustices are perpetrated under it, why change the law at all? Why not let the system go on just as it is, with the power of life and death in the commanding officer?

Why, Mr. President, there is no stronger admission of the fact that there were and are injustices in the court-martial system than that made by Gen. Crowder when he testified before the Military Affairs Committee in February, 1919, in substance, that there would be practically a jail delivery made by him in 60 days. Why a jail delivery if there were no injustices, Mr. President? That is not done even in the case of State courts or the Federal courts; there is no general jail delivery, because there can be no assumption that the men are not being fairly punished. If these men were properly punished, there could be no need of a general jail delivery.

I commend the War Department for what it has done in releasing these young men. I commend them for having had a prison delivery. They could not let them out too quickly for me. Why, Mr. President, this Army of ours of 4,000,000 men was a cross section of the citizenship of America. It was no ordinary army. The American people are not going to stand for any system that will make possible these acts of injustice in the years to come.

Mr. President, some may say that the discussion upon which I have entered is not germane to the subject of retiring Gen. Crowder as a lieutenant general. I say if he is entitled to the credit of having made this Army possible, in view of the fact that he had the power to correct the evils and did not do it, he is responsible for the injustices that have been perpetrated against this Army, and any man from the highest to the lowest who is responsible for such things as have been done ought not to be recognized by the Congress of the United States over and above men who have performed gallant service at the front and equally with Gen. Crowder have performed gallant service in making it possible to win the war by their efforts on this side of the water.

So I conclude, Mr. President, with this summarization: First, I oppose this bill unless the amendment which I have suggested is placed on it that recognizes other distinguished soldiers. I think even then it is not a proper measure to be passed by the Congress until some committee or somebody somewhere has had an opporunity to weigh the records which have been made by the men in the Army and selections made for advancement either to the grade of lieutenant general or some other high rank. Second, I oppose the bill giving Gen. Crowder credit to the exclusion of the 192,000 civilians who stood behind him and helped him in the work of organizing our Army and making it possible. Furthermore, because he had it in his power to have adopted a system of hearing appeals and remedying the cruelties that were being practiced against the young men constituting the Army and did not do it, I oppose this measure with all the power that is within me.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I regret very much to differ with the distinguished Senator from Oregon. For nearly three years I have served on the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate with him. There is not an abler man on that commttee or in this body, and there is not a better man anywhere, than my good friend from Oregon. He has been a tower of strength in practically all of our war activities. He is safe, he is sane, he is honest, he is courageous, forceful in debate, logical, and one of the most lovable men in the world, and for these reasons I greatly regret to have to differ with him on anything; but I do differ with him as to the measure of honor and distinction that is due Gen. Crowder for his great services to the country in originating the draft law and in his remarkably successful execution of that law.

I want to say that I do not differ with him on the subject of courts-martial. As he knows, a measure introduced by me has been pending for quite a while to correct what I believe is the grievous defects in our court-martial system. I think the present court-martial system is a disgrace to a free and an enlightened people, and it ought to be corrected; but the fact that we have that system, and the fact that the officer at the head of the Judge Advocate General's Department has seen fit to enforce that system when it came before him, is no reason why this bill should not pass.

If I had my way, I would turn out of prison every young soldier who is there, except those who are there on account of felonies. I think we are entirely too technical in keeping them there, and the Congress ought to pass a bill changing the system; but before it even does that it ought to authorize and to require the Secretary of War to look into all courts-martial records with a view only of the equity and justice of the case, and turn out hundreds of young men who are there improperly now, or there because of small or technical violations of military law, many of whom have already served longer terms than they ought to have served. I agree with the distinguished Senator from Oregon on that subject.

This bill proposes the following:

Be it enacted, etc., That in view of the long and faithful services of Maj. Gen. E. H. Crowder, Judge Advocate General of the United States Army, and especially his conspicuous services as Provost Marshal General in conjunction with the various State and Territorial executives and the local and district boards in the execution of the selective-service law, the President is hereby authorized, when that officer retires, to place him on the retired list of the Army as a lieutenant general, with the pay of that grade as fixed by section 24 of the act of Congress approved July 15, 1870, and to grant him a commission in accordance with such advanced rank.

I say the bill ought to pass, and the reason why it ought to pass is because this officer has earned this recognition at the hands of Congress. His official record is second to none. From the very beginning he rose to the necessity of our military situation. He showed initiative. He showed a remarkable grasp of the situation. He had been well tranied for just such a task. He had the confidence of the President. He had the confidence of the Army. The people did not then know him, but they soon found him out, and he had their confidence and cooperation all along the line.

On yesterday the Senator from Oregon inadvertently, as I believe, made a mistake in saying that Gen. Crowder was not entitled to the credit for having adopted the plan of having civilian boards to pass upon and enforce the selective-draft law. As will be seen by a simple inspection of the bill, what is known as the draft bill, or the selective-service law, S. 1871, was introduced April 17, 1917, by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN]. That bill, as stated by the Senator, did not at that time have in it the provision for civilian boards. In section 5 it did give the President power to appoint such boards, but the civilian board provision was not specifically in the bill and was afterwards put there by the committee, as the Senator from Oregon recited, with one exception, and that exception is all important. That bill was reported from the committee on April 22. It was reported just as it was introduced. On April 23, nearly a month before the enactment of this selective-service law, Gen. Crowder wrote a letter of announcement to the governors of the States in which he set forth the plan that he had fixed to govern the selective-draft law. I am going to read an excerpt from that letter to the governors, which shows that Gen. Crowder was the real author of the plan of having civilian boards pass upon the selective-draft law—a plan that everyone admits was one of the principal reasons why the draft law was a success.

In this letter Gen. Crowder, among other things, says:

For the purpose of securing prompt replies and of orderly administration and centralization of control and for further execution of the law, a local authority supervising an appropriate number of precincts is necessary. The county is, without exception, I believe, the territorial and political subdivision into which all voting precincts integrate without overlapping. For this reason, registration in the precincts must be under supervision of a county board of control. Other reasons are these: After the registration is complete, selections of persons to be called to the colors must be made based upon the information found in the registration lists. While the class from which soldiers are to come is to be segregated by draft, the law is careful to provide for avoiding the misery that war brings to dependents at home and for a choice of those whose military service the Nation most needs and whose civil and domestic service can best be spared.

Now, listen to this:

The important duty of making the selection from the drafted class can best be performed by a permanent board in each county composed of citizens who can be relied upon to execute this solemn function with even justice and with apprehension of its gravity.

He elaborates the scheme. On April 23, or later, the very scheme that he elaborated in this letter was put in the bill. Now, I am a member of the Military Affairs Committee, and I do not want to take away from that committee one particle of credit that properly belongs to it. The committee did insert it, but it inserted it after it had been originated or created by Gen. Crowder, and he is entitled to the entire credit of it.

It has been suggested, as a reason why we should not give this honor to Gen. Crowder, that political reasons have actuated him at times. I do not know whether that is true or not. In my dealings with him I have never seen any suggestion of that in his conduct; but I want to say that that kind of an argument comes with poor grace at this time. A Democratic administration used the services of Gen. Crowder during the war; and surely after having used Gen. Crowder's services to organize the greatest army that was ever organized in the history of the world there is no reason why, as Democrats, we should not be generous enough to give him the credit that is due him. I want to say, looking at it in that light, and remembering what Gen. Crowder has done, that political considerations do not weigh with me in the matter. He has rendered a vitally patriotic service and rendered it in such a manner as to win the approval of thinking men all over the country, and he should receive his reward.

Now, Mr. President, what has Gen. Crowder done? Everybody who knows the history of his country is familiar with the draft law that was attempted to be put into force in the Civil War—a constant series of mistakes, one after another. It was the most difficult thing in the world to conscript men in the late Civil War on both sides. It was thought by many of us—and I was one of those who thought so—that it would be difficult to enforce the draft in this war, and I believe it would have been difficult to enforce in this war but for the peculiar genius of Gen. Crowder.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. WARREN. Years ago, when I first knew Gen. Crowder, while he was yet a young junior officer, I talked to him about the very subject that the Senator has now mentioned—the draft in the Civil War. The subject of a possible draft thereafter was on his mind; and I know that he had gone over the subject years and years ago in all its particulars of application and minutiæ, so that, next to experience itself, he was prepared, to the very limit that any man could be prepared, for the exigency in which he did so well and for which he made such splendid provision.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, it was a great undertaking to draft into the service of the United States the nearly 4,000,000 men who were drafted into it. I believe nearly 5,000,000 either were drafted or prepared for the draft. It was a tremendous undertaking to select these men in such a way as not to break down the industries and the productive enterprises of the country. It was a task that seemed to many men almost impossible of successful carrying out. It was put into the hands of Gen. Crowder, and by his diplomacy, by his endeavors to be fair, by his building up of the local civilian boards, by his cooperation with the local authorities, by his cooperation with the various governors of the States, I say without fear of successful contradiction that that plan of conscripting our boys in the Army has succeeded as no other plan has done in the history of the world in any nation. The local draft boards and the district boards all over this country learned to admire and respect the fairness and the ability of Gen. Crowder. Almost to a man they have felt that he was entitled to honor at the hands of the Congress, and I have received many petitions from my State urging that some honor should be done Gen. Crowder. Mention is made that Gen. Crowder never has been across the seas in this war as a reason why this bill should not pass. That is not his fault. He performed a greater work here than he could have possibly performed across the ocean. There are few men who could have performed it in the satisfactory way that Gen. Crowder has performed it.

I say it was just as important to secure this Army at home, to build it up and put it in motion, as it was to use it and operate it after it had been built up and put in motion. The whole country a year ago was filled with praise for Gen. Crowder for the great work he had done. But since the war is over—like many people—Senators forget the great services that some of our officers actually performed in time of stress.

I do not know what the Senate is going to do with this bill. It may reverse itself. Men may go back on their records. I do not know. But more than a year ago I offered an amendment, as I recall, to one of the military bills, in which it was provided that Gen. Crowder should be promoted to the rank of lieutenant general, and this body overwhelmingly voted in favor of Gen. Crowder at that time. I think there were only 6 votes cast against the amendment. What has happened since to render him any less worthy? If he has faults, we knew them at that time. If there were objections, we were fully advised of the objections, because Gen. Crowder was then in the public eye as perhaps no other man in this country has ever been. There are no reasons why he should not be accorded this honor. I think the two outstanding officers of the Army in this war have been Gen. Pershing, who had charge of our Army on the other side, and Gen. Crowder, who created it on this side. I say that without reflection upon any of the other splendid officers who have earned great reputations in this war. But, preeminently and above all others, Gen. Pershing on the other side is entitled to the greatest credit and Gen. Crowder to the greatest credit on this side.

But it is said that, by reason of his acts as Judge Advocate General, he ought not to have the honor; that whatever of credit he was entitled to has been negatived by his acts as Judge Advocate General in court-martial cases. I do not subscribe to that view, and I want to say why. During the war Gen. Crowder practically had nothing to do with the Judge Advocate General's department. That was in the hands of the Acting Judge Advocate General, Gen. Ansell, in that department. He was responsible for its acts more largely than Gen. Crowder, and should be held responsible now if wrongs were committed in that department, because he virtually had charge of it all during the war.

An amendment has been offered to kill this bill. It is by way of proviso, and reads as follows:

Provided, That these officers of the Army who now hold, or previously during the recent war held, the rank herein set before their respect names, to wit, Lieut. Gens. Hunter Liggett and Robert L. Bullard, and Maj. Gens. James W. McAndrews, James G. Harbord, Ernest Hinds, Merritte W. Ireland, Harry L. Rogers, William C. Langfitt, William L. Kenly, Henry P. McCain, Charles P. Summerall, and Leonard Wood shall, when retired from active service, have the rank of lieutenant general and the pay hereinbefore provided for an officer retired with said rank.

Mr. President, no such amendment ought to be agreed to. There are some names here of men who are entitled to recognition by Congress. Certainly Gen. Liggett and Gen. Bullard, two of the ablest and best generals in the Army, who fought on the fields of France, are entitled to the highest rewards. But this is no way to give it to them. They ought to have it on their own merits, not as a proviso but in a bill introduced for the purpose, just as we have a bill for Gen. Crowder. I have known Gen. Bullard practically all his life, and there is not a better or more splendid soldier or man in this country, and no man for whom I would rather vote to honor. But this is not the way to honor him. It is a left-handed compliment at best, and a left-handed promotion. I want Gen. Bullard honored in the same manner this bill would honor Gen. Crowder.

Here is another on the list, Maj. Gen. Henry P. McCain, a splendid officer during this war, who made one of the best records of any officer of the Army, and who is entitled to be rewarded. But he ought to be rewarded on the merits of Henry P. McCain, and not as a sop thrown to him in any such manner as provided in this proviso. Some of these names on this list are not entitled to honors equal to those which should be accorded to Gen. Crowder. But even if they were, the honor should not be given in this way. I think the amendment ought to be defeated. I think the bill ought to be passed. I think it is a proper bill. I think Gen. Crowder has earned this reward by faithful, intelligent, and splendid service, and it makes no difference what we think of him personally, it makes no difference what we think of him politically, it makes no difference about what his shortcomings may be; he has served his country in one of the greatest crises that was ever before it, he has served it in such an unusual manner as to win the plaudits of the American people, and it is as little as Congress can do to carry out their will and give him this reward that he has earned for himself. I earnestly hope that this just measure will overwhelmingly pass the Senate, just as it did more than a year ago when I introduced it.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, 24,234,021 men were enrolled in the selective-service draft of the United States. It was not only the greatest single achievement of the war, it was the most wonderful mobilization of man power in the history of the world. Back of every step of this great achievement was the patience and the courtesy and the efficiency of Gen. Crowder. It was the fact that we had this man power that enabled the United States to put 2,000,000 men in France in 18 months, when it took England three years to put the same number of men upon the fields of France.

Undoubtedly there are others who served in connection with the office of the Provost Marshal General who are entitled to share the honor with Gen. Crowder; and they are the men who, of all others, have been insisting that this just recognition of the service which that office rendered should be given to the chief, in whose name it was done.

Mr. President, it was my happy privilege, during almost the entire operation of the selective-service law, to be the chairman of the district board in the city of St. Louis. More than 25,000 appeal cases were acted upon by that board, and it is not only my duty but it is a pleasure to bear witness before my fellow Senators that in the execution of that work, in every step of the process, the genius and sympathy and guiding hand of Gen. Crowder made it possible. No one could better dispose of the amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] than did the eloquent Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR]. It has no place in the consideration of this bill. The bill is the recognition of the Provost Marshal General's Office, and as such we do credit to ourselves in passing the bill and defeating the amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I have been compelled to be absent from the Chamber during a good portion of this discussion and therefore am not in a position to discuss all the points which have been referred to by other Senators, and particularly by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN].

I very much regret that the Senator from Oregon has offered an amendment to this bill which seeks to confer upon a large number of officers, 12 in number, an honor similar to the one sought to be conferred upon Gen. Crowder. I regret it, not because I am convinced that those officers are not worthy of recognition at the hands of Congress, but because I believe the Senate at this time is not in a position to weigh the arguments pro and con which might be offered in connection with the names submitted by the Senator's amendment.

I think the Senate should know that the Committee on Military Affairs, at the time the bill presented by the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] was reported, instructed its chairman to appoint a subcommittee to take up the matter of conferring honors of this kind or of a similar kind upon other officers of the Army. The chairman of the committee has endeavored to consult with Senators who are members of the committee upon that very important question. A good many consultations have been had, and it is hoped that within a reasonable time the Military Affairs Committee as a whole may have some formal suggestions to make to the Senate as to what officers of the Army shall receive especial recognition, and as to the character of that recognition.

As the matter stands to-day, it is quite impossible, I believe, for Senators in open session, and, as it were, upon a moment's notice, to act upon the records and the qualifications of 12 officers whose names are suddenly submitted to the Senate for appointment on the retired list with the grade of lieutenant general.

Apparently the Senator from Oregon, in addition to naming the two officers who held the temporary grade of lieutenant general in the American Expeditionary Forces, and with two other exceptions, those of Gen. Summerall and Gen. Leonard Wood, has taken the officers who were at the head of the staff corps or services of the American Expeditionary Forces merely taking a list of all those names and submitting them en bloc to the Senate, and now requesting the Senate to act upon them. I shall not say at this time that any of those officers are unworthy of this recognition; but I do say that the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate has not given these names any consideration at all, nor have the records of most of these officers been looked up, nor is the Senate itself in possession of the information.

I do not intend, Mr. President, to comment at length upon some of the arguments made by the Senator from Oregon. I know how strongly he feels about our system of military justice. Apparently he would give the Senate and the country to understand that Gen. Crowder is solely and entirely responsible for everything and anything that has occurred in the administration of military justice. I can not agree with that contention. I know the general well enough to know that he has spent many hours of careful study, and has exerted every atom of his great ability to a proper solution of that perplexing question, which is still undecided.

It seems to me verging upon unfairness at this time, while that legislation is pending, to attack the Judge Advocate General of the Army, the Provost Marshal General that was, and give that as the reason, apparently, why he should not be rewarded by the Congress for the really remarkable work he did as Provost Marshal General, an office that has no connection whatsoever with the office of Judge Advocate General.

At one point in the remarks of the Senator from Oregon he interjected the observation that he saw one of his colleagues smiling. It so happened I was the Senator to whom he alluded, and I interjected the observation that I was not smiling. That may have been somewhat inaccurate. Perhaps I was smiling rather in deprecation of the assertion which the Senator from Oregon made in connection with Gen. Crowder. The Senator from Oregon stated to the Senate that Gen. Crowder, having been Provost Marshal General of the draft and having conducted these millions of young men into the Army, should thereafter have seen to it that they were properly treated in the Army, and attempted to give the impression that it was the duty of the Provost Marshal General in charge of the draft to follow the careers and treatment of millions of men after they were mustered into the service and placed under the command of line officers. It seemed to me that criticism was so far-fetched and so unwarranted as to legitimately give rise to the impression that the Senator from Oregon was stretching things to make a case against Gen. Crowder. However, it would take but a moment's thought to thoroughly understand that it would be quite impossible, and in fact illegal from a military standpoint, but certainly impossible for the Provost Marshal General to make himself in whole or in part responsible for the conditions in the cantonments or in the American Expeditionary Forces itself. It was at that point in the Senator's discussion at which it may be said I smiled deprecatingly.

It is true, as the Senator said, that he and I have gotten along splendidly in all the work we have had together in the Military Committee for many, many months. I have no purpose at this time, and certainly I have no intention in the future, of clashing with the Senator from Oregon, because I realize and admire the tremendously valuable and patriotic service he has rendered to his country as chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs at a most trying period in the country's history. He and I and the other members of the committee sat during the war and conducted what has been known as an investigation or inquiry into the operations of the War Department. The committee nearly always acted unanimously, and at no time during those investigations into the condition of the troops, into the condition of equipment, into the operations of the Army, as a whole or in detail—and those investigations of inquiry went into many details—at no time during those many, many months did either the Senator from Oregon or any other member of the committee suggest that Enoch Crowder was responsible for any of the shortcomings which may have existed in the Army itself.

I wanted to bring that point out, because I think the criticism is unwarranted and far-fetched in every way.

Mr. President, the Senator from Oregon, while I was still in the Chamber, seemed to be attempting to belittle the services of Gen. Crowder in connection with the operation of the selective draft law by creating the impression that the 192,000 civilians who were employed in one capacity or another in the enforcement of that law should share the credit with him. I heartily agree with that proposal, but at the same time I will not permit that, if I can help it, to detract from Gen. Crowder. Gen. Crowder himself has been most generous in his attitude toward the members of the local draft boards and the district boards. In fact it was he who sent word to the Military Committee, and I think told them personally, that the members of these draft boards should receive some recognition from Congress in the way of a bill extending the thanks of Congress to them. I happen to know, Mr. President, that he wanted that done before any suggestion came forward as to his receiving a reward. The services rendered by those men have been in his mind from the very beginning. I might say to the Senator from Oregon, and to other Senators who may be interested in this phase of the matter, that there is no more enthusiastic group of supporters of any man in public life than that represented by the men who worked in the local draft boards and in the district draft boards in their support of Gen. Crowder, who was their leader in the operation of that remarkable law. If there are any people in the country who will rejoice at the conferring of an honor upon Gen. Crowder, it is those very members of the draft boards who worked under him during all those months. It was he who guided them; it was he who answered the thousands and thousands of letters from them; it was he who kept in touch with the governors and adjutants general of the States and the chairmen of the district boards who were constantly writing to Washington to the office of the Provost Marshal General to get his opinion upon this thing and upon that thing down to the smallest detail; and in not one instance that I can remember did Gen. Crowder fail to respond to the demands made upon him; and his messages and opinions, his orders and suggestions, are models of clear statement coming from clear thinking, based in turn upon a complete comprehension of the spirit of the statute and of our institutions.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Is it not a fact that recognition of Gen. Crowder in this way would, in a sense, be a recognition of those engaged in the draft service under him?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I believe so, Mr. President, and I say again that no group of people will rejoice so much as those very people who served on these boards.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. KNOX. Following up the suggestion of the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD], the Senator from Oregon mentioned but one name of a subordinate of Gen. Crowder who has been conspicuously useful. I know, because I visited the Senator from Oregon with Col. Warren, who urged upon the Senator from Oregon the proposition that in honoring Gen. Crowder they honored every man who had worked under him.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am obliged for the interruption of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Referring once again to the suggestion that this bill in some way reflects an attempt on the part of either Gen. Crowder or his supporters to seize all the credit for the operation of this law for Gen. Crowder alone and to deny it to other people, let me say to the Senate that this very Col. Warren, who did such remarkably good work at Gen. Crowder's shoulder, was recommended by Gen. Crowder for a distinguished-service medal, showing that the general appreciated the help Col. Warren had given him and was generous in his attitude toward all the men who by their teamwork made this thing possible.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. In that connection I desire to call attention to a mistake that I think was made by the Senator from Oregon in reference to Mr. Warren. It seems that the Senator from Oregon thought that Mr. Warren was the real author of the local district civilian board plan. That plan was given out in a letter of April 23, 1917, by Gen. Crowder, and the record shows that Mr. Warren came to the department—I have the date here and will give it—on April 27, or four days after the scheme of local boards or district boards had been adopted by Gen. Crowder. He came here after that time and became an officer in the department of the Judge Advocate General.

While I am on my feet, if the Senator from New York will permit me, I will call the attention of the Senate to the proviso that was passed by the Senate on June 29, 1918, to which I referred, but the actual proviso I had forgotten just when and how it had passed. On June 29, 1918, the Senate adopted this amendment introduced by me to the then pending bill:

Provided, That section 8 of the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917, shall be held and construed to authorize the President, in accordance with the provisions of said act and for the period of the existing emergency only, to appoint as lieutenant general the officer detailed by the direction of the President to perform the duties of provost marshal general in the execution of so much of the aforesaid act as relates to the registration and the selective draft.

On page 8473 of the RECORD of that session that amendment was agreed to. In other words, the Senate has already, by an overwhelming majority, as I recall, gone on record as giving this honor and emolument to Gen. Crowder. I thank the Senator from New York for permitting me to call the attention of the Senate to it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I think the only difference in the situation to-day as compared with that of the time referred to by the Senator from Tennessee is the attitude of the Senator from Oregon, which apparently in the interim has been changed. I know of no other Senator who has changed his attitude. I venture the opinion that the Senator's attitude has not been changed as the result of a revision of his opinion as to Gen. Crowder's management of the selective law. It has to do with something entirely different from the selective-draft law.

Something was said a moment ago about Col. Warren. The services which he rendered are deserving of the highest praise. I think it fair to say he was Gen. Crowder's right-hand man. He helped him in an infinite number of details. When Gen. Crowder could not come before the Military Committee on account of press of business in the Provost Marshal General's office—and Gen. Crowder was there day and night for months—he would put his memoranda and statements in the hands of Col.

Warren and send Col. Warren to the committee. He had absolute faith in him, and upon many occasions Col. Warren was given the responsibility and took the responsibility of giving us his opinion as to this or that amendment in the law or as to how it was operating in this way or that. There was a degree of trust and confidence between the two men which was inspiring and which incidentally helped the Military Affairs Committee tremendously. For that service rendered to his superior, Maj. Warren, who was originally a major, was promoted to lieutenant colonel, and the information which came to me just the other day is that as a further reward for this service Gen. Crowder endeavored to secure for him, by his official recommendation, the bestowal of a distinguished-service medal.

I assume the pending question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Adding a list of 12 officers to receive similar honors. I know it is embarrassing for the Senate to vote "nay" upon an amendment of this sort, and yet, in the interest of a proper adjustment of the matter of awards and recognition to distinguished men in the United States Army, in the interest of having an intelligent comprehension of the records of the men who led our armies in the field as well as in the Staff Corps, I am constrained to ask that the Senate decline to accept the amendment and at the same time express the earnest hope that Gen. Crowder, by the passage of this bill unamended, shall receive the honor which he has so well deserved.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, I do not know, really, that I can add anything to what the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs [Mr. WADSWORTH] has said with reference to this matter. He has covered the case so completely, so clearly, and so admirably that I indorse every word that he has said with respect to Gen. Crowder and Col. Warren and the others to whom he alluded in the course of his remarks.

Yet, as a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, who served with that committee during the entire period from the declaration of war until the present time, I feel that it would be remiss in me if I were to fail now to say my word of commendation in behalf of Gen. Crowder. I have the honor of a personal acquaintance with him, which has permitted me to know some of his own thoughts and what his preferences would have been at the outbreak of the war if he could have had the privilege of indulging them. I know that it was his earnest desire to serve actively with the troops, and that it was a great disappointment to him that circumstances which were entirely beyond his control prevented his doing so. He was one of those who were kept at home to perform the service assigned them; and, Mr. President, no man connected in any capacity with the war, from its beginning to its end, performed his service better than did Gen. Crowder.

I have the very highest respect—in fact, it amounts almost to affection—for the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee during most of the time I have been connected with that committee; and yet I can not share his view on this question. For the first time, I think, during my connection with that committee I part company with the Senator from Oregon in his opinions on the question now before the Senate, which came under the jurisdiction of that committee.

The committee had many complaints, directed at all classes of officers, military and semimilitary, connected with the management of the war, but never once, in my recollection, did we have anything but commendation for the administration of the office of the Provost Marshal General. I think, certainly, that Gen. Crowder as Provost Marshal General has earned any honor which the Senate and the Government of the United States can pay him. So I very earnestly hope that the amendment to the bill may be defeated and that the bill itself may be passed as a matter of justice to a highly deserving officer.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I have only a few words to say. Perhaps I ought first to say that I am in favor of the bill with relation to Gen. Crowder and that I am against the amendment naming 12 other officers to be included, for all of whom I have the greatest respect and admiration, and on none of whom do I wish to reflect in any way. For that reason I think we ought not to undertake to change the bill, especially so since my good friend from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN]—and he is my friend, and I am glad to say I am his friend—while going over a wide field in discussing this measure, is confessedly against the bill without adding these names and really against the bill even though they should be added.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. WARREN. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. I merely wish to ask the Senator a question. As I understand this amendment, it is proposed to confer certain honors on perhaps a dozen different officers. May I ask the Senator from Wyoming, as he is a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, whether the officers named in the amendment have been considered in this behalf by the committee, or has the committee taken any action in reference to them?

Mr. WARREN. They have not been considered; but I was about to say that the argument of the Senator from Oregon, when finally summed up, is simply against the bill. It seems to me unfair, both to Gen. Crowder and to the other 12 officers, that their names should be proposed here to be inserted in the bill for the purpose of killing the bill by making it top-heavy through the insertion of matter which has not yet been duly considered by the Military Affairs Committee.

Now, answering further the question of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], I will say that the matter of increased rank for Gen. Crowder has been once acted upon months ago in the Senate. He was then indorsed by the passage of a bill proposing to make him a lieutenant general on the active list. Gen. Crowder asked that his name be withdrawn; and that action was taken. It is now proposed to make him a lieutenant general when he retires.

When the matter was under discussion in the committee, I think I am permitted to say that, generally speaking, other names were mentioned as among those who might be considered; and the chairman of the committee was authorized to select and to act with, I think, four other members of the committee in making such selections of officers as they wished to present to the full committee as deserving of some special indorsement or promotion. I assume that that committee now has the matter under consideration.

On the other hand, the bill in charge of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] was supported without any opposition, so far as recorded votes were concerned, although it is true that the Senator from Oregon reserved the privilege of objecting to and opposing the bill on the floor of the Senate. So the question in reference to Gen. Crowder has been fully considered by the former committee, before the changes in membership during the last year, and by the existing full committee, and I may say that the proposition has had enthusiastic and earnest support.

There is a difference between Gen. Crowder and the other officers mentioned. Let us presume that they are equally entitled to the benefits of promotion; yet at the same time Gen. Crowder has had a service of some 42 years; he has arrived at an age when the President on any day can ask him to step aside and go on the retired list; and, of course, he has long since passed the time when he can in justice to the service and to himself ask for retirement. Many of the other generals, including some of those whose names are best known, are still very much younger than Gen. Crowder; and the question arises whether or not some of them should not be promoted on the active list and not wait until the time of retirement comes to receive this benefit. At all events, there is plenty of time for these matters to be considered and for the committee to take under advisement the other names and to report to the Senate their views as to the deserts of the different officers named without incurring any specific loss of time in any one of the other cases, because if this privilege is to be accorded only on retirement, it is presumed that no one of the others is at present seeking retirement.

So I may say that it seems to me in respect to the other names—and they are the names of some of the best generals of the Army—in fairness and in justice to them as well as to Gen. Crowder, we ought to vote down the amendment and let this matter of preferment come directly upon the promotion of Gen. Crowder himself, upon his reputation, upon his deserts, and upon what the Senate may think of him standing alone.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if I may say a word, I was prompted to ask the question which I did because I share with the Senator from Oregon the very highest opinion of Adjt. Gen. McCain. It was my privilege and pleasure to get into touch with him very frequently while he was serving as Adjutant General. I am very frank to say that I have the utmost confidence in his ability, his patriotism, and his very high character, and I felt I did not want to be put in the attitude of voting against the promotion of an officer of that character if the amendment was presented here with the recommendation of the committee.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I know Gen. McCain well. I have known him long, just as I have known Gen. Crowder—since they were lieutenants, in fact. I have the highest regard for Gen. McCain, and under no circumstances would I vote against preferment for him were it a clean bill of health with a desire really to promote him. The other generals mentioned in the amendment have my esteem, and I hope to support them from time to time, as I have done heretofore, when their cases are reviewed by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, just a word in regard to this matter. I feel that the country owes a debt to Gen. Crowder which it is impossible to pay. In the beginning of any important enterprise it is very necessary to start right. There is no question that Gen. Crowder outlined and spent infinite labor and time and skill in the development of the selective-draft system which resulted so advantageously in every way. We ought to recognize that service; the country has recognized it; the Senate has once recognized it; and we ought to-day, it seems to me, without hesitation to pass this bill.

As the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] has said, I regret to be put in the position of voting against the preferment of the splendid officers who are named in the amendment. I would not say or do one single thing to detract from the glory which they have earned, and I am willing to admit our obligations and indebtedness to them in every way, for they have made magnificent records and all of them deserve preferment, but I think we ought to let each case stand upon its own merits. The cases of the other officers have not been considered by the committee. I do not even know, and I presume no member of the committee knows, what the preference of these officers would be. As the Senator from Wyoming has said, they may prefer, as undoubtedly some of them do, that they be continued on the active list and promoted there, and not be retired. Gen. Crowder has reached the age where there is involved the question of his retirement from the service, after the magnificent work he has done, which has resulted to our great benefit, in handling a problem which at the very inception of the war it was vitally essential to solve correctly. We have considered his case, and the bill deals with his case. He is about to retire, and when he does retire we simply recognize this obligation and vote this rank to him.

It means that the compensation to the retired officer with this rank will be about the compensation he is now receiving—very little more, if any.

I think we ought to pass the bill, without its being encumbered by these amendments, and I shall feel obliged to vote against the amendments, because I believe they endanger the bill. I shall be prepared to deal at the appropriate time with any measure intended to make proper provision for the splendid officers mentioned in the amendment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I am not a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, and so I know very little technically about Army matters; but it was my good fortune several years before this country entered the Great War to make the acquaintance of Gen. Enoch H. Crowder, and during the war my acquaintance with him continued and ripened into friendship; and I had occasion many times to advise and consult with him as to the legislation that became necessary for the prosecution of our part in the war.

I simply desire to say that I would not like to have this occasion pass by without my saying just a word to indicate my respect and affection for Gen. Crowder. As has been well said, he performed a magnificent and a peculiar service for this country. If I am not mistaken, there were very few men in the Army who had a special capacity for the peculiar service that he performed. He is an admirable lawyer, if I know one when I see him and talk to him. He is especially versed in constitutional questions in addition to his military knowledge. He is a man of great courage and of absolute fidelity to the Government and to his country. I should be glad to pay tribute to other generals, and I appreciate the fact that in the public mind many times there exists an impression that those who participate actively in the field in time of hostilities are entitled to more credit than those who give their learning and knowledge and work their brains in trying to make conditions possible for those who are in the field, so that they can use their efforts to the best advantage. But, Mr. President, I think Gen. Crowder is peculiarly entitled to this legislation. I do not consider it so much an honor to him, and I do not vote for this bill with the idea that I am conferring upon him any favor. I think such a measure should come from us as a tribute of our appreciation of the services rendered and a desire upon our part to do justice to the man who has done so much for his country.

I know that Gen. Crowder was indefatigable in his industry. He worked night and day. He wrestled with the most original and intricate problems, and, so far as I know, he succeeded in every problem which he attacked and accomplished a great work for this country. I shall vote with great pleasure for this bill without amendment.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I have had no opportunity to say a word about this amendment, and I will say only a word.

There are a number of officers named in the amendment for whom I entertain as high an opinion, as gentlemen and as officers, as I do of Gen. Crowder; and on a separate measure, or where the relative claims as between themselves and other officers, have been thrashed out in the committee or in the Senate, I would with the greatest cheerfulness vote for equal honors with those we are proposing to confer upon Gen. Crowder. But it seems to me, Mr. President, a very doubtful compliment that is sought to be paid to these gentlemen by this amendment. I am perfectly certain that I would not want an honor from Congress that came as a rider on a proposition to reward some one else for services, and I doubt very much whether these officers would appreciate a compliment or reward that came in that way.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I hope we can get a vote now, and dispose of the bill. I do not intend to ask for an executive session until this bill is disposed of, but I hope it will be disposed of to-night.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, one of the Senators who is absent has asked that I suggest the absence of a quorum if there is about to be a roll call.

Mr. LODGE. All right; that is just what I want.

Mr. POMERENE. I do not care to do that if there is going to be any further debate.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly; I should propose it myself.

Mr. POMERENE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Jones, Wash.	Nelson	Smith, Ariz.
Bankhead	Kellogg	New	Smoot
Borah	Kendrick	Nugent	Spencer
Brandegee	Kenyon	Overman	Stanley
Calder	Keyes	Owen	Sutherland
Capper	King	Page	Townsend
Chamberlain	Kirby	Penrose	Trammell
Colt	Knox	Phelan	Wadsworth
Curtis	La Follette	Phipps	Walsh, Mass.
Dial	Lenroot	Pittman	Warren
Dillingham	Lodge	Poindexter	Watson
Fall	McCormick	Pomerene	Williams
Fletcher	McKellar	Sheppard	Wolcott
Gay	McNary	Sherman
Gerry	Moses	Shields
Harrison	Myers	Simmons

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-one Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The pending amendment is the amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN].

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendments of the Committee on Military Affairs.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 1, strike out the words "and emoluments."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 1, after the word "grade," insert "as fixed by section 24 of the act of Congress approved July 15, 1870."

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is as in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment.

Mr. KNOX. I offer the following amendment: On page 1, line 4, I move to strike out the capital "E" and substitute the word "Enoch," so as to read "Maj. Gen. Enoch H. Crowder."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). The junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is necessarily absent on account of illness in his family. I am paired with him during his absence, and therefore withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. OWEN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair to the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MYERS. Has the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. MYERS. I have a general pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], and in his absence I transfer my pair to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. BANKHEAD. My colleague [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is absent on official business. He has a general pair with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING].

Mr. JONES of Washington. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] to the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] and vote "yea."

Mr. DILLINGHAM (after having voted in the affirmative). I have already voted; but I find that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], with whom I have a general pair, has not voted. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Maryland to the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY] and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. LODGE (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]. I transfer my pair to the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. CALDER (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS]. I transfer my pair to the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] and let my vote stand.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I desire to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. NEWBERRY].

Mr. McCORMICK (after having voted in the affirmative). I note that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON], with whom I have a general pair, has not voted. I transfer my pair to the Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] and let my vote stand.

Mr. FLETCHER (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL], who is absent. I am informed that if he were present he would vote the same way I voted. Therefore I will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Maine (Mr. FERNALD) with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON];

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH];

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD];

The Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN];

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]; and

The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. GERRY. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON], and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] are detained from the Senate on public business. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] are detained by illness in their families. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] is detained by personal illness. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS], the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] are detained on official business.

The result was announced—yeas 49, nays 11, as follows:

So the bill was passed.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business in open session.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

Mr. LODGE. I ask that the reading of the treaty be continued.

Mr. MOSES. I would like to ask the Senator in charge of the treaty if he will attempt to proceed with the consideration of the treaty in the absence of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], who is in charge on the part of the minority of the committee?

Mr. LODGE. Yes, Mr. President, I shall go on with the reading for the present, if the Senate will permit.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the treaty and read as follows:

"Article 112.

"All the inhabitants of the territory which is returned to Denmark will acquire Danish nationality ipso facto, and will lose their German nationality.

"Persons, however, who had become habitually resident in this territory after October 1, 1918, will not be able to acquire Danish nationality without permission from the Danish Government.

"Article 113.

"Within two years from the date on which the sovereignty over the whole or part of the territory of Schleswig subjected to the plebiscite is restored to Denmark:

"Any person over 18 years of age born in the territory restored to Denmark, not habitually resident in this region, and possessing German nationality, will be entitled to opt for Denmark;

"Any person over 18 years of age habitually resident in the territory restored to Denmark will be entitled to opt for Germany.

"Option by a husband will cover his wife and option by parents will cover their children less than 18 years of age.

"Persons who have exercised the above right to opt must within the ensuing twelve months transfer their place of residence to the State in favour of which they have opted.

"They will be entitled to retain the immovable property which they own in the territory of the other State in which they were habitually resident before opting. They may carry with them their movable property of every description. No export or import duties may be imposed upon them in connection with the removal of such property.

"Article 114.

"The proportion and nature of the financial or other obligations of Germany and Prussia which are to be assumed by Denmark will be fixed in accordance with Article 254 of Part IX (Financial Clauses) of the present Treaty.

"Further stipulations will determine any other questions arising out of the transfer to Denmark of the whole or part of the territory of which she was deprived by the Treaty of October 30, 1864.

"Section XIII.

"HELIGOLAND.

"Article 115.

"The fortifications, military establishments, and harbours of the Islands of Heligoland and Dune shall be destroyed under the supervision of the Principal Allied Governments by German labour and at the expense of Germany within a period to be determined by the said Governments.

"The term 'harbours' shall include the north-east mole, the west wall, the outer and inner breakwaters and reclaimed land within them, and all naval and military works, fortifications and buildings, constructed or under construction, between lines connecting the following positions taken from the British Admiralty chart No. 126 of April 19, 1918.

"(a) lat. 54° 10′ 49″ N.; long. 7° 53′ 39″ E.;
"(b) — 54° 10′ 35″ N.; — 7° 54′ 18″ E.;
"(c) — 54° 10′ 14″ N.; — 7° 54′ 00″ E.; "(d) — 54° 10′ 17″ N.; — 7° 53′ 37″ E.;
"(e) — 54° 10′ 44″ N.; — 7° 53′ 26″ E.

"These fortifications, military establishments and harbours shall not be reconstructed nor shall any similar works be constructed in future.

"Section XIV.

"RUSSIA AND RUSSIAN STATES.

"Article 116.

"Germany acknowledges and agrees to respect as permanent and inalienable the independence of all the territories which were part of the former Russian Empire on August 1, 1914.

"In accordance with the provisions of Article 259 of Part IX (Financial Clauses) and Article 292 of Part X (Economic Clauses) Germany accepts definitely the abrogation of the Brest-Litovsk Treaties and of all other treaties, conventions and agreements entered into by her with the Maximalist Government in Russia.

"The Allied and Associated Powers formally reserve the rights of Russia to obtain from Germany restitution and reparation based on the principles of the present Treaty.

"Article 117.

"Germany undertakes to recognize the full force of all treaties or agreements which may be entered into by the Allied and Associated Powers with States now existing or coming into existence in future in the whole or part of the former Empire of Russia as it existed on August 1, 1914, and to recognize the frontiers of any such States as determined therein.

"PART IV.

"GERMAN RIGHTS AND INTERESTS OUTSIDE GERMANY.

"Article 118.

"In territory outside her European frontiers as fixed by the present Treaty, Germany renounces all rights, titles and privileges whatever in or over territory which belonged to her or to her allies, and all rights, titles and privileges whatever their origin which she held as against the Allied and Associated Powers.

"Germany hereby undertakes to recognize and to conform to the measures which may be taken now or in the future by the Principal Allied and Associated Powers, in agreement where necessary with third Powers, in order to carry the above stipulation into effect.

"In particular Germany declares her acceptance of the following Articles relating to certain special subjects.

"Section I.

"GERMAN COLONIES.

"Article 119.

"Germany renounces in favour of the Principal Allied and Associated Powers all her rights and titles over her oversea possessions.

"Article 120.

"All movable and immovable property in such territories belonging to the German Empire or to any German State shall pass to the Government exercising authority over such territories, on the terms laid down in Article 257 of Part IX (Financial Clauses) of the present Treaty. The decision of the local courts in any dispute as to the nature of such property shall be final.

"Article 121.

"The provisions of Sections I and IV of Part X (Economic Clauses) of the present Treaty shall apply in the case of these territories whatever be the form of Government adopted for them.

"Article 122.

"The Government exercising authority over such territories may make such provision as it thinks fit with reference to the repatriation from them of German nationals and to the conditions upon which German subjects of European origin shall, or shall not, be allowed to reside, hold property, trade or exercise a profession in them.

"Article 123.

"The provisions of Article 260 of Part IX (Financial Clauses) of the present Treaty shall apply in the case of all agreements concluded with German nationals for the construction or exploitation of public works in the German oversea possessions, as well as any sub-concessions or contracts resulting therefrom which may have been made to or with such nationals.

"Article 124.

"Germany hereby undertakes to pay, in accordance with the estimate to be presented by the French Government and approved by the Reparation Commission, reparation for damage suffered by French nationals in the Cameroons or the frontier zone by reason of the acts of the German civil and military authorities and of German private individuals during the period from January 1, 1900, to August 1, 1914.

"Article 125.

"Germany renounces all rights under the Conventions and Agreements with France of November 4, 1911, and September 28, 1912, relating to Equatorial Africa. She undertakes to pay to the French Government, in accordance with the estimate to be presented by that Government and approved by the Reparation Commission, all the deposits, credits, advances, etc., effected by virtue of these instruments in favour of Germany.

"Article 126.

"Germany undertakes to accept and observe the agreements made or to be made by the Allied and Associated Powers or some of them with any other Power with regard to the trade in arms and spirits, and to the matters dealt with in the General Act of Berlin of February 26, 1885, the General Act of Brussels of July 2, 1890, and the conventions completing or modifying the same.

"Article 127.

"The native inhabitants of the former German oversea possessions shall be entitled to the diplomatic protection of the Governments exercising authority over those territories.

"Section II.

"CHINA.

"Article 128.

"Germany renounces in favour of China all benefits and privileges resulting from the provisions of the final Protocol signed at Peking on September 7, 1901, and from all annexes, notes and documents supplementary thereto. She likewise renounces in favour of China any claim to indemnities accruing thereunder subsequent to March 14, 1917.

"Article 129.

"From the coming into force of the present Treaty the High Contracting Parties shall apply, in so far as concerns them respectively:

"(1) The Arrangement of August 29, 1902, regarding the new Chinese customs tariff;

"(2) The Arrangement of September 27, 1905, regarding Whang-Poo, and the provisional suplementary Arrangement of April 4, 1912.

"China, however, will no longer be bound to grant to Germany the advantages or privileges which she allowed Germany under these Arrangements.

"Article 130.

"Subject to the provisions of Section VIII of this Part, Germany cedes to China all the buildings, wharves and pontoons, barracks, forts, arms and munitions of war, vessels of all kinds, wireless telegraphy installations and other public property belonging to the German Government, which are situated or may be in the German Concessions at Tientsin and Hankow or elsewhere in Chinese territory.

"It is understood, however, that premises used as diplomatic or consular residences or offices are not included in the above cession, and, furthermore, that no steps shall be taken by the Chinese Government to dispose of the German public and private property situated within the so-called Legation Quarter at Peking without the consent of the Diplomatic Representatives of the Powers which, on the coming into force of the present Treaty, remain Parties to the Final Protocol of September 7, 1901.

"Article 131.

"Germany undertakes to restore to China within twelve months from the coming into force of the present Treaty all the astronomical instruments which her troops in 1900–1901 carried away from China, and to defray all expenses which may be incurred in effecting such restoration, including the expenses of dismounting, packing, transporting, insurance and installation in Peking.

"Article 132.

"Germany agrees to the abrogation of the leases from the Chinese Government under which the German Concessions at Hankow and Tientsin are now held.

"China, restored to the full exercise of her sovereign rights in the above areas, declares her intention of opening them to international residence and trade. She further declares that the abrogation of the leases under which these concessions are now held shall not affect the property rights of nationals of Allied and Associated Powers who are holders of lots in these concessions.

"Article 133.

"Germany waives all claims against the Chinese Government or against any Allied or Associated Government arising out of the internment of German nationals in China and their repatriation. She equally renounces all claims arising out of the capture and condemnation of German ships in China, or the liquidation, sequestration or control of German properties, rights and interests in that country since August 14, 1917. This provision, however, shall not affect the rights of the parties interested in the proceeds of any such liquidation, which shall be governed by the provisions of Part X (Economic Clauses) of the present Treaty.

"Article 134.

"Germany renounces in favour of the Government of His Britannic Majesty the German State property in the British Concession at Shameen at Canton. She renounces in favour of the French and Chinese Governments conjointly the property of the German school situated in the French Concession at Shanghai.

"Section III.

"SIAM.

"Article 135.

"Germany recognises that all treaties, conventions and agreements between her and Siam, and all rights, title and privileges derived therefrom, including all rights of extraterritorial jurisdiction, terminated as from July 22, 1917.

"Article 136.

"All goods and property in Siam belonging to the German Empire or to any German State, with the exception of premises used as diplomatic or consular residences or offices, pass ipso facto and without compensation to the Siamese Government.

"The goods, property and private rights of German nationals in Siam shall be dealt with in accordance with the provisions of Part X (Economic Clauses) of the present Treaty.

"Article 137.

"Germany waives all claims against the Siamese Government on behalf of herself or her nationals arising out of the seizure or condemnation of German ships, the liquidation of German property, or the internment of German nationals in Siam. This provision shall not affect the rights of the parties interested in the proceeds of any such liquidation, which shall be governed by the provisions of Part X (Economic Clauses) of the present Treaty.

"Section IV.

"LIBERIA.

"Article 138.

"Germany renounces all rights and privileges arising from the arrangements of 1911 and 1912 regarding Liberia, and particularly the right to nominate a German Receiver of Customs in Liberia.

"She further renounces all claim to participate in any measures whatsoever which may be adopted for the rehabilitation of Liberia.

"Article 139.

"Germany recognizes that all treaties and arrangements between her and Liberia terminated as from August 4, 1917.

"Article 140.

"The property, rights and interests of Germans in Liberia shall be dealt with in accordance with Part X (Economic Clauses) of the present Treaty.

"Section V.

"MOROCCO.

"Article 141.

"Germany renounces all rights, titles and privileges conferred on her by the General Act of Algeciras of April 7, 1906, and by the Franco-German Agreements of February 9, 1909, and November 4, 1911. All treaties, agreements, arrangements and contracts concluded by her with the Sherifian Empire are regarded as abrogated as from August 3, 1914.

"In no case can Germany take advantage of these instruments and she undertakes not to intervene in any way in negotiations relating to Morocco which may take place between France and the other Powers.

"Article 142.

"Germany having recognized the French Protectorate in Morocco, hereby accepts all the consequences of its establishment, and she renounces the régime of the capitulations therein.

"This renunciation shall take effect as from August 3, 1914.

"Article 143.

"The Sherifian Government shall have complete liberty of action in regulating the status of German nationals in Morocco and the conditions in which they may establish themselves there.

"German protected persons, semsars and 'associés agricoles' shall be considered as having ceased, as from August 3, 1914, to enjoy the privileges attached to their status and shall be subject to the ordinary law.

"Article 144.

"All property and possessions in the Sherifian Empire of the German Empire and the German States pass to the Maghzen without payment.

"For this purpose, the property and possessions of the German Empire and States shall be deemed to include all the property of the Crown, the Empire or the States, and the private property of the former German Emperor and other Royal personages.

"All movable and immovable property in the Sherifian Empire belonging to German nationals shall be dealt with in accordance with Sections III and IV of Part X (Economic Clauses) of the present Treaty.

"Mining rights which may be recognised as belonging to German nationals by the Court of Arbitration set up under the Moroccan Mining Regulations shall form the subject of a valuation, which the arbitrators shall be requested to make, and these rights shall then be treated in the same way as property in Morocco belonging to German nationals.

"Article 145.

"The German Government shall ensure the transfer to a person nominated by the French Government of the shares representing Germany's portion of the capital of the State Bank of Morocco. The value of these shares, as assessed by the Reparation Commission, shall be paid to the Reparation Commission for the credit of Germany on account of the sums due for reparation. The German Government shall be responsible for indemnifying its nationals so dispossessed.

"This transfer will take place without prejudice to the repayment of debts which German nationals may have contracted towards the State Bank of Morocco.

"Article 146.

"Moroccan goods entering Germany shall enjoy the treatment accorded to French goods.

"Section VI.

"EGYPT.

"Article 147.

"Germany declares that she recognises the Protectorate proclaimed over Egypt by Great Britain on December 18, 1914, and that she renounces the régime of the Capitulations in Egypt.

"This renunciation shall take effect as from August 4, 1914.

"Article 148.

"All treaties, agreements, arrangements and contracts concluded by Germany with Egypt are regarded as abrogated as from August 4, 1914.

"In no case can Germany avail herself of these instruments and she undertakes not to intervene in any way in negotiations relating to Egypt, which may take place between Great Britain and the other Powers.

"Article 149.

"Until an Egyptian law of judicial organization establishing courts with universal jurisdiction comes into force, provision shall be made, by means of decrees issued by His Highness the Sultan, for the exercise of jurisdiction over German nationals and property by the British Consular Tribunals.

"Article 150.

"The Egyptian Government shall have complete liberty of action in regulating the status of German nationals and the conditions under which they may establish themselves in Egypt.

"Article 151.

"Germany consents to the abrogation of the decree issued by His Highness the Khedive on November 28, 1904, relating to the Commission of the Egyptian Public Debt, or to such changes as the Egyptian Government may think it desirable to make therein.

"Article 152.

"Germany consents, in so far as she is concerned, to the transfer to His Britannic Majesty's Government of the powers conferred on His Imperial Majesty the Sultan by the Convention signed at Constantinople on October 29, 1888, relating to the free navigation of the Suez Canal.

"She renounces all participation in the Sanitary, Maritime, and Quarantine Board of Egypt and consents, in so far as she is concerned, to the transfer to the Egyptian Authorities of the powers of that Board.

"Article 153.

"All property and possessions in Egypt of the German Empire and the German States pass to the Egyptian Government without payment.

"For this purpose, the property and possessions of the German Empire and States shall be deemed to include all the property of the Crown, the Empire or the States, and the private property of the former German Emperor and other Royal personages.

"All movable and immovable property in Egypt belonging to German nationals shall be dealt with in accordance with Sections III and IV of Part X (Economic Clauses) of the present Treaty.

"Article 154.

"Egyptian goods entering Germany shall enjoy the treatment accorded to British goods.

"Section VII.

"TURKEY AND BULGARIA.

"Article 155.

"Germany undertakes to recognise and accept all arrangements which the Allied and Associated Powers may make with Turkey and Bulgaria with reference to any rights, interests and privileges whatever which might be claimed by Germany or her nationals in Turkey and Bulgaria and which are not dealt with in the provisions of the present Treaty."

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the Secretary in the reading of the treaty has reached section 8, which relates to Shantung. The Committee on Foreign Relations has reported an amendment to that section, and there will be a number of speeches made on the amendment. As the hour is late, I now ask that the reading be discontinued, and I move as in legislative session that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate, as in legislative session, adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, October 8, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, October 7, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We approach Thee, our Father in heaven, because we believe in Thee and know that those who seek Thee in faith and confidence are not turned away empty.

If it is wisdom sought, Thou dost give it; if it is strength to meet the temptations and responsibilities of life, Thou dost impart it; if it is a sorrowing heart, Thy loving arms are round about us.

Impart unto us the needs of the day, that at its close we shall have merited Thine approbation; and glory, and honor, and praise be Thine, in Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. ACKERMAN (at the request of Mr. BROWNING), for 30 days, on account of important business in Europe.

To Mr. O'CONNOR (at the request of Mr. DUPRÉ), for 10 days, on account of important business.

To Mr. LARSEN (at the request of Mr. CRISP), for two weeks, on account of important business.

To Mr. BRAND (at the request of Mr. CRISP), for 10 days, on account of sickness in family.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Speaker, in connection with the leave of absence that was granted to my colleague, Mr. O'CONNOR, I desire to state, for his protection as well as my own, that the request was left at the desk on yesterday. I understand why it could not be presented on yesterday, but I want to make this statement to carry out the facts.

LIST OF PRESENTS TO THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the statement of the Secretary to the President in reply to the resolutions introduced by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RODENBERG] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. RAMSEYER].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter from the Secretary to the President. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The following is the statement:

STATEMENT BY MR. TUMULTY.

While on his western trip the President's attention was called to the resolution of Representative RODENBERG, of Illinois, and the statements of Senators PENROSE and SHERMAN in regard to gifts received by the President and Mrs. Wilson while they were in Europe.

Senator SHERMAN indicated the basis of the various stories touching this matter when he said that "cloakroom gossip lays the value of these gifts at half a million dollars." Senator PENROSE said he had been informed that the presidential party "brought back to this country presents from crowned heads and foreign Governments amounting to several million dollars."

Here are the facts:

Outside of a considerable number of small gifts, such as books, walking sticks, an old silver dish found in the ruins of Louvain, war souvenirs made by soldiers or out of war material, and numerous medals struck off in his honor, the following are the only important gifts received by the President in Europe:

In England:

Photograph of the King and Queen of England.

A book relating to Windsor Castle.

The freedom of the city of London, presented in a gold casket, by the lord mayor at Guild Hall.

In Italy:

A water color picture, on bronze easel, presented by the Queen of Italy.

A bronze figure presented at the capitol in Rome—a gift from the people.

A figure of "Italia Victoria," sent to the train at Genoa, either by a school or by the citizens of Genoa.

A set of books from the citizens of Genoa.

A mosaic, presented by the pope.

In France:

A bronze figure, presented by a body of students.

The President also received numerous honorary degrees from nearly all of the countries of Europe, and many resolutions of respect and gratitude.

Knowing that there is a constitutional inhibition against the President receiving gifts from foreign rulers or States, the President, after consulting the Secretary of State, was preparing a list of the presents he intended to ask the permission of Congress to retain just before he started on his western trip.

In addition to the gifts received by the President, the following tokens were presented to Mrs. Wilson while she was in Europe:

In France:

A pin of Parisian enamel with tiny diamond chips, presented in Hotel de Ville by the city of Paris.

Linen hand-embroidered lunch set (small cloth and dozen napkins) in a case, presented through Madame Poincare and Madame Pichon by the working women of France.

In Belgium:

A small medal, by Cardinal Mercier.

A Belgian lace table cover, presented by the Queen.

A complete file of the Libre Belgique, the paper published during the German occupation, presented by the King, in leather folder.

In Italy:

A reproduction of the "Wolf and Romulus and Remus," in gold, presented by the people through private subscription.

A piece of lace in leather case, presented by Signor Orlando in behalf of "his colleagues."

A small reproduction in silver of a pitcher found in the ruins of Pompeii.

In making this statement I am acting upon the express direction of the President and Mrs. Wilson.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bill:

H. R. 7417. An act to amend an act of Congress approved March 12, 1914, authorizing the President of the United States to locate, construct, and operate railroads in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes.

EXTENSION OF CREDITS.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, I ask to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 7478, and agree to the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] calls up the bill H. R. 7478, on the Speaker's table, with Senate amendments, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7478) to amend sections 5200 and 5202 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by acts of June 22, 1906, and September 24, 1918.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, I move to concur in the Senate amendments.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, what is this matter about?

Mr. WALSH. I think we ought to have the bill read with amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York will explain the amendments.

Mr. PLATT. I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that the only Senate amendment that is not merely verbal, or in the line of correction, is one to increase the security for loans. This is a bill which allows national banks to loan on readily marketable, nonperishable staples up to 25 per cent of their capital and surplus, and the only important Senate amendment is one increasing the security from 110 to 115 per cent, to which, I think, there should be no objection.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, when did it pass the House?

Mr. PLATT. It passed the House on July 31 and it passed the Senate on October 2.

Mr. CANNON. The bill is not here.

Mr. PLATT. It is on the Speaker's table. This bill is to amend section 5200 of the Revised Statutes, which restricts loans to one person, firm, or corporation to 10 per cent of a bank's capital and surplus. It is a bill chiefly of value just now in the marketing of the fall crops. It allows banks to loan up to 25 per cent of their capital and surplus to one person, firm, or corporation, on the security of readily marketable, nonperishable agricultural, or other staples secured by warehouse receipts or shipping documents. It does not really extend any privileges which the banks have not been using as a rule, but is passed to meet certain rulings of the Comptroller of the Currency. It was fully explained and debated when it passed the House. The Senate amendment increases the security, which is required, by 5 per cent.

Mr. CANNON. So far as I am concerned, I am trying to find out what it is. I have a dim recollection of it having passed the House. But I have listened to the gentleman's explanation, and I know more about it than I did. I could not get any information at the desk here.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It was debated here for a couple of days.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman's recollection is much better than mine. This happened in July.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves to concur in the Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were agreed to.

COMMUTATION OF QUARTERS FOR OFFICERS OF NAVY AT SEA.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. To submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Last night upon adjournment the question of the passage of a bill upon which I had moved to suspend the rules had reached the stage where the Speaker had put the question. I desire to inquire whether or not we had not reached the stage where it would be unfinished business for to-day?

The SPEAKER. Under the rules of the House that would not come up again until the next suspension day.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. May I just submit an observation or two, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I understand the rule to be when any of these special-day matters do not reach the voting stage and the previous question has been moved that in those cases they come up on the following day as unfinished business. But where the previous question has not been moved and further time of the House might be consumed they go over until the next special day.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. In just a moment. Now, the question we had up yesterday was brought up under suspension of the rules and was one of those questions where a second was demanded and 20 minutes on a side taken and the time entirely exhausted and the question actually put by the Speaker, and for all intents and purposes the previous question had been moved. Voting was the only thing in order at the time the adjournment was taken.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. You can not move the previous question.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. You can not move it, but the time was exhausted and nothing was in order but voting.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. In a moment. And not only that, but the procedure had gone further than if the previous question had been moved. The matter was fully disposed of. All time was exhausted. The Speaker had put the question. Therefore it was further advanced as a matter of legislative procedure than it would have been had the previous question been moved; so that every reason that exists for permitting a matter of this kind to come up as unfinished business on the next legislative day, when the previous question has been moved, exists in this case. I see no reason for a different rule where a second has been demanded than where the previous question has been ordered.

The SPEAKER. The difficulty is that the precedents of the House are well established, and it has long been determined that this can not come up until the next unanimous-consent day.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I would like to have the Speaker refer me to some case where a matter of this kind, under a suspension, and the time fully exhausted, and the Speaker has put the question, where it has been held that it can not come up on the following day. What would have been the sense or reason for such a rule?

Mr. WALSH. That is covered by section 6814 of Hinds' Precedents.

The SPEAKER. The Chair refers the gentleman to section 6814 of Hinds' Precedents, which exactly covers the case. The Chair does not feel like overruling an established precedent.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. My understanding is that in that case adjournment was taken before the 40 minutes had expired.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, some of the Members of Congress have complained about the high price of cotton; in fact, not long ago a bill was introduced in this House to fix the price of cotton at 20 cents a pound.

The trouble with a good many is that they fail to understand conditions outside of their districts. While it is true that we are here to represent our districts, we must not forget the fact that we are also here to represent the country as a whole.

When one section of the country prospers, the people of the entire country are benefited by it; and when one section fails, all of our people suffer from the effects of it. We know that the cotton crop last year was small. Last week the Department of Agriculture issued its last report on this year's crop, and the estimate is 10,696,000 bales, the shortest crop in the history of the country, if we take into consideration the acreage and population. This short crop was caused by bad weather, boll weevils, and shortage of labor.

Now, gentlemen of the House, I ask you to pause and think what this means to the cotton-producing section of the United States. All practical men who have had experience on the farm understand that the same work, the same expense for drainage, fertilizer, agricultural implements, seed, feed, and foodstuff are required to produce a small crop as is required to produce a large one. With these facts in mind, how can reasonable men outside of the cotton section claim that the price of cotton is too high? Not only that we of the cotton section are entitled to the present price but we are entitled to more in order to meet our expenses this year and start another crop next year. You gentlemen who represent northern and eastern constituencies, and who complain about the high price of cotton, leave your consumers under the impression that the producers of cotton are responsible for the price they pay for manufactured goods. If your people will take into consideration the price paid for the raw product and the price paid for the manufactured product, you will readily see that the gap between the two is entirely too wide and that some of the middlemen are making entirely too much out of it.

A good deal has been said on the floor of this House recently about the high cost of living, unrest, and strikes. Different remedies have been suggested for the relief of the people. Now, my friends, let us not deceive ourselves nor the people we represent here. Let us keep in mind the fact that after the profiteers will have been punished—and I am willing to go as far as anyone here in enacting a law that will not only fine them, but will give them jail sentences as well—we will still be face to face with the high cost of living.

Let us remember that before the war more than half of the people were living in the towns and cities, and that during the war many more from the farm went into the military service, which, of course, served to curtail production. It may be true that there was sufficient production in some places, but when we take into consideration that this is a world problem, because nations do business with one another, we must admit that there is a shortage. Now, gentlemen of the House, let us come together and see what the real remedy is.

Of course, we are enacting laws to punish the profiteers, to regulate the cold-storage business, and to prevent hoarding. But let us not forget that after all the main remedy is to get back to a peace basis as soon as possible, to go back to work and increase production and practice economy. Let us bear in mind, too, that it is not only a question of increasing production, but it is a question of transportation also. The Federal Government should cooperate with the States, so as to build a transportation system in this country that will keep up with the needs of the American people; so that the products of the farm, especially the perishable products, shall move as quickly as possible from the country to the city in order to supply all the people's needs. Goods, and not money, are the means of life. Better standards of living are impossible without increasing production. Man can not consume what has not been produced. High salaries and cheap money can not buy food or clothes when it has not been produced.

When I say a complete transportation system, I have in mind the good road from the farmers' farms to the railway station and to the waterway. I also have in mind the improvement of railway facilities and waterways. And, when we reach the seaboard, I have in mind an American merchant marine that will move our surplus products to the foreign markets of the world. Pause and think what it meant to the cotton section when war broke out and cotton dropped from 14 to 6 cents because we lacked ships to carry our surplus cotton to the markets of Europe. In other words, in peace time they carried our surplus cotton to their countries, but when war broke out they looked after their own business and left us to suffer the consequences. It is just as foolish for a great country with the resources that we have to do business without an American merchant marine as it is for a great big department store to attempt to do business and depend on its competitors to deliver its goods to its customers.

In connection with transportation, I want to say a few words relative to the unrest and threatened railroad strikes. Let us pause and picture the unemployment, the loss in money and goods, and the suffering among the people that would result if we have a railroad strike. If ever there was a time in the history of the country when our people should keep cool and work together for a satisfactory solution of these problems it is now. We went through one of the most horrible wars in the history of the world. Reduced to its last analysis it was a war between two systems of government—autocratic government and democratic government.

The United States was forced into this war and gave the blow that won the victory. When war was declared the President, as Commander in Chief, appealed to the people and the greatest army in the world responded to the call of duty. Young men responded from the farms, from the factories, from the mines, and from the business houses. They were trained, equipped, and went to the firing line and won the greatest victory in the history of the world. The people at home responded to every call of the Government so that those who were in the military service could be furnished with all they needed.

The victory is won. To-day we are going through the reconstruction period. Why should not our people remain united and respond as well during the reconstruction period as they did during the war? Why should we not be able to get together in a calm, cool, and deliberate way and settle our difficulties without strikes and bloodshed, when we know that these things only paralyze the wheels of industry and cause unhappiness and suffering? Let us hope that organized capital and organized labor, in considering their difficulties, will brush aside all selfish motives, prejudices, and hobbies and be guided solely by a sense of justice, and take into consideration not only the interests of organized capital and organized labor but also the interests of the millions of people in this country who are not organized.

The interests of organized capital and organized labor are bound up with the interests of the community as a whole. One of the outstanding facts which they should keep in mind is that the interests of all are bound together in the interests of the Nation. It is impossible to separate the interests of any class or of any association. Mutual consideration is not only the manifestation of a Christian spirit but good business. We must have capital, labor, and genius in order to develop the resources of a country and make it possible for all the people to find employment and be happy and prosperous.

The man who sows the seed of discord between capital and labor is an enemy of society and good government. [Applause.] The Bolsheviki who have come from other lands and who are spreading their propaganda with the view of overthrowing our Government by revolution will fail in the United States. Our country is no place for any man or set of men who advocate the overthrow of its Government by revolution.

Of course, our Government is not perfect, because it is made by human beings, but when changes are necessary for the good of all, it must be done in an orderly way under its Constitution. And here is where lies the strength of our representative democratic Government, because here every citizen is a sovereign, here the man of humble circumstances and the man of wealth meet at the ballot box on terms of equality and the voice of the one is as effective as the voice of the other.

The trouble with these agitators who are constantly preaching revolution is that they do not understand or appreciate our form of government. For more than 100 years it has stood every crisis, and it will continue to do so as long as every true American does his duty. The arm of the executive branch of the Government has been made strong enough to meet these attacks by prosecutions and deportations, but we must not forget that the greatest danger is not from those who attack us in the open, but from those who spread the poison of Bolshevism and anarchy under cover and who seek to capitalize all forms of discontent in order to accomplish their purpose.

Besides enacting laws to deal with this condition, we must also appeal to the schools of the land to teach the youth that human liberty can only be obtained and enjoyed through the means of established government. An understanding of the fundamental principles of our Government must be inculcated in the heart of every child until it becomes a part of his very soul, so as to make him strong and impervious to the influences of those who would destroy this great American Government. [Applause.]

Mr. SEARS rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Florida rise?

Mr. SEARS. To ask unanimous consent to address the House for not exceeding 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to address the House for not exceeding 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I regret to object, but we have had a good deal of discussion of late, and I think it is very important that we should get to the legislation before the House.

Mr. SEARS. Will the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. MONDELL. I have no doubt but that what the gentleman has to discuss is very important, but it is still more important that we should get to the discussion of the bill reported by the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. SEARS. Yesterday the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIEGEL] made certain remarks in which he referred to me. The bill we are now considering has been before the House for six days. I agree with the gentleman that you should speed up, but I would like to have a few moments. If the gentleman wants to object, that is his privilege.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Speaker, for four years and a half I have had the pleasure and privilege of serving in Congress with many of my colleagues who are here to-day. During those four years and a half I challenge any Member of Congress to point to one single instance where I have criticized the vote of another, or criticized his activities, either on or off the floor of the House of Representatives. I hesitate now to depart from that rule. Yesterday, after reading the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIEGEL], I called him up over the telephone and called his attention to the fact he had done me an injustice, and that he had not stated exactly the facts in the matter, and requested him to correct the RECORD in order that the reflection, which was not deserved, would not appear in the RECORD against myself. The gentleman from New York kindly stated that he had made all the corrections he desired to make, but that if there was anything in the RECORD to-day to which I would take offense, he would gladly correct the RECORD. I replied that the RECORD having gone out all over the country it would be immaterial to me whether he made the correction after to-day or not.

Mr. Speaker, on the 4th of October I propounded to you a parliamentary inquiry, to wit: If that motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] to strike from the RECORD the extension of the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIEGEL] had been disposed of, and if so, how? I neither indicated how I would vote nor what my attitude was on the matter. I simply say that during my term of office I have never made a motion to strike from the RECORD the remarks of any gentleman, nor have I objected to the extension of the remarks of any of my colleagues, either on the Republican side or on the Democratic side. Yet the gentleman from New York sees fit to severely criticize me and jokingly refers to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

Now, the facts are that on the 2d day of October the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] made the following motion:

> Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, in view of the consent that was granted, and in view of what appears to me to be a plain infraction of the rules of the House in making this extension, I move that the poem in the RECORD of October 1, entitled "Our Own—A Cry Across the Atlantic," * * * be stricken from the RECORD.

If the gentleman from New York had any quarrel, it was with the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts. But, in view of the remarks of the gentleman from New York yesterday, I doubt if he has any quarrel with the gentleman from Massachusetts, for he says, "I do not deny for a moment that he could have exercised his privilege to do so," and practically admitted that he had violated the confidence of this House in inserting the remarks in the RECORD which the House had not granted him permission to insert.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as I said, he only referred to the gentleman from Massachusetts in a jocular way; but in his remarks he referred to a speech I made about two years ago, quoting me, and I plead guilty to every word in that speech, wherein I endeavored to reduce the high cost of living. I made the remarks quoted by the gentleman from New York. I am glad it made such a deep impression on the mind of the gentleman from New York, and now that he is on the majority side I still insist and repeat I trust he will try to reduce the cost of living; and, Democrat that I am, I will gladly cooperate with anyone in an effort to reduce the cost of living. But he says for two years I have done nothing to reduce the cost of living, either by introducing bills or resolutions or in any other way. The introduction of resolutions, Mr. Speaker, is nothing but a species of demagogy. Anybody can introduce a bill. I was not on a committee having that matter in hand, and to introduce a bill would accomplish nothing. But the House will recall that on the freight and express rates increase I made an effort to prevent the increasing of freight and express rates, because that would increase the cost of living. On the increase of postage I offered the motion that kept drop letters at 2 cents instead of 3 cents, and on every proposition made either on the Republican or the Democratic side where I thought it would reduce the high cost of living I voted for every such amendment, notwithstanding the statement of the most learned and most distinguished, but not careful, gentleman from New York.

Mr. Speaker, further on the gentleman goes back and refers to a certain paragraph in my speech in which I referred to the gentleman from California and stated that he was leading the fight for Prussianism. His remarks as they appear in the RECORD are not exactly as he stated them on the floor of the House, but either intentionally or unintentionally in the next paragraph he says these people to whom he refers left 3,100 of their dead over in France, thereby trying to imply that I had reflected on the Irish people or those of the Jewish faith. I deny any such accusation made by the gentleman from New York, and if he has been on the floor of the House he will verify my statement, or even if he has stayed in New York most of the time; if he has read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, he will have to verify my statement. I refuse to believe that the Jews of the district that the gentleman from New York represents have so far forgotten the teachings of their fathers and mothers and their forefathers as to forsake or forswear their religion and now worship at the shrine of the gentleman from California. They certainly have not in my district. The gentleman from California is broad-minded enough never to have taken exception to my remarks, because they were made in the heat of debate.

I want to say further to the gentleman that I sent my speech all over my district. It was made an issue in the last campaign. It was one of the principal issues, and I only carried 16 counties out of 16.

Ah, the gentleman says it will not do for anyone to reflect on the Irish or the Jew, again referring, no doubt, to myself, because it is just following my remarks in reference to the gentleman from California. I state emphatically I have never reflected on, neither have I criticized, the Irish or the Jew, and I am glad to say they have always been loyal and true to me.

Now, I want to make three guesses, Mr. Speaker; first, that a good many Jews reside in the district of the gentleman from New York; second, that some Irish reside in the district of the gentleman from New York; third, although I had believed to the contrary, I am almost forced to believe that the gentleman from New York is French, and that a few Frenchmen live in New York, and he is simply appealing to get their votes if he should run for reelection.

Now, as I said before, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman has practically admitted that the gentleman from Massachusetts was correct.

It was a beautiful poem, and well written. The sentiments in the poem were beautifully expressed, and not by a single word did I intimate to the Speaker—and the RECORD will bear me out—whether I was for striking same from the RECORD or not; and that motion having been made by a Republican colleague of a Republican, I believed the motion should be disposed of, and simply asked the Speaker what disposition had been made of that motion.

Mr. Speaker, again I regret exceedingly to have been called upon to make these remarks, but I felt that if I sat idly by, after giving the gentleman from New York a chance to correct his remarks; if I did not make some answer to the same it would naturally go out and be construed as a confession that everything this most learned statesman had said was admitted by me to be true.

Again, in conclusion, I urge upon this gigantic mind, this peer of the delegation from New York, this man who would not appeal to any particular race for votes, this man who has neither Irish nor Jew in his district, that he devote more of his time to reducing the cost of living and giving some relief to the people of this great country, rather than to devote so much of his time in incorrectly referring to me. [Applause.]

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

Mr. FORDNEY. My good friend, I will let you get in under the five-minute rule. Members have severely criticized the Ways and Means Committee for allowing so much time for outside debate.

Mr. SIEGEL. I think I ought to have the time, in justice to myself.

Mr. FORDNEY. Can not the gentleman take it under the five-minute rule? I shall have to object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. FORDNEY. I am compelled to object.

Mr. SIEGEL. I make the point of no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York makes the point of order that no quorum is present. Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. FORDNEY. I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. On this call 260 Members have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 5218, the magnesite bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. ANDERSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill of which the Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5218) to provide revenue for the Government and to establish and maintain the production of magnesite ores and manufactures thereof in the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

1. Magnesite, commercial ore, either crushed or ground, three-fourths of a cent per pound.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, has the Clerk read paragraph 1?

The CHAIRMAN. He has.

Mr. FORDNEY. The Clerk must have an old bill, because he read "three-fourths of a cent."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk has not yet read the committee amendment.

Mr. FORDNEY. I move the adoption of the committee amendment, on line 9, substituting "one-half" for the words "three-fourths."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 9, strike out "three-fourths" and insert "one-half."

Mr. KITCHIN. I offer the following amendment to the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the word "one-half" and insert "one-eighth."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order for five minutes.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, unless the gentleman can confine himself to the subject matter of the bill I shall have to object. The gentleman has already consumed 40 minutes.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, the question of "pound" is important in a bill or a line, and still more important on an occasion for a man to get an opportunity to answer the gentleman who proceeded him. So I intend to say a few words about what the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SEARS] had to say this morning. As long as the gentleman from Florida confined himself to giving us the accurate facts, it was of very little interest to me what he might say about me personally.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I submit that the gentleman from New York is not talking on the subject matter before the House, and I object.

Mr. SIEGEL. I presume the gentleman from Michigan does not wish to have the subject of "pound" discussed.

Mr. FORDNEY. I object, Mr. Chairman. The gentleman from New York has not acted fairly on this matter. I offered to let him in, but he called for a quorum.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the words of the gentleman be taken down, as to whether I have acted fairly or not to this House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. SIEGEL. It is very surprising to me to have the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] act in the manner he is acting. I refer to his stating to the House that I have not acted fairly with it this morning. The fair proposition would have been to permit me to follow the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SEARS] and dispose of the matter. Let me add that I have taken less time on the floor of this House than many men on both sides, and I have had only one extension in the RECORD——

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I insist that the gentleman is not talking to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan makes the point of order that the gentleman from New York is not discussing the amendment. The gentleman from New York will proceed in order.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, did not the gentleman from New York demand that the words of the gentleman from Michigan be taken down?

Mr. SIEGEL. Oh, I withdraw that request.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for five minutes out of order.

Mr. FORDNEY. I object. I will not permit it under the circumstances. If the gentleman will go on as I have requested him to do, I shall see to it that he gets the time, but I am not going to yield now.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York may proceed for five minutes.

Mr. FORDNEY. I object.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Chairman, there are some amendments in some of the bills brought to the attention of the House by gentlemen who are a little bit aged, who have been here a long time, and who at all times have been extremely friendly, agreeable, and genial, but who occasionally do get upset because they can not have their own way. I think I have acted——

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will wait, I will let him have his five minutes, but I will not agree to it now.

Mr. SIEGEL. Let me say to the gentleman right now that I have a very important appointment at the State Department.

Mr. FORDNEY. Why did not the gentleman think of that before he made the point of no quorum?

Mr. SIEGEL. For the reason that I still believe that I had a perfect right to reply to the gentleman from Florida immediately after he vacated the floor.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WINGO. Is this a part of a public proceeding, or is it a private conversation that is going on?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will have to put his inquiry to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIEGEL].

Mr. FORDNEY. I say to the gentleman that I am objecting to the gentleman from New York proceeding, except to discuss the amendment before the House.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman is getting into a humor where he really believes that this bill may be passed more quickly by my discussing the amendments, I will discuss them. I will say to the gentleman that I think that no part of this bill should have been introduced or presented to the House at the present time, because the other body having jurisdiction will probably not take it up.

Mr. FORDNEY. Let me say, Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan must not interrupt the gentleman from New York without his permission.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIEGEL. Yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. I would say to the gentleman that I shall be more fair than he has been, and will permit him to proceed now, if he will not carry on this performance again.

Mr. SIEGEL. I say to the gentleman that I have always respected him for his age and ability.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIEGEL. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. As I understand it, after the conclusion of the magnesite tariff bill, now under consideration, the gentleman from Michigan proposes to take up the repeal of the Canadian reciprocity?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. Why not let this gentleman and other gentlemen who desire to talk wait until that comes up?

Mr. FORDNEY. I am going to ask unanimous consent that the gentleman proceed now out of order.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Chairman, let me say at the outset to the House that I have always tried to be fair and square with every Member. This is the first point of no quorum that has ever been made by me in the four or five years that I have been on the floor of this House. No man here or in any other place can say that I have not been as fair and square as every other man.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the five minutes be counted from the time when the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] said that he would ask that I have five minutes.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I request that the gentleman have five minutes out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York may proceed for five minutes out of order. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SEARS] undoubtedly has a very good memory. Memory, as I understand it, requires three things—the acquisition of knowledge, the retention of it, and the recollection of it—I am sure that if he will recollect what occurred yesterday he will immediately realize that he was mistaken, and very much mistaken, in what he told the House a few moments ago as to the occurrence of yesterday. The gentleman from Florida came to me while I was sitting over on the Republican side of the aisle and asked me whether I had any objection to his getting the reporter's transcript when it was returned to our friend here, Jake. The gentleman from Florida got the transcript and kept it for a couple of hours and around 4 o'clock I received it back from Jake. I revised it right here and made practically no changes at all. I discussed the matter from a jocular standpoint. The gentleman from Florida called me up on the telephone about half past 5 or a quarter to 6 o'clock, at my office, and he said, "Do you realize that you have treated Mr. WALSH, a Republican, in a very gentlemanlike manner, but that you have sailed into me, a Democrat?" I said that the question of Democrats or Republicans had not entered my mind when I was discussing the matter, but I am more generous than the gentleman from Florida is or ever has been. I want to remind him that in April last his Key West project was up on the floor of the House. The chairman of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] was opposed to it. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. SEARS] came over on April 16, 1918, and appealed to me and the other New York City Members to stand by him and put it through for him.

We told him we considered the project a fair one. Thirteen Members of the House from the city of New York here voted for the Key West project, regardless of party. With those 13 votes against it the project would have been badly beaten. With those 13 Members voting for it, there were 151 yeas and 133 nays. Now, the gentleman referred to the proposition of reducing the high cost of living. I quoted part of his speech two and one-half years ago on the floor of the House. I have introduced a bill or two in the House which have attracted considerable attention. Members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce have been flooded with mail in reference to it. One gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WINSLOW] has had to employ two stenographers for the purpose of answering correspondence in regard to it. Now, the gentleman from Florida must have been worried very much about the ability of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] to take care of the motion to strike out the poem from the RECORD, because on Saturday, probably for the purpose of assisting the gentleman from the State of Massachusetts in this most gigantic legislative act to be performed, he rose and made inquiry. I am quite sure the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] was capable of making the motion, for we all know his ability and capacity. The gentleman from Massachusetts had followed the usual procedure. Yesterday I referred to his western trip and his coming back full of humor and wit and geniality. I said perhaps during the night of Wednesday, September 30, he had not slept well, and when he woke up in the morning he found the RECORD containing this poem. The gentleman from Florida should realize that in public life one should have the skin of a rhinoceros, for if one is thin skinned he does not belong in the House of Representatives. Members are going to be criticized for what they know is right and for what they know in their hearts and souls is best for the American people. The destructive critic can be found everywhere. As far as my congressional district is concerned, let me say to the gentleman I was nominated by both parties, and I have stood for the Government of the United States, without sectionalism, every time on the floor of the House and throughout the country. I do not know sectionalism when I cast my vote here. Many times I have voted for western projects when Members from the East, as a whole, have voted against them. Members from the far West will bear that out. I know only one country; I know the whole of this country—not one part of it, but the whole country. When our boys went to the other side and fought their way through the Argonne Forest they were not fighting for Florida, they were not fighting for New York, they were fighting for these United States. They gave their lives away for this country as a whole; they did not give them for a solitary State. They have, I hope, by their heroic deeds united our people and cemented their love for our institutions. I will say to the gentleman from Florida, when he considers in years to come his part of this whole transaction, that I hope that his conscience may be clear. I earnestly hope that what I said yesterday may be true. That by day he may repose very quietly and at night he may rest very peacefully, and where'er he may be, in any part of the country, whether in New York, Florida, or anywhere else, I am always glad to help him, and any project of his which is deserving will receive my vote upon its merits. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. BURROUGHS having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Dudley, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills and joint resolution of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 495. An act for the relief of Walston H. Brown, etc.;

S. 2300. An act for the relief of the estate of Henry A. V. Post; and

S. J. Res. 90. Joint resolution to readmit Frances Scoville-Mumm to the character and privileges of a citizen of the United States.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 9203) to punish the transportation of stolen motor vehicles in interstate or foreign commerce, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 425) entitled "An act to establish the Zion National Park, in the State of Utah," had asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SMOOT, Mr. FALL, and Mr. MYERS as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

DUTY ON MAGNESITE ORE.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

2. Magnesite, calcined, dead burned, and grain, 1¼ cents per pound.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out "1¼ cents" and insert "three-fourths of a cent."

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the amendment by striking out the words "three-fourths" and inserting "one-fourth."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KITCHIN: Page 1, line 11, strike out the words "three-fourths" and insert in lieu thereof "one-fourth."

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, magnesite embraced in paragraph 2, now under consideration, was on the free list under the McKinley Act, under the Dingley Act, under the Payne-Aldrich Act, and now under the Underwood Act. Three-fourths of a cent a pound provided for in the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan, or the committee amendment, means $15 a ton on magnesite. The normal prewar import price of magnesite was $10 a ton. The committee amendment imposed a tariff duty of $15 a ton, or an ad valorem rate of 150 per cent. It jumps from the free list under the McKinley Act, under the Dingley Act, under the Payne-Aldrich Act, under the Underwood Act to 150 per cent ad valorem based upon normal or prewar times price. I believe that this House will agree with me inside, though not by their vote, because the majority of the votes here are Republican, that this is an outrageously high tariff—150 per cent! I want to say it is absolutely prohibitive. I can not see, if you want to levy a tariff on the Republican theory of covering the difference in the cost at home and abroad, how any Republican can vote for this 150 per cent prohibitive rate. That rate more than pays for the whole labor cost. My amendment reduces the rate from the committee amendment from three-quarters of a cent to a quarter of a cent a pound. That one-quarter of a cent a pound will be $5 a ton. If we should get back to normal and normal prewar price, that will be 50 per cent ad valorem. While the one-fourth cent per pound, or 50 per cent ad valorem, is a very high tariff, I am offering this because it is so much better, it is so much less burden than the three-quarters of a cent, or 150 per cent ad valorem, provided for in the committee's amendment. Both Republicans and Democrats ought to vote for this amendment of one-fourth of a cent a pound, which is $5 a ton duty.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say to the committee that the rate of duty provided for, three-fourths of a cent per pound on dead-burned magnesite, does not compensate the difference in the cost between the price of dead-burned magnesite delivered at Atlantic coast ports and the price at which imported magnesite is sold for by the people who own the magnesite mines in Austria. The testimony before the committee is, Mr. Chairman, that the average cost of production of dead-burned magnesite at the mines in the States of Washington and California averages $25.13 per ton. The price to Atlantic coast ports is $16.07 per ton.

It makes a total cost, laid down at Atlantic and Gulf ports, of $41.20 a ton, whereas dead-burned magnesite imported from Austria, according to the statement of the gentlemen who claim to own the mines in Austria, has been sold in Philadelphia f. o. b. cars for less than $16 a ton. Therefore the rate of duty provided for by the committee, $15 a ton, is not sufficient to offset the difference between the cost of production in this country and the cost of production of magnesite produced in Austria, and no testimony has been presented to the committee on that subject except by the people who own the mines in Austria and want to bring in Austrian magnesite. The fight is absolutely between the people who own Austrian magnesite mines and the people who own the magnesite mines in this country. And my duty is, as I see it, to give adequate protection to American capital and American labor employed in the United States. I hope the amendment of the gentleman fails.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes semed to have it.

Mr. KITCHIN. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 30, noes 65.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the committee's amendment by inserting in lieu of the word "three-fourths" the word "one-half."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina offers an amendment to the committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, just one word.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will first report the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KITCHIN to the committee amendment: Strike out the word "three-fourths" and insert "one-half."

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, this rate which I have offered in this amendment is, in my judgment, much too high, but it is just 33⅓ per cent lower than the rate carried in the committee's amendment, and therefore just that much better than the committee's rate. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] said a moment ago that the evidence was that it cost $41.50 to put this magnesite from the northwest coast to the eastern coast, while the Austrian magnesite could be laid down on the east coast for $15.50 or $16. Why, there is no evidence of that. That $15.50 or $16 price testified to by witnesses was the price in 1914, before the war. Before the war the import price was $10, and ocean and rail freight and commissions made it $16. The fact is that the only evidence we had as to the probable price now was that it would cost $30 or more. The committee is assuming by its amendment that the cost conditions, the labor and transportation conditions, and all the abnormal conditions now existing in this country are going to remain forever, while the normal prewar conditions in Austria or other nations abroad are going to be at once restored. Of course, if that be true, the rate, from the Republican viewpoint, ought to be $15 a ton, or three-fourths of a cent per pound, as is provided in the committee's amendment.

Now, the normal price was $10 a ton—the import price. My amendment of one-half cent per pound makes it at normal prices 100 per cent ad valorem, when it had been on the free list for 25 or 30 years under both Democratic and Republican tariff acts. This amendment is entirely too high, but it is lower than the rate which the committee offer, and I am giving the Republicans a chance to vote to substitute this rate for the committee's prohibitive rates, even from the protective standpoint. The Government should not subsidize by a tariff any industry in this country that can not exist on a tariff of less than 100 per cent. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, this rate—three-fourths of a cent a pound, or $15 a ton—proposed by the committee is going to put upon the people of this country an additional cost of nearly $3,000,000 a year. It will prove in normal times, and even now, absolutely prohibitive. It equals at normal prewar prices a duty of 150 per cent ad valorem. I would not discredit American ingenuity; I would not discredit American management; I would not discredit the efficiency of American labor by asserting here, as the Republicans do, that to maintain an American industry requires a tariff of 150 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. KREIDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. KREIDER. In the estimated cost of delivering this product to Atlantic ports, of $41 and some cents, what portion of that is freight charges?

Mr. KITCHIN. I am coming to that. The freight charges in that "claimed" cost are $16.07. All admit that the freight on magnesite is going to be greatly reduced. And now they can ship it by way of the Panama Canal for $7, the war freight rate. This will be reduced. Before the war the freight by the Panama Canal was $4 a ton. It went up during the war to $7, and now it is believed that it will go back to $4. But there was evidence before our committee that the president and manager of the largest magnesite industry in this country, who filed a paper before the committee saying his company could produce 75 per cent of the magnesite used by the steel companies, said he could produce magnesite for between $10 and $12 a ton. The freight through the Panama Canal will be $4, and if this company can produce at from $10 to $12, the cost to deliver in the East will be $16—the cost of delivery to Pittsburgh and Philadelphia. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. KREIDER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized.

Mr. KREIDER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, it is not often that I oppose a tariff, but I am inclined to believe that the levying of almost a prohibitive duty on magnesite will be the same kind of an error that was made when the Underwood bill was passed and the tariff was increased on manganese ore. If I am correctly informed, the only place where they have magnesite is on the Pacific coast, and the reason I asked the gentleman from North Carolina what those freight charges were was to find out the cost of transportation.

Now, I believe that if you put too high a tariff on this ore it will entirely prohibit its importation. As I understand it, it is a very necessary ore, needed by all basic industries, such as in the manufacturing of steel, copper, and so forth, where it is used for the lining of the blast and other furnaces. I am reliably informed that at the present time the price of magnesite brick is $400 per thousand, and it has become quite a burden upon the users of the brick and certain other products to pay these exorbitant prices. I believe that if we laid a lower tariff and allowed our magnesite deposits to be developed, first, by sales near source of production it would not be long before the product could be sold in free and open competition with the product brought in from Austria or any other country. We want to develop this industry, but I do not believe that it is good business to shut out the Austrian product entirely. As I understand it, this product is an essential to many of our manufacturers and to many industries.

The tariff should be as low as we can make it, consistent with the development of our own resources. I am going to vote for the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], because I believe a duty of $10 per ton will be sufficient protection to permit the magnesite industry to be fully developed. [Applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. FORDNEY. I expected Democratic applause from that side to a speech of that kind from a Republican. Mr. Allen, who is vice president of the Refractories Co., whose people own the mines in Austria that our magnesite comes in competition with, testified here, on page 45 of the hearings of the Ways and Means Committee:

However, I can say that before the war we sold magnesite at $15.75 per ton f. o. b. cars Philadelphia, and we could have furnished with our capacity all the magnesite that was used in the United States.

From Austria, produced by Austrian labor.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KREIDER] says that it will work a hardship on the people who use magnesite brick. The steel men of Pennsylvania! Pennsylvania has become famous in the manufacture of steel because of the protection given to that industry by the Republican Party. Who will deny that? The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KREIDER] will not deny that. And yet if all this duty provided—three-fourths of a cent per pound—is added to the cost of production of steel in Pennsylvania, how much does it amount to, to your steel manufacturers? Three and three-fourths cents per ton. Oh, my dear friends, just a little more than a 3-cent postage stamp on a ton of steel if all this duty is added to the cost of production, which the gentleman says will be such a great burden on the steel manufacturers of Pennsylvania.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. In a moment. How much magnesite was produced in this country before the war? We must expect to see normal conditions returning to this country after the war has been settled, and the league of nations has been adopted, and the President gets well, and everything goes along smoothly once more. We must expect normal conditions once more when the Republican Party gets into power, and that will be but a short time. [Applause on the Republican side.] There was but 1 producer of magnesite in this country before the war, and now there are 65. Nine thousand tons of raw magnesite was produced in the country before the war, and in 1917, 316,000 tons were produced. Oh! Three and three-fourths cents per ton—a great burden to the steel manufacturer. You can not make me believe it, gentlemen.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means if the committee did not receive some protest from the steel manufacturers on the ground that the American magnesite was of an inferior quality to the Austrian magnesite, and that was the reason why they were opposing a prohibitive tariff, because they would like to have the privilege of using the Austrian magnesite?

Mr. FORDNEY. There was such a protest. But, my good friend, the steel companies—and I do not know how many were represented—sent a gentleman to me after the hearings, and he asked to withdraw their opposition, and said, "We want to take no part in this matter at all, because the cost in the production of steel in this country is so insignificant that it is inconsistent with the interests of the steel men of this country to protest," and they withdrew their protest, I say.

Another thing. It was stated by Mr. Allen and his associates who created this opposition among the steel manufacturers, so I am informed—by the way, Mr. Allen is a manufacturer of magnesite brick—some of them said that the brick made from American magnesite was not as good as if made from foreign magnesite, and yet they came back afterwards and withdrew their opposition, and said they did not know whether the brick they had referred to was made from American magnesite or from foreign magnesite; and again, they did not know whether it was the fault of the manufacturer or the fault of the material in the brick.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for another moment?

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield.

Mr. COOPER. I have received a great many letters from the steel manufacturers in my district, protesting against a prohibitive tariff upon magnesite on the ground that the American product was of an inferior quality to the Austrian magnesite, and they wanted to be permitted to use the Austrian magnesite.

Mr. FORDNEY. My friend, the Geological Survey, the Bureau of Mines, and the Tariff Commission report—and we have their reports in these hearings—that there is no magnesite in the world superior to that produced in the United States, and that is the best authority we have. [Applause on the Republican side.] There is none in the world so good as that in the United States.

Now, let me go a little further.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. FORDNEY. Let me go further. Mr. Allen states here that he has sold and delivered, f. o. b. cars at Philadelphia, foreign magnesite, Austrian magnesite, for $15.75 a ton. I assume this was before the war in Europe he made such sales.

The freight at the present rate, which the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] refers to, is 25 per cent higher than it was in prewar times, $16.07, or a total of $31.82 a ton, including the price referred to of sales at Philadelphia. Will any man here with any common knowledge of the cost of production in this country and abroad say that our production in this country is as cheap as that of Austria? Mr. Allen admitted that the wages paid by his firm in his magnesite mines in Austria, the highest wages to male labor were $1.10 a day, while the wages in the magnesite mines of this country are $4.50 on an average. Will any gentleman say that we can produce magnesite in this country as cheaply as Mr. Allen can produce it in Austria? If so, please furnish the evidence.

Mr. TREADWAY. Is it not rather significant that the opposition to this tariff rate, as reported by the Ways and Means Committee, comes from the strongly protective tariff sections, in view of the fact that the Austrian mine is owned by a Pittsburgh concern?

Mr. FORDNEY. Absolutely, a Pittsburgh concern, which sells to the Steel Co.; and I have it from pretty good authority that the only opposition presented by the steel men of Pennsylvania came through the request of Mr. Allen and his associates in the manufacture of magnesite brick.

Mr. TREADWAY. In other words, it is not opposition to Austrian importation, but it is a question whether people in Pittsburgh owning an Austrian product can sell it in this country cheaper than the people on the Pacific coast can produce it. Is not that the question?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; that is the question. Magnesite is produced in three of the States of the Union. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] says we can now bring it through the Panama Canal. I ask you, Is it practical to haul it from the mines in the northeastern part of the State of Washington to Spokane, transport by rail from 300 to 500 miles to the Pacific coast, then transfer the magnesite aboard ship, send it around the Horn or through the canal, unload it on the docks in an Atlantic seaport, and then ship it to the interior? Is that practical? Why, any practical man would never present such a fool proposition. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROSE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. ROSE. Will the adoption of the committee amendment make the importation of the Austrian product prohibitive?

Mr. FORDNEY. No, sir.

Mr. ROSE. Then I would like to know what would be the cost of a ton of Austrian magnesite as compared with a ton of magnesite produced in this country after the adoption of the committee amendment?

Mr. FORDNEY. My good friend, this is the situation: The cost of production now in this country and in Austria undoubtedly is greater than in normal prewar times. We hope to see the costs come down; how much no man can tell until the time comes. We do know that the freight rate is 25 per cent higher than it was in prewar times, because the administration has advanced freight rates all over the country 25 per cent. We do hope to see the cost of production come down in this country. We do know from the reports of the Bureau of Mines and the Geological Survey and the Tariff Commission that we have enough magnesite in sight to-day in this country to furnish us with all the magnesite we will use, if we use the maximum amount that has ever been used in any one year, for the next 25 or 30 years. I hope the gentleman's amendment will be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. HADLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I discussed this matter at length in the general debate and shall not take much time upon it now; but in view of the discussion upon the amendment, I wish to make three or four observations.

In the first place, the gentleman from Michigan has definitely and correctly stated that the average cost of laying down dead-burned magnesite produced on the Pacific coast is $41.20 at Atlantic ports. That includes an item of $16.07 freight. Twenty-five dollars and thirteen cents is the mine production cost without profit, so that the $41.20 at Atlantic ports is without profit.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HADLEY. I can not yield now. I will yield later, but I want to make this statement.

Mr. KREIDER. What is the cost of production in Austria?

Mr. HADLEY. The prewar cost of dead-burned magnesite in Austria, it is stated, averaged $16.15. Manifestly, if that cost of production should continue after the war the differential would be $25.05, and that would require a tariff rate of one cent and a quarter a pound, or $25 a ton on dead-burned magnesite. The committee did not reach the conclusion that the Austrian cost and the transportation cost would remain upon a basis that would justify the conclusion that that differential would continue. The committee will note the wide discrepancy between $25 and the $15 rate which the committee has reported here.

There was some testimony at the hearing that the labor cost of production in Austria was very low, as low as 20 cents a day for women and 40 or 50 cents a day for men. Mr. Allen testified, as stated by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] that they paid an average in their mines of $1.10 a day. All right; we will assume that they did. To-day the cost of labor in the magnesite mines in this country is stated by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] to be on an average $4.50 a day. As a matter of fact, my information is that the lowest cost of such common labor is $4.50 a day. It was $4 during the war, and it is $4.50 to-day for shovelers now, and it ranges from that to $10 a day in the mines in this country. I wish to call the attention of the committee to an extract in the Commerce Reports on the subject of wages which I have received at my desk since I spoke in general debate. This is the issue of September 29, which has come to the desk, I suppose, of all Members. This is a statement as to the cost of production in two coal-mining districts in Poland. Referring to one district, page 1667 of the Commerce Reports, it says:

> Wages are low, and the average laborer's purchasing power is insufficient to meet these needs. Laborers on public works are getting 15 marks (about 75 cents at the present rate of exchange), but are now asking that the wage be raised to 22½ marks ($1.12) per day. A special commission is to investigate the needs of the district and to consider the increase in the workmen's wages.

I called up the Department of Commerce to ascertain if they had any statistical figures on wages in Austria since the war and they said they had not. This is a report of wages in Poland since the war. I submit that the wages in Austria could not be more favorable than they are in Poland. I think we need not debate that fact when the recent history of that war-stricken country is considered.

So we have in Poland under the existing rate of exchange a going rate of wages, in that neighboring country of Poland, of 75 cents at the present rate of exchange, and they are seeking to have it raised to $1.12, 2 cents higher than it was before the war in Austria, according to the statement of Mr. Allen.

Of course, the prevailing war freight rate was high from the Pacific to the Atlantic ports, but the trans-Atlantic rate was high, and these figures and deductions are made on the rates relatively high both across the Atlantic and across the country here.

The fact is that the committee's deduction of $15 a ton, when you take into consideration that profit is included in the $16.50 Austrian cost on the product laid down at the Atlantic ports, is barely adequate to cover the differential on recent quotations.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. HADLEY. I ask for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HADLEY. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to intrude on the time other gentlemen wish to take, but I want the gentlemen to bear in mind that this is a key, a basic industry underlying the production of steel. It did not exist to any appreciable extent before the war because it had not been developed. It has developed during the war that we have a self-sustaining industry in this country if adequately protected. Prior to the war we absolutely depended on Austria for the commodity. We ought not to strike down this industry and be again dependent on Austria when I have shown that the wages in the neighboring country of Poland are such that this industry can not compete with similar wages which undoubtedly prevail in Austria. If these rates of wages obtain in Austria, under the rate specified in the bill we can not compete, and much less under the rate proposed by the gentleman from North Carolina. I hope that the amendment will fail and that the committee amendment will be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed time to answer a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Can the gentleman give any idea as to how much the output per miner is per day in tons?

Mr. HADLEY. We have no definite information on that subject.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. There ought to be some information.

Mr. HADLEY. It may be that there is, but I do not know.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Is it as much as a ton a day?

Mr. HADLEY. I regret to say that I have no personal knowledge on that matter. I never saw it mined. It does not exist in my district, although it does in my State.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Could a miner mine as much as a ton a day?

Mr. HADLEY. I am not an expert on the subject, and I am not qualified to testify on the production per man.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I will not use the five minutes. I am a Republican. I believe in the protective policy of the Republican Party, but not in spots. This is a little spotty as it strikes me, and I have listened carefully to all the debate. I suppose I have spent weeks in defending out in Illinois in my district and in the State, sometimes moving over into Indiana, and yelling to maintain a duty of $28 a ton on steel rails when they were selling from $100 to $150. Now the steel industry in the United States is immense, one company alone putting out a greater product, or did before the war, than all Germany. It was established under a protective policy. The steel industry is the greatest industry in the United States. Before the war prices were reduced. They did not get $120 and $130 for steel rails.

The evidence seems to be—I have not read the hearings—but it is not disputed that by the report, by a majority of the Democratic Tariff Board, and by the Bureau of Standards, that magnesite of this country is of good quality, as good as any magnesite in the world. When the war came we had to have magnesite, and it was developed that we had it in sufficient quantities in the United States, the flag of which, thank God, protects all the United States. Yet our good Democratic friends, many of them—yes, all of them—my personal friends, want to sell in the dearest and buy in the cheapest markets, when development under the protective policy of the Republican Party, the South has increased many times the production of its principal crop—cotton—and many times its price, and to-day is manufacturing in the South more of its cotton crop than is manufactured in the Northern States, and, strange to say, is still worshiping the ghost of free trade.

Mr. GARLAND, Mr. FOCHT, and other gentlemen rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest that debate is exhausted on this amendment.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. There is but one word in the amendment.

Mr. GARLAND. Then I move to strike out the section.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, as there have been several speeches made on that side, I would like to have five minutes in support of the amendment.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KITCHIN. How does it occur that debate is exhausted on this amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] offered the amendment and discussed it. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] rose in opposition to the amendment, and the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HADLEY] moved to strike out the last word, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] was recognized in opposition to that motion.

Mr. KITCHIN. Then the Chair is holding us down to a strict construction of the rule that we can have five minutes for and five minutes against?

The CHAIRMAN. That is the rule.

Mr. KITCHIN. That is true; but this is the first time I have ever known it to be invoked when there is a bona fide discussion going on.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina will bear in mind that with amendments usually there are four or five words, but in this case there is but one.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, as several gentlemen wish to be heard further, I ask unanimous consent that debate upon this amendment close in 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that all debate upon the pending amendment close in 30 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Chairman, I am in exactly the same position with reference to the protective tariff as is the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. Protection to American labor is what we mean by the protective tariff. During the war it was discovered that a great many, about 30, different minerals, I believe, were shipped into this country from foreign countries, and that a great many of the States in the Union contained the ores out of which those minerals could be developed. The War Materials Board and the departments came before the Committee on Mines and Mining and asked for a bill that would appropriate $50,000,000 for the purpose of developing these ores that we must have and that we could not get because of the war and a lack of shipping facilities. Finally in the course of time the Congress did pass a bill appropriating $8,500,000 for the purpose of paying those who had laid out money in the development of these materials during the war, and a board was appointed for the purpose of allotting that sum, and they are still at the work.

Among the ores to which I refer was magnesite. As I understand it, we have magnesite in this country, and there has been in the neighborhood of $300,000 invested in the development of mines. They are getting good magnesite ore. The only opposition to the bill comes from or through an American firm whose interests are over in Austria, which firm about 10 or 12 years ago went over there and purchased mines, put up a large burning or drying plant, and hired Austrian labor to do the work. At that time—and I get this from one of the members of the firm who went over there each year—they hired a great many women for about 40 cents a day, children for less, and the miner got 80 cents a day, and the burner or furnace men got 80 cents a day. There may have been a few positions that paid more than that, but that was the general run of wages at that time. I understand that there has been some advance since. Whether Mr. Allen meant that the average wage was $1.10 to the men or that that average included all of the workers, I do not know.

Mr. FORDNEY. That was the wage paid to male labor, and he said that from 40 to 50 cents was paid for female labor.

Mr. GARLAND. Anyway, there is a material that is coming into this country without practically any tariff rate upon it. The Democrats have always claimed that they were for a tariff that would equalize the cost of labor between a foreign country and this country.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Oh, no!

Mr. JONES of Pennsylvania. They have been for a tariff for revenue purposes.

Mr. GARLAND. Well, that is what they said, many of them, on the outside—that they believed that that was good policy; but, as a matter of fact, here is a bill with proper amendments by the committee that does not do any more than take care of the difference in the cost of labor abroad and at home.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. GARLAND. I would like to have about one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. The time was limited by the committee to 30 minutes, and the Chair does not feel that it is in order to submit a request for an extension.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I am entitled to five minutes, and I would gladly yield one minute of that time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Chairman, that would be sufficient. All I want to do is to say this in closing, that here is a situation where American labor must be protected, and it is the difference between what is paid labor in that country and in this country and nothing else. If we are in earnest in trying to protect the American wage earner, this is the time for us to do it.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the question I asked a moment ago illustrates how utterly indifferent the labor problem is to gentlemen on the other side. They say this tariff is imposed to offset the difference in the cost of labor in production of this material abroad and in this country. I asked the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HADLEY] how much of this ore—in tons—can one miner produce in one day. He said he did not know, and that the committee had heard no evidence on that question.

The whole burden of the Republican song is that they want this tariff to protect American labor against cheap Austrian labor.

And yet we have not got a scintilla of evidence to show what the amount of the cost in this country of this material is labor. We do not know what is the labor cost of mining a ton of magnesite. Now, my judgment is that hardly any mineral that is mined requires much over a day's labor to mine a ton of it. Without knowing, and nobody else seems to know any more than I do as to what the cost of labor is that is involved in the mining of a ton of this ore, yet I would be willing to bet that a ton of ore does not cost in labor $15 to mine it in this country, and the tariff you put upon it is enough to pay over three full days' wages even at the price you say the mine owner pays.

Mr. GARLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I do.

Mr. GARLAND. The mining is not the only process this goes through.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Do not you say that you base this tariff on the difference in the cost of this ore at the mine in Austria and here?

Mr. GARLAND. Oh, no; in this country.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. The gentleman from Michigan made a statement of what it cost at the mine.

Mr. FORDNEY. Dead-burned magnesite at the mine.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. And it takes 2 pounds of the raw crude ore to make 1 of dead burned?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Now, if a man will mine 1 ton of crude ore per day, and it takes 2 tons of crude ore to make a ton of dead burned, that is two days' labor to produce a dead-burned ton of magnesite in this country at the mine, and for that labor you will pay on your own testimony $9, while you make the duty $15 per ton.

Mr. FORDNEY. Has the gentleman any evidence what a ton of magnesite here can be mined for by the miner in a day? If so, where does the gentleman get it?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Certainly, I have not, because the gentlemen who are favoring this tariff professedly to protect labor told me they did not know how much labor there was in producing a ton of ore.

Mr. FORDNEY. There is no evidence presented.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. And if the gentleman was seeking to protect labor the first thing he would have done would be to inquire how much labor it required to mine a ton of this ore.

Mr. FORDNEY. On page 27 the gentleman will find the cost at the mine, but the labor is not segregated from the other costs.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. That is absolutely true, and demonstrates that you are protecting the profits of the mine owner and not labor. I asked the gentleman from Washington how much it cost in labor and he said nobody knew. No evidence was taken. You are very anxious about the laboring man, but you did not inquire——

Mr. HADLEY. The gentleman is mistaken if he asked me as to how much is labor. He asked how much one man could produce a day and the labor cost, and the statements varied, varied from 65 to 75 per cent as being the labor cost.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I asked the gentleman this question: How much, in tons, can one man mine per day? And the gentleman said there was no evidence. That would determine how much labor there was in a ton of ore; and if we had the labor cost in mining a ton of ore here and in Austria we could tell what the difference is and so tell what tariff would surely protect American labor.

Mr. GARLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. GARLAND. Does it make any difference what the labor cost is per ton when you have two people working together, one getting 80 cents and the other $5 a day?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. It makes this difference: If there is only $4.50 of labor in a ton of ore, and the tariff is made $15 per ton, then at least $11.50 of your tariff is protection of the profits of the mine owner, and that is how it is. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GARLAND. Is not the ratio between 80 cents and $5 sufficient to warrant that?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. When you get a tariff that covers all the labor cost of the production of an article in this country you can not claim any higher tax for protection to labor. Even Republicans ought to see that a tariff higher than the whole labor cost here is not for the benefit of labor, but of the tariff baron, who levies his tribute upon the masses of the people.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, there is only one feature of this matter I want to discuss, and that was raised by the speech of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KREIDER]. The gentleman, from one of the most highly protected districts in this country, stated it would cost a tremendous sum of money to the consumers of this dead-burned magnesite if the rates of duty provided by this bill should be maintained. Now, let us see just what amount that represents. The difference between the committee bill and the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], which the gentleman from Pennsylvania supports, is one-quarter of a cent a pound. Now the fact is that it takes about 5 pounds of this material to make a ton of steel. What is the duty upon these 5 pounds at the rate of one-quarter of a cent a pound? It is 1¼ cents a pound. Take a ton of steel rails, which in ordinary times used to sell at $28 a ton. What is the additional cost by reason of this duty? One and a quarter cents, which would be about four one-hundredths of 1 per cent. Now, it is utterly absurd for any gentleman to come into this House and talk about the cost to the consumer in a matter of this sort. The difference between what the committee proposes and what the gentleman from North Carolina proposes is one-quarter of a cent a pound. It illy becomes, in my opinion, a gentleman from the State of Pennsylvania to talk about the tremendous amount that it is going to cost the manufacturers of his State. It is utterly absurd and beneath the dignity of this House to debate it for one moment. [Applause.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, how much time is there remaining? We had 30 minutes, and how much time is now remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. There are 18 minutes remaining.

Mr. KITCHIN. Let me say to the gentleman from Michigan there are 18 minutes remaining. Let me have 10 and the gentleman have 8.

Mr. FORDNEY. I only have five minutes. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT] wants to divide time with me.

Mr. KITCHIN. Well, let the gentleman from Pennsylvania use three minutes.

Mr. FORDNEY. He wants five minutes.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, this bill has been characterized as piecemeal legislation. I agree with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] that if we are going to get broad and effective results in tariff legislation it must be done as a whole. That, I believe, is the theory of protectionists, and I am one. But, nevertheless, the bill is here in process of formation and for action. I have heard the observations made by the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN]. He dwelt largely upon the question of percentages; that 180 per cent is too much and 150 per cent is too much; but, my friends, to me it is not a question of percentage at all, nor can it be to any person who is a protectionist and comprehends the force of the true theory. A protectionist is not one imbued with the idea of a tariff for revenue only; that we want it graduated and standardized, so that we may get as much goods in as we can in order to get the revenue, and which means desolation and ruin to American industry and labor. As to this question here, and on similar occasions, I know that sometimes Democrats laugh and smile about the tariff. They think it is a dead issue. In this they are mistaken and hug a delusion. It is the livest thing to-day, following this war. Let me call your attention, as has been done many times, to the steel-rail issue. There are none here so young but can recall how that industry grew up in Pennsylvania. They can remember when there was paid $125 for a ton of unpunched rails, rails with no rivet holes in them, sent here from Europe. And, coming from Pennsylvania, I think I can not say too much in credit of that State, for from there has radiated all this prosperity throughout the Nation, all based upon the protective tariff. We had the issue of tin plate, but as to this what was the result?

The minute we put the tariff on it American industry and ingenuity mined the Black Hills, and we made all the tin used in America and can make sufficient to supply the markets of the world. It is not a question of percentage; it is not a question of 120 or 150 per cent. It is a question of protecting this infant industry, and I do not care if it is 10,000 per cent. If you have this magnesite in these hills of the Western States and other States, and a protective tariff mountain high will develop it, that is what I am for, and which everybody else in America ought to be for. [Applause on the Republican side.] And in this we do for industry and labor that thing which our boys did for our honor and safety when they went across the sea to fight for American homes and firesides. When we pass a bill like this, protecting an infant industry, what do we do? We make this particular industry absolutely secure and independent from the aggression and machinations of foreign profiteers who would first destroy our industries then fix their own price and leave us helpless.

Several years ago there was before Congress the question of reciprocity with Canada, and the biggest farce and blow aimed at our agricultural industry ever pulled off on the American people. There was passed a reciprocity bill that did not mean reciprocity at all, and I am glad to have spoken and voted against it. There was a big "snake" in that bill, which was an amendment attached to it repealing the tariff on wood pulp. I myself bought many a quantity of paper for less than 2 cents a pound, and now pay 6 cents a pound to the monopoly in Canada following the closing down of American mills.

There is no puzzle, no mystery, no black art about the tariff. It is the simplest thing in all the world. It is a difference, as suggested here, between the cost of production abroad and home, and that other fundamental and underlying principle, that of protecting American industries so that they may develop and we may be safe and free from the merciless foreigner who knows no pity when we must buy from him what by sane and sensible protective tariffs we might produce in America. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] is recognized.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, let me say before I discuss the merits of the pending amendment one thing in reply to the gentleman who has just taken his seat. He said that it was the Republican tariff that had made the great iron and steel industry in Pennsylvania and other States, that has radiated prosperity out through the length and breadth of this country, and that it was the Republican tariff that had protected American labor. I admit that "Republican protection" has done a great deal for the iron and steel corporations of the country, and especially the United States Steel Corporation, but it has done very little for American labor in the iron and steel industry, and especially in the industry of the United States Steel Corporation. Let me remind the gentleman——

Mr. FOCHT. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. KITCHIN (continuing). That during the reign of "Republican protection" the poorest paid labor in any manufacturing industry in the United States was the labor in the iron and steel industry. That in this industry under Republican rule and Republican tariff, American labor—the red-blooded born and naturalized American employee—was forced into competition not abroad but here at home, at his very doorway, with the cheap, pauperized labor of every country on earth. [Applause. on the Democratic side.] The Republican Party put upon the high, dutiable list everything that the American laborer wore, everything that he ate, everything that he used, increasing thereby the price of every article of necessity, while it put upon and kept upon the free list every cheap, pauperized laborer of every nation in the world. [Applause on the Democratic side.] During its entire rule under high protective tariff the Republican Party and the protected manufacturers invited to these United States the pauper laborers from the four quarters of the globe to compete here with our honest, patriotic home laborer. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And they came; they were imported free and without restriction, and ran out of our markets, out of our manufacturing and mining plants, hundreds of thousands of red-blooded, honest, patriotic American laborers. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The United States Steel Corporation alone took into its employ over 200,000 of this foreign pauper labor, which the Republicans had "free listed," and now these Republican free-list foreign laborers are giving not only the Steel Corporation but the entire country much trouble.

I want to say that the Democratic Party under Woodrow Wilson was the first party, and the only party, that ever tried to protect American labor against the Republican free-list importation of the cheap pauper labor of all the world. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Ours is the only party that ever passed an immigration act that restricted the foreign pauperized labor from coming over here and competing with the real American labor. [Applause on Democratic side.]

Mr. FOCHT. I will ask you whether he is not the gentleman who vetoed the bill to prohibit this labor from coming in from foreign countries?

Mr. KITCHIN. The Democratic Party in the House and Senate was so strong in their position on the question, and the question was so strong, that we passed it over that veto and put it on the statute books, although your party, which had been in power for 40 years, had never dared to touch it. [Applause on Democratic side.] Why? Because the big iron and steel corporation and other big manufacturing corporations that wanted to employ this cheap foreign labor instead of American labor—to displace the American employee—opposed any restriction of immigration of foreign labor. [Applause on Democratic side.]

It remained for the Democratic Party in the House and the Democratic Party in the Senate to override the demands and the protests of the big tariff-fattened corporations, and pass a fair immigration act to protect American labor against this cheap, free-list pauper labor that had been, under the Republican control, flooding the American labor market for 40 years. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, to the pending amendments. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER] raised a very important question when he asked the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] if the American iron and steel companies were not protesting against the prohibitive rates in the bill and in the committee amendments. The United States Steel Corporation is not protesting, because it is able to pay to the magnesite producers here any tariff you put on. This does not hurt them. They can pay $15 or $25 a ton. But it is the little independent steel and iron companies throughout the United States that have to compete with the United States Steel Corporation which are protesting against this unjust, prohibitive tariff. The gentleman from Ohio asked if the American companies did not prefer to buy the Austrian product, because it was a better and more suitable product than the American product. The gentleman from Michigan said, "Oh, no; ours is better than any other on earth," and the Republicans applauded.

Gentlemen, here is the report on that question from the Tariff Commission. Listen now. Mr. COOPER is right. The independent iron and steel producers are willing to stand a protective tariff, and my amendment gives a high protective tariff, at least twice as high as it ought to be, but it is not prohibitive like that of the committee. They do not want a prohibitive tariff to prevent them from getting the material that is more adaptable and better suited to their business. Here is what the Tariff Commission says:

> On the other hand, there is a decided preference among the refractory users—

They are the concerns that make the brick from the magnesite and sell to the steel and iron companies; they are the direct consumers of magnesite—> for the magnesite that carries a certain percentage of iron, as does the Austrian magnesite.

Mr. COOPER, of Ohio, was right in asking the question; not that these steel companies want it free, not that they do not want a protective tariff, but they do not want a prohibitive tariff. They want to pay a reasonable tariff and get what they have proven by experience is a superior product. They know this rate is absolutely prohibitive, and the evidence before the committee shows that it is absolutely prohibitive and so intended.

Now, let me show you the hypocrisy that is always shown here in the debates on the tariff in the Republican cry that they are levying the tariff to protect American labor, to equalize the difference in the cost at home and abroad. Why, gentlemen, the rate proposed is $15 a ton. This rate not only pays the difference of cost between the Austrian labor and the American labor but it pays more than every cent these magnesite industries pay their labor here. Here is the evidence if you want it. Turn to pages 33 to 35 of the hearings. There you will find it. The total cost of this magnesite now, from the mouths of the magnesite producers, is there given.

This is what one company swears to: One company says it costs it $25.13 a ton to produce—total cost, labor, overhead charges, insurance, taxes, depreciation, amortization, and so on. They swear that 53 per cent of the total cost is for labor. Fifty-three per cent of the total cost is $13.75. That $13.75 is the total cost per ton which this company pays for all its labor. Yet this tariff that they propose is $15 a ton. That more than pays every cent of the labor cost here. Yet they say this rate is to equalize the difference between labor cost here and abroad!

The next company that exhibited its cost of production said it cost it $24.53 and that 53 per cent was labor cost. The total labor cost of that company is only $12.80. Yet this tariff is $15.

The next company, the biggest company, stated that the cost to produce a ton was $21.15. Fifty-three per cent of it is labor. Eleven dollars and twenty cents a ton is every dollar it pays labor for its production. And yet this tariff is $15, and that, they say, is to differentiate between the cost of labor abroad and the cost here. As a matter of fact, upon their own testimony this $15 tariff covers not only the difference between the cost abroad and here, but all the labor cost here, with a margin left of $3.80 per ton, enough itself to pay the difference between labor cost here and abroad.

Gentlemen, there never was a more hypocritical cry in this land—I hate to say it—than when you say this rate is levied to protect the labor in the magnesite industry. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, great applause on the Democratic side when they are advocating free trade! Always look for applause on that side when anything free is offered. [Laughter on the Republican side.] The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] has a conniption fit about doing something for American labor. Under existing law, the Underwood tariff law, which the gentleman from North Carolina helped to frame and voted for, 74 per cent of all the imports—$3,095,000,000 of imports last year—came in free. Free! Yes; free silver, free trade, free lunch, free souphouses, always! That is what gentlemen on the Democratic side of the House are in favor of. [Applause on the Republican side.]

What have they done for American labor? They have voted to rob American labor on every vote when a proposition is brought in here to increase a duty on imports. In every instance they have voted against American labor because free trade for the United States is always against American labor and in favor of foreign labor. Talk about the cost to the consumer! If all this duty that we are proposing in this bill, $15 a ton, is added to the cost of the producer of steel, for instance.

Take a mechanic, a carpenter who uses steel tools. It imposes on him an additional cost of 1 cent on 500 pounds of tool steel. Oh, what an awful burden upon the American people! I wonder that the House could stand any such burden—1 cent for 500 pounds of tool steel, more tool steel than is used by any mechanic in all his life. Oh, what an awful burden; nonsense. The men who are manufacturing magnesite brick are the only men protesting against this duty, they and the Democrats who protest against any rate of duty above free trade. The magnesite brick manufacturers, paying $40 a ton for their raw material, charge $450 a thousand for the bricks, and they have no competition. Mr. Allen admitted that the 10 per cent ad valorem in existing law had prohibited the importation of brick, and not one magnesite brick has been imported into this country in 20 years; yet they are protesting against the duty on the raw material. Here comes Mr. Allen, vice president of the Refractories Co., producing magnesite brick, asking for protection on his finished product and demanding free trade on his raw material, magnesite. Oh, how inconsistent! No matter what State he is from, no matter whether he is black or white or brown, no matter what his religion or politics may be, he ought to be laughed out of court.

Talk about the labor in the steel mills of this country, it is the highest-paid labor in America to-day. I defy any man to show in any other class of labor in this country the average of wages that is paid to the employees in the steel mills and mines of this country, unless it be on the railroads.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. FORDNEY. In just a moment I will yield. I made the statement on the floor of the House the other day that under Government control there were 170,000 more men employed on the railroads to-day than were employed when the Government took over the control of the railroads. The Director General of Railroads, Mr. Hines, came back quickly in a letter to me and said, "Mr. FORDNEY, you are greatly in error. We have only 140,000 more." One hundred and ninety million dollars a month is lost under Government tomfoolery in the handling of the railroads of this country since we took over the railroads as a war measure, and every man of common sense knows it was unnecessary to take over the management of the railroads; it was purely a political move by the President. The Government took over the steamboat lines, and there was a steamboat with officers at Baltimore. The Government took over their steamships and took the money in their treasury, some $650,000, and last winter tendered their ships back to the company without any money, and the Government had lost $100,000 a month on that steamship line while under Government control.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. What was the testimony as to the comparative value of the American magnesite product and the Austrian product in its use?

Mr. FORDNEY. All the testimony before the committee, except from the people who owned the magnesite mine in Austria, is that there is no better magnesite produced in the world than is produced in the United States.

Mr. BLANTON. Now will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. I am sorry I could not yield to the gentleman from Texas.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. I ask that the amendment be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] to the amendment of the committee.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. KITCHIN and Mr. BLANTON), there were—ayes 51, noes 79.

Accordingly the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. KITCHIN. I offer the following amendment.

Mr. FORDNEY. Let us have a vote on the committee amendment first.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will offer my amendment after the committee amendment is voted on.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KITCHIN. I move to add at the end of paragraph 2, line 11, after the word "pound" the following:

Provided, That the duties provided for in this paragraph shall not apply unless it be shown to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury that the industry producing magnesite described in this paragraph is paying for the labor in the production of such magnesite as much as $12.50 a ton.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I make a point of order against that amendment.

Mr. KITCHIN. I am going to call the gentleman's hand, to see whether you are really doing this for the benefit of labor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KITCHIN: Page 1, line 11, after the word "pound," insert: "Provided, That the duties provided for in this paragraph shall not apply unless it be shown to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury that the industry producing magnesite described in this paragraph is paying for the labor in the production of such magnesite as much as $12.50 per ton."

Mr. LONGWORTH. I make a point of order against that amendment that it is not germane to this paragraph and contrary to paragraph 3 of rule 21.

Mr. KITCHIN. Where is your authority in the rules?

Mr. LONGWORTH. There is nothing whatever in this bill which gives authority to the Secretary of the Treasury to determine that question.

Mr. KITCHIN. The Secretary of the Treasury has got absolute authority in making rules and regulations as to the entry and the import duties, and construing the law, and it is absolutely his duty to enforce any provision we put in.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I call attention to paragraph 3 of rule 21.

Mr. KITCHIN. Read it. There is nothing in it about this.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I call the attention of the Chair to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio will proceed.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, this introduces an entirely new element in this bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. I know it introduces a new element.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio has the floor.

Mr. LONGWORTH. It is not only not germane to the paragraph to which it is offered, but it is not germane to the bill itself.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield to have the amendment reported? There is some dispute about it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I submit to the Chair that that amendment is not germane to this bill in any respect. It gives the Secretary of the Treasury the authority to investigate and determine whether labor is being paid a certain price or not. The rule as to revenue bills is clear. It was first adopted by the party now in the minority, then in the majority, to prevent just this sort of thing—to prevent the introduction of new matter on revenue bills, entirely new questions not at all germane to the object of the bill.

It seems to me that the reading of the amendment makes it clear that an entirely new element is introduced into the whole question; that it is not germane to the bill, not germane to the paragraph to which it is offered, and clearly violates paragraph 3 of rule 21.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, if the Chair will read the rule, it seems as plain as language can make it:

No amendment shall be in order to any bill affecting the revenue which is not germane to the subject matter of the bill.

What is the subject matter of this bill? The levying of a duty upon the importation of magnesite. My amendment simply imposes a condition upon which that duty is to be levied. It relates to magnesite, it relates to the importation and duty on it, and to nothing else. It provides that it shall not bear that duty unless it be shown that the industry here seeking protection pays under $12.50 per ton to labor to produce it. The advocates of the bill claim that the duty of $15 a ton levied by the committee amendment is for the protection of the labor that produces magnesite.

It is conceded that it is in order for me to offer an amendment to strike out all of this paragraph, so that there would be no duty, or to change the rate of duty; but instead of doing this I qualify it by providing that this duty can be levied provided they show that the industry is paying $12.50 a ton for labor in its production. I permit by the amendment importations to come in at the committee's rate, with that qualification or upon that condition. This qualification relates to the "subject matter" of the bill and to "an item" of the bill.

Having the right to strike out all the paragraph or to change the rate and to provide that no duty shall be imposed on magnesite, by what process of reasoning can it be concluded that an amendment qualifying the importation or rate of duty is not in order? This amendment relates to the subject matter of the bill, and is germane to such subject matter, and is, therefore, under the letter and spirit of the rule, in order.

The other part of the rule is:

Nor shall any amendment to any item of such bill be in order which does not directly relate to the item to which the amendment is proposed.

The special items refer to "dead-burned magnesite." My amendment refers to the paragraph having in it this item, and relates to this item, and only to this item.

Mr. Chairman, in my judgment, and I believe in the judgment of the parliamentarians of this House on both sides, this is clearly germane. It may not be wise or expedient from a Republican standpoint. The question is not whether it is wise or expedient, but the question is, Is it germane? It is bound to be germane under the rule. It refers to magnesite, qualifies or imposes a condition upon levying of the duty upon the importation of magnesite. It refers to nothing else. The subject matter in the bill is the imposition of a duty on magnesite, and the only item this amendment refers to is "magnesite, dead burned or calcined." I know that the gentleman from Ohio does not want this House to vote squarely on the merits of my amendment, because he knows and every Republican knows that if Republicans of the House vote against it they will vote to repudiate everything they said in favor of protecting labor. A vote against it will prove conclusively that they do not favor protection for labor. They therefore, by making a point of order, wish to avoid a square vote on the merits of the amendment.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the point of order.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this bill is, as shown by the title thereof, "To provide revenue for the Government and to establish and maintain the production of magnesite ores and manufactures thereof in the United States." If the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina, contained in his motion to recommit, prevails, it should be entitled a bill not only to do this but to give the Secretary of the Treasury unheard-of powers, which have never been exercised before and which nobody ever thought of giving him. More than that, I doubt whether we could give him those powers constitutionally.

It would change this tariff bill to a bill that provided for the entry of these articles according to the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury. It would no longer be a tariff bill if this amendment is added to it. It changes the whole nature of the bill from a tariff bill to something that has no relation to the tariff whatever, except as it may incidentally affect the entry of goods into this country.

An amendment which engrafts these new powers, which gives this control to the Secretary of the Treasury of the whole subject matter, is entirely foreign to the purpose of a bill to raise revenue for the Government and determine the amount of tariff, and has no relation to the rates contained in the bill. In this case, if the amendment prevailed, the whole matter is left to the Secretary of the Treasury, and the purpose is entirely foreign to the original bill, clear away from the original subject, and has no relation to it whatever. Therefore the gentleman's motion to recommit is not germane either to the particular paragraph which he seeks to change or to the subject matter of the bill as a whole.

Mr. CRISP. If the Chair is ready to rule, I have no desire to address the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I do not think this point of order is well founded, and I am frank to say that I do not think I can add anything to the argument of the gentleman from North Carolina, for, in my judgment, he made the clearest, most logical, most unanswerable argument on a point of order that I have heard in this House in a long time. Whether the amendment is wise or unwise is no concern of the Chair, and I know that the present occupant recognizes that, for I know that no Member of the House is more anxious to follow the rules and precedents of the House than the present chairman.

When a bill is up for consideration the Committee of the Whole is not bound to accept the bill as reported by the committee having the matter in charge. This is a larger committee and has jurisdiction of the subject matter, except that it is limited by the rules of the House in its consideration. The rules of the House say that in revenue bills the amendment must be germane. That rule applies generally to every bill, but as to revenue bills there is a special rule, which is clause 3 of Rule XXI, which limits and narrows the general parliamentary law as to considering bills, and says that an amendment shall not be in order to a revenue bill unless it relates to some item in the bill.

What is the subject matter of this bill? The subject matter of the bill is to levy an import duty on magnesite. What is the item? The item levies an import duty of $15 a ton on magnesite. What does the amendment seek to do? The amendment seeks to engraft onto this bill levying a tax of $15 a ton on magnesite a provision that that duty shall not apply, shall not be collected unless the manufacturers of magnesite in this country pay their labor $12.50 per ton. The subject matter is magnesite, the item in the bill is levying a tariff of $15 a ton upon it, and this is an amendment dealing with the subject matter of magnesite and attempts to attach to this very item in the bill a proviso that this import duty shall not apply unless the manufacturer pays his labor $12.50 a ton for producing it.

It is most certainly germane. To save my life I do not see how anyone can escape the conclusion that it is not only germane, but is closely related and germane to the item in the bill, and under the rules of the House is clearly in order. In my opinion the point of order is not good.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the Chair to a ruling made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER], referred to in the Manual and Digest at page 518, where the gentleman from Missouri quotes with approval a decision made by the Chair in 1897 when a tariff bill was under consideration. The first paragraph of that bill provided as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That on and after the 1st of May, 1897, unless otherwise specially provided for in this act, there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon all articles imported from foreign countries or withdrawn for consumption, and mentioned in the schedules herein contained, the rates of duty which are by the schedules and paragraphs, respectively, prescribed, viz:

To that Mr. Dockery, of Missouri, offered an amendment, which was in substance the same sort of an amendment as that now offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], and which read as follows:

Provided, That when it is shown to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury that such articles are manufactured, controlled, or produced in the United States by a trust or trusts, the importation of such articles from foreign countries shall be free of duty until such manufacture, control, or production shall have ceased, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury.

A point of order was made against that amendment, and the Chair ruled that the amendment was not germane—just as I make the point of order that precisely the same kind of an amendment is not germane. The point I make now is even stronger, it seems to me, than the case referred to, because the rule has been very much limited in respect to germaneness on revenue bills since the day that decision was rendered. That amendment sought to do the same sort of thing that the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina seeks to do, namely, give to the Secretary of the Treasury discretion to limit or control in some way the operation of the bill. It seems to me that that decision is on all fours and is even more apropos to-day than it was at that time, because the House, since that time, has greatly limited the rule in respect to germaneness of amendments to revenue bills.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, if I may, I would like briefly to say a word to strengthen the argument made by the gentleman from Ohio by referring to section 943a of the Digest, where a decision was rendered by Mr. Speaker CLARK along lines somewhat similar to this one. The amendment now under consideration provides for the obtaining of information by the Secretary of the Treasury, constituting him a sort of embyro tariff commission. Our bill provides for the collection of revenue; the amendment for the collection of statistics. They are different subjects, and the question of germaneness can be raised. Here is the decision rendered by Mr. Speaker CLARK, on page 486 of the Manual and Digest, wherein he ruled out of order as not germane a proposition to recommit a tariff bill with instructions to report forthwith a provision for the creation of a tariff commission. This amendment comes under exactly the same rule as a question to recommit would come under, although, of course, no new office is created in this instance; but it is a delegation of power and provides for the ascertainment of facts and not for the procurement of money. This is what Mr. Speaker CLARK at that time said:

The subject matter of this tariff bill is the raising of revenue. The subject matter of the part of the motion to recommit which relates to the Tariff Commission is to gather information; or, to state it in other words, the purpose of the tariff bill is to get money and the purpose of the Tariff Commission is to get information.

Mr. Speaker CLARK ruled that proposition out of order, and I feel, therefore, Mr. Chairman, that this amendment should be ruled out of order and that the point of order should be sustained.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, that decision of mine was entirely correct, but it does not fit this case. That was a proposition to create a new body of officeholders that had nothing in the world to do with the bill, and was an effort to shunt the bill that was before the House out of the way or to weaken its effect. In this case the amendment is in order not only for the reasons stated by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] but it is in order as a limitation.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman contend that the rule with reference to limitations has effect as applying to germaneness of amendments to revenue bills?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It has been ruled on, I suppose, one hundred times, and is one of the favorite ways of getting matter into a bill which those in charge of it do not want to come in.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Oh, that has reference to appropriation bills.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I understand, but the subject matter of this bill is to raise revenue, and the item that the gentleman from North Carolina is trying to amend is the very same subject.

Now, I believed for a long time—and this has got nothing to do with this point of order, and I ask to proceed for a minute outside of it—I have contended for a long time that if it could pass the courts that the best way to settle this whole tariff question would be to rig up a scheme of fixing certain rates and then give the Secretary of the Treasury authority to put them up or down owing to the per cent the imports bore to the entire body of the consumption. I do not know whether it would pass the courts or not. If I had believed it would I certainly would have gotten up a bill long ago. But this amendment of Mr. KITCHIN's simply fixes the condition——

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman from Missouri yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does the gentleman from Missouri draw a distinction between giving the Secretary of the Treasury the right to determine whether an article is made by a trust and between this proposition that the labor producing it shall be paid a certain fixed wage?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. No. I do not think——

Mr. LONGWORTH. Because in that case the gentleman from Missouri must necessarily support the proposition this is not germane, because it has been held and never since overruled that on a tariff bill to give the Secretary of the Treasury authority to determine whether it is made by a trust or not is not germane to the bill.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That might be, but here is a flat proposition——

Mr. LONGWORTH. It is exactly the same.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The proponents of this bill claim that the reason they want this high tariff is because they want American laborers to have high wages. That is a nebulous kind of theory. Here is the concrete proposition which Mr. KITCHIN offers, that unless these laborers get at least $12.50 out of the $15 tariff protection that it shall not be collected. Well, now, I am in favor, and always have been, that if you are going to levy a tariff to pay laborers high wages you should give the laborers the wages and not let some fellow who does not work any stick it down in his pocket and make an enormous profit out of the labor that produces the thing. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I do not think there is any question about the morality of that proposition, whatever the parliamentary situation may be.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio cited a case to the Chair on page 518 of the rules. The way the gentleman read it, it looks like a point-blank case in his favor.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I always read that way.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; the gentleman reads that way, but it is the wrong way. When you examine it, you will find that it is really against him. Let me call the attention of the Chair, if the Chair has the rules before him, and I see he has, to page 518. Now, the Dingley bill was before the House. Immediately after the Clerk read the paragraph following the enacting clause, and before the list of articles upon which the rates of the tariff was to be levied or the rates had been reached, Mr. Dockery, of Missouri, offered this amendment:

Provided, That when it is shown to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury that such articles are manufactured, controlled, or produced in the United States by a trust or trusts—

And so forth. They should be exempt from duty. Now, the point made by Mr. Dingley was not that that was not germane at some section or provision of the bill, but that it was not germane "at that point" of the reading of the bill.

Let me quote from citation in the rules:

Mr. Nelson Dingley, of Maine, made a point of order against the amendment.

The Chairman ruled as follows, etc.:

"To the first paragraph, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Dockery] offers an amendment providing that under certain conditions all articles upon the dutiable list shall be transferred to the free list. To that amendment the gentleman from Maine, Mr. Dingley, raised the point of order that it is not in order at that point of the bill."

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman only gets himself in a deeper hole because his amendment relates back to the same matter to which this amendment does, otherwise it would make no sense whatever as applied to the clause where the gentleman has inserted it. It relates right back to this phrase "there shall be levied and collected, provided," and so forth.

Mr. KITCHIN. No. The gentleman does not understand the question at issue at all.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The decision is exactly in point.

Mr. KITCHIN. No; it is not. I think I can show that the gentleman from Iowa is very much mistaken. My amendment relates, and so declares, only to "paragraph 2." Now, suppose I had offered that amendment after line 7, page 1 of the bill, before we had reached the magnesite provision or any rate provision at all, then Mr. LONGWORTH could have made the point of order that the amendment was not in order "at that point in the bill," just as Mr. Dingley did, in the case referred to. But I did not offer the amendment "at that point" but at the proper place in the bill as the Clerk reached it, when he had read for amendment "paragraph 2" of the bill.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Has not the gentleman overlooked the fact that we have only one section in the bill?

Mr. KITCHIN. We do not read for amendments tariff bills by sections, but by paragraphs, and there are several paragraphs in the bill.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. But we interpret them by sections.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman from Iowa might possibly have been right if I had been foolish enough to offer the amendments immediately after the Clerk had read line 7.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The rule applicable to the question under consideration is as follows:

No amendment shall be in order to any bill affecting revenue which is not germane to the subject matter in the bill; nor shall any amendment to any item of such bill be in order which does not directly relate to the item to which the amendment is proposed.

It is clear that the rule here prescribed applies only to revenue bills and that it seeks to limit very closely the possibility of amendment of revenue bills by requiring that an amendment shall be germane, not only to the subject matter of the bill but to the specific item under consideration. The item under consideration imposes a duty upon magnesite, calcined, dead burned, and grain, of three-fourths of a cent a pound. The amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina proposes that that duty shall not apply unless it shall be shown to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury that the industry producing the magnesite described in the paragraph is paying for the labor in the production of such magnesite as much as $12.50 per ton.

The Chair thinks that the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina introduces an entirely new matter, a matter of administration, and increases the existing authority of the Secretary of the Treasury and does not directly relate to the paragraph which in itself simply imposes a duty upon magnesite described in it. If the rule were construed as the gentleman proposing the amendment insists it should be construed, and if the rule could be evaded by putting an amendment in the form of a limitation, as this amendment is in the form of a limitation, the whole reason and purpose of the rule would be destroyed. The Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I move to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. CRISP. That is not in order in the Committee of the Whole.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] appeals from the decision of the Chair. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. KITCHIN. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 95, noes 81.

Mr. KITCHIN. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were order, and Mr. FORDNEY and Mr. GARNER took their places as tellers.

The committee again divided; and there were—ayes 104, noes 81.

So the decision of the Chair stood as the judgment of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

3. Magnesite brick, 25 per centum ad valorem.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Line 1, insert after the word "brick" "three-fourths of a cent per pound and"; and in line 2, strike out "25" and insert "10."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to insert "one-fourth" instead of "three-fourths."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina offers an amendment to the committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. KITCHIN to the committee amendment: Strike out "three-fourths" and insert "one-fourth."

Mr. FORDNEY. On the gentleman's amendment I want to say one word. I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that the gentleman's amendment is right in line with a report of a good Democrat, Mr. Arthur Brisbane, published in the noon edition of to-day's Washington Times, as follows:

Strikes are expensive luxuries. The English railroad strike cost the Government $5,000,000 a day and a loss to business of two hundred and fifty millions. The minimum wage is maintained for a year at $12.50 a week, which in America would hardly be worth striking for. After Europe catches up with its own work, American workmen and business men will have to think earnestly on the problem of protection.

[Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment to the amendment, offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN].

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out in line 2, the words: "and 10 per centum ad valorem."

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote on the amendment.

Mr. KITCHIN. I have five minutes on this.

Mr. FORDNEY. Does the gentleman want to speak on the amendment?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KITCHIN: Page 2, line 2, strike out the words "10 per centum ad valorem."

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, it is probably not inappropriate that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] should have read that extract from Mr. Brisbane's article. Of course, from the vote just taken it would have been more appropriate for a gentleman on this side to have read it. But it may be equally appropriate for the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means to have read that extract. Mr. Brisbane, in that article, was demanding protection that should be actually in the interest, and not protection simply claimed by its advocates to be in the interest, of American labor.

That is exactly what every Democrat in the House voted for a moment ago and what every Republican voted against. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We demanded in our amendment the actual protection of American labor, and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] had the audacity to read what Mr. Brisbane said, when we had just taken a vote by which every Republican in this House refused to give of the $2,500,000 protection granted in the bill one single dollar of it to the American labor that produced the article protected. [Applause on the Democratic side.] If you are honest, if you are sincere, and really believe in and agree with Mr. Brisbane in what he says, what can you say to the labor conference in Washington now; what can you say to the labor, organized or unorganized, throughout this country when they ask you, "Why in the name of common sense and justice, if you wanted to protect American labor in the tariff, did you vote unanimously against the only proposition that was presented in the House at this session to really give labor one dollar of protection"? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Gentlemen, as I said a while ago, this Republican cry of protecting American labor is pure hypocrisy, and every intelligent laboring man in the United States, every intelligent man in the United States, knows it is hypocrisy. You have been writing tariff laws for nearly 50 years and claimed in every bill that you were writing it in the name and interest of American labor. The Whigs wrote tariff laws for nearly 25 years before the war, all claimed in the name of American labor. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Ah, gentlemen, by pure brute force of the lungs you Republicans can not drown out the injustice and hypocrisy of that vote against the American laborer that you cast just a moment ago unanimously. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Yes; all the tariff bills you have written in the last 50 years were claimed by you to have been written in the name and in the interest of the laboring man, none for the manufacturer. As a result of such tariff bills name one American laborer that has a summer home or a seaside cottage or a mountain resort. Name one that has his Packard or Pierce Arrow. Name one that has his yacht. Name one that has his theater box. Name one that has his boys and girls in our big colleges and universities. How many sons of the American laborer, whom you profess to have protected for a half of a century, are graduating at Yale and Harvard and Princeton or other such institutions?

Gentlemen, in this House there are two Members who belong to organized labor and not one of them will vote with you on this proposition. Both of them voted with all the Democrats a moment ago for an opportunity to put on record every Republican and every Democrat in this House as to whether or not he was willing for the American laborer, the American employee, to share in the direct benefit of a Republican protective tariff. Every Republican present in the House voted against that opportunity.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. AYRES. I desire the gentleman to correct that statement. Mr. KELLER, of Minnesota, voted to overrule the Chair.

Mr. KITCHIN. I am glad to say that Mr. KELLER was one of the gentlemen to whom I referred, who voted to give the Republicans here a chance to show by a record vote whether or not Republicans of this House were keeping faith with labor. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That paragraph 539 of the tariff act of October 3, 1913, is hereby expressly repealed; and that so much of paragraph 71 of said tariff act and of any heretofore existing law or parts of law as may be inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

With committee amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the first committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 4, page 2, after the word "hereby," strike out the word "expressly."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 5, page 2, after the word "any," strike out the word "heretofore."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report to the House, with the recommendation that the amendments to the bill be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ANDERSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5218) to provide revenue for the Government and to establish and maintain the production of magnesite ores and manufactures thereof in the United States, had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan moves the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en gross. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina offers a motion to recommit, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. KITCHIN moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Ways and Means with instructions to report the same back instanter with the following amendment: After line 7, page 2, add a new section, as follows:

"The duties provided for in this act shall not apply unless it be shown to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury that the industry producing magnesite, described in this act, is paying for the labor in the production of such magnesite as much as $12.50 per ton."

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order against the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] and would call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union has recently ruled out of order just such an amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is this substantially the same amendment that was offered in the committee?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; offered as a new section. Mr. Speaker, I do not think the recent erroneous ruling of the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union is really an authority. [Applause.] It is not over five minutes old.

Mr. CARTER. It is not dry behind the ears yet.

Mr. BLANTON. Now is the best time to change it.

Mr. KITCHIN. The Chairman of the Committee of the Whole made an erroneous ruling, as the precedents show, and the very precedent cited by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] to prove that it was not germane shows when you read it that it is absolutely germane. I think that the Speaker, who is the Presiding Officer of the House, ought to reverse an erroneous ruling of the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union at the earliest possible moment. [Applause.] That moment has arrived, and in order that it shall not hereafter become a precedent I think he ought now to reverse the ruling of the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and rule in accordance with the rule and the precedents.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, of course, as the gentleman suggests, is not bound by the ruling of the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, but always a ruling of a Chairman of the Committee of the Whole would have great weight, and naturally the Chair would not wish to disturb that unless he felt bound by the precedents to do so. That is peculiarly so in the present instance, because the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] appealed from the decision of the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House, and the Committee of the Whole, by a substantial majority with a very full attendance, sustained the opinion of the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I appeal respectfully from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I move to lay the appeal on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio moves to lay the appeal on the table.

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that he was in doubt.

Mr. KITCHIN. The yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. As many as are in favor of laying the appeal on the table will, as their names are called, vote "yea," those opposed "nay," and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 142, nays 111, answered "present" 4, not voting 172, as follows:

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to withdraw my vote of "aye" and answer "present," as I am paired with the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. BELL.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I heard my name called, but I was in the lobby.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not entitled to vote.

Mr. BAER. Mr. Speaker, I could not get here in time, but if I had been here I would have voted "aye."

The vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following motion to recommit:

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. KITCHIN moves to recommit the bill to the committee with instructions to report the same forthwith to the House, with the following amendment: Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following: "That on and after the day following the passage of this act there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon the articles named herein, when imported from any foreign country into the United States or into any of its possessions, the rates of duties which are herein prescribed, namely:

"1. Magnesite, commercial ore, either crushed or ground, one-eighth of a cent per pound.

"2. Magnesite, calcined, dead burned, and grain, three-eighths of a cent per pound.

"3. Magnesite brick, three-eighths of a cent per pound and 10 per cent ad valorem.

"SEC. 2. That paragraph 539 of the tariff act of October 3, 1913, is hereby repealed; and that so much of paragraph 71 of said tariff act and of any existing law or parts of law as may be inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed."

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order against the motion to recommit on the ground that it effects changes in amendments adopted in Committee of the Whole and agreed to in the House. It is a way of attempting to get around amendments adopted in Committee of the Whole and agreed to by the House.

Mr. KITCHIN. What authority has the gentleman got for his position?

Mr. LONGWORTH. The authority of a wise judgment. [Laughter.]

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman's wisdom?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. All right, the Chair would like to hear the gentleman's reasons.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, it would not have been in order for the gentleman to offer any amendment which would have changed in any manner a committee amendment, but by a subterfuge of striking out all after the enacting clause he seeks to do what he otherwise could not do legitimately. I make the point of order that the gentleman's motion is out of order.

The SPEAKER. Can the gentleman cite the Chair any authorities?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, section 948 of the Manual, page 522, holds that it is not in order to move to recommit with instructions to eliminate an amendment adopted by the House. That is exactly what the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] is seeking to do by this motion. The committee adopted an amendment placing a duty of one-half a cent a pound on magnesite ore. The gentleman by his motion attempts to reduce that duty and make another rate of duty. The effect is to amend a committee amendment, which is not in order, that amendment having already been adopted by the House. The Chair will recall that the House has adopted all of the committee amendments, which fixed a certain specific rate of duty in each one of these three paragraphs of the bill. It is a mere subterfuge to move to strike out all after the enacting clause and to change those rates of duty. The gentleman would not have the right to change the rate of duty in any one of these paragraphs. Therefore he has not the right to change them in all three.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I will say frankly to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], when he moved to strike out the enacting clause, had no desire whatever to claim and did not think it gave him any advantage. The gentleman simply adopted that method to get his different rates before the House.

The object of a motion to recommit is clearly to give the minority of the House—the legislative minority and not the political minority—a chance affirmatively to go on record as to what they think this legislation should be, and if a motion to recommit does not permit that, then the motion is futile. I know the decision to which the gentleman has cited the Chair. That simply provides that you can not offer to strike out some amendment that the House has adopted, upon the theory that when the House had once acted on a matter there ought to be an end to it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. But the gentleman will concede that the effect of the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina is to amend the committee amendments, the amendments already adopted by the House.

Mr. CRISP. I will concede that the effect of the motion is to change the rates in this bill, and that is the only office of a motion to recommit. It is to give the minority the right affirmatively to go on record as to their views. If the motion to recommit does not mean that, it is absolutely a useless motion.

Mr. GARNER. And may I suggest to the gentleman that the difference in the rule that he suggests and the provision now before the House is this: It would not be in order to strike out an amendment that had been adopted by the House, but I know of no rule that would require one not to change that amendment.

Mr. LONGWORTH. But the effect is precisely the same, whether you strike out and insert or whether you move to strike out all of the amendment and substitute. If one is not in order, the other is not.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, the Chair will find the precedent cited by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] on page 524 of the later edition of the Manual. It will be noted that in the motion to recommit the only changes made are in the rates which have been fixed in the bill, which have been adopted by the House. If the gentleman offered a motion to recommit and proposed in his motion to change those rates, it would clearly be out of order; and I submit that even if he offered a motion to strike out all of that enacting clause and then reinserted all of the bill, which he does not seek to change, and only changes on the rates, that does not bring it without the provisions of the rule, and that is what the gentleman has done, as the gentleman from Ohio has most clearly stated. The only changes in this bill which the gentleman from North Carolina seeks to make are changes in the rates fixed in the committee amendments which have already been adopted by the House. The mere fact that he seeks to strike out all after the enacting clause and reinsert the provisions of the bill which he does not propose to change, and then changes the rates that have already been adopted by the House in the form of committee amendments, clearly brings it within the ruling made by former Speaker CLARK. If in his motion to strike out all after the enacting clause he had substituted an entirely different bill, the rule probably would not apply; but he has not done that. He simply seeks to change the amendments which have already been adopted by the House, and it would seem as though that would bring it within the rule that a motion to recommit can not be made to eliminate or modify amendments which have been acted upon and adopted by the House.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, let us see to what point the reasoning of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], if followed, would carry us. First, let us bear in mind that the motion to recommit is regarded as so sacred that it is one of the few things protected against the Committee on Rules by the general rules of the House. It is expressly provided in the general rules of the House that the Committee on Rules may not bring in a resolution which will prevent one motion to recommit. Of course, the reason for that is to protect, as the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] has so well expressed it, the minority of the House—that is, the legislature, not the political, minority—in its right to present a concrete, comprehensive proposition of legislation. If the reasoning of the gentleman from Massachusetts be followed to its logical end, what is the result? Appropriation bills may be brought before the House, considered and amended in Committee of the Whole, reported to the House with amendments, and those amendments adopted, and a motion would not be in order to recommit, reducing by a single cent one of the appropriations that have been made in any amendment to the bill as adopted by the House. If the Speaker should sustain this point of order, the practical effect of that ruling would be to do by a parliamentary decision that which the Committee on Rules and the House itself can not do under the general rules of the House. It will practically destroy the efficacy of the motion to recommit with instructions.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, let us see where the logic of the gentleman from Tennessee would lead us. It would lead us to the proposition that the well-settled rule that no amendment adopted in committee and afterwards adopted by the House can be changed——

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will.

Mr. GARRETT. As I remember the ruling of Mr. Speaker CLARK, the case was this: The amendment which was to be affected by the motion to recommit was one that had been adopted by the House. It was to be affected by striking out the amendment—destroying it, not modifying it, not changing it, but striking it out—and of course the House had had its opportunity to do that when it voted upon the proposition. But to say that upon a revenue bill the minority of the House shall not have an opportunity to amend an amendment in one motion to recommit—oh, the gentleman surely does not propose to insist upon that.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Do I understand the gentleman to contend that you can on a motion to recommit amend an amendment, but you can not strike it out?

Mr. GARRETT. I do. You can not strike it out, because the House has already adopted it. That would be taking two bites at the cherry, but surely you may present in one motion to recommit a germane proposition modifying that amendment. Otherwise the minority has no chance to make an affirmative record.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The fact is simply this: The House has adopted three committee amendments to the bill, to wit, a committee amendment in line 9, page 1; a committee amendment in line 11, page 1; and a committee amendment in lines 1 and 2, page 2. Now, clearly it would not be in order for the gentleman from North Carolina to move to recommit and offer to strike out or amend any one of those amendments. How, if that is the case, can he by the subterfuge of moving to strike out all after the enacting clause make that in order which is clearly not in order under the rules? That would then leave us at a stage where a committee amendment would be subject to change in the House.

Mr. GARRETT. Committee amendments are subject to change in the House——

Mr. LONGWORTH. Not when adopted by the House. They are not changed in a motion to recommit after they have been adopted.

Mr. GARRETT. After the House has once voted an amendment in you can not by subterfuge bring about a vote to strike it out. That is reasonable, that is logical, that is sensible; but in the previous question being ordered on the main proposition, surely it is in order to offer a germane motion to recommit.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield? How can this amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina be construed except that it is to strike out an amendment and insert new rates?

Mr. GARRETT. Because it is to strike out an amendment and insert different rates. That is the very point.

Mr. WALSH. It is striking out amendments already adopted.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Precisely.

Mr. GARRETT. It is striking out an amendment and inserting a different concrete germane proposition. The insistence to which the gentlemen are holding destroys absolutely the motion to recommit with instructions and thereby present a tangible legislative proposition indicating the affirmative position of the minority.

Mr. WALSH. If I understand the gentleman correctly, it is to the effect that instead of striking out all after the enacting clause the gentleman from North Carolina could have made his motion to recommit striking out one of these committee amendments and inserting new rates?

Mr. GARRETT. I think that is true if he presented a tangible, germane, legislative proposition.

Mr. LONGWORTH. If that were true there would be no use in adopting the committee amendments in the House.

Mr. GARRETT. But the gentleman must bear in mind that there can be only one motion to recommit. No matter of delay is involved. The House has never passed upon this proposition presented by the gentleman from North Carolina. The House has passed upon amendments, but it has never passed upon the legislation proposed in the motion to recommit, legislation admittedly germane.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The amendments adopted in committee were adopted in the House thereafter, and now the gentleman seeks by a motion to recommit to do what he could not do on a motion previous to this time.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman yield? We all agree, I apprehend, that the object of the motion to recommit is to give the minority a chance to go on record. Now, what is the practical effect if this motion is not in order? We are dealing now with the rights of the minority. The gentleman in charge of a bill when it is reported to the House at once demands the previous question. The Speaker properly recognizes that gentleman. He demands the previous question. The minority has absolutely no chance to offer amendments because the majority is going to adopt the previous question and the minority has absolutely no right, and the only chance that the minority has to put its legislative proposition before the House so as to get a record vote is on the motion to recommit.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. I will.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman controvert this proposition, which arose, I think, when he was the honored parliamentarian——

Mr. CRISP. I am familiar with that decision.

Mr. WALSH. That the House can not do indirectly, on a motion to recommit, that which it can not do by amendment, before engrossment and third reading?

Mr. CRISP. I do not controvert it. I put that proposition in the Manual myself when I was clerk at the Speaker's table. I know what it is. The gentleman from Colorado, Mr. Martin, in the Committee of the Whole offered an amendment striking out a certain part of a bill. When it went to the House there was a motion offered to recommit, striking out just exactly those words and did not substitute anything in lieu of them. It was too late to offer a motion to reconsider and Mr. Martin sought by indirection by a motion to recommit to do what he could not directly do, to strike out that amendment engrafted in the bill by the Committee of the Whole, and the Speaker held it was improper to do by indirection what could not be done directly.

Mr. WALSH. That is what is trying to be done here.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That is precisely what is trying to be done.

The SPEAKER. Suppose the motion to recommit, instead of adopting the new bill, striking everything out after the enacting clause, simply struck out the amendments adopted by the committee, and the House inserted, as in the motion to recommit, one-tenth of 1 per cent, would the gentleman think that was in order?

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I do not think the question of striking out all after the enacting clause has anything to do with this motion, and the gentleman from North Carolina—and I have talked to him privately—did not offer it for that purpose. He simply offered it because he thought it was an easier way to get his changed rates before the House, and we do not contend that the striking out of the enacting clause gives the motion any more rights than it would have if it simply proposed to change the rates.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman contends, then, though an amendment is adopted by the committee and later adopted by the House, it is permissible by a motion to recommit to change the figures adopted in the amendment?

Mr. CRISP. I do, and for this reason: All these rules have a reason to them. Now, notwithstanding what has been said in the press about the rules of the House, they are good rules if you understand them, and they have a reason. This decision that we have is a good decision. There was a case where a person simply wanted to strike out something the committee had adopted and did not substitute anything else for it.

Now, what is the object of this motion to recommit, Mr. Speaker? It is simply to give the House, or rather give the legislative minority, a chance to go on record as to their views. And, as I said a moment ago, the only possible way for the minority to get a chance is by this motion to recommit, and if you can not change the bill the motion amounts to nothing, for if we offered some amendment here that did not deal with rates it would properly be held not germane and be ruled out of order. And the only thing involved is rates, and it seems to me undoubtedly that the legislative minority has a right to go on record through a motion to recommit on the question of changing the rates.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state, to save the time of the House, that it does not seem to the Chair it is of very great importance in immediate effect which way he rules now, and the Chair would like to state his ruling provisionally, so that it will not bind him in the future. It is a subject that is somewhat intricate, and he would like to look up all the rulings and consider the principles and results before he comes to a final decision. But it does seem to the Chair that technically the decision which has been cited by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] covers this case and makes it out of order. On the other hand is the fact that a motion to recommit is intended to give the minority one chance to express fully their views so long as they are germane. And so it seems to the Chair that the general spirit and purpose of the motion ought to admit one like this. As the Chair says, the decisions cited seem to him very technical, but they do seem to him to be in the other direction; and therefore the Chair, to save time, overrules the point of order, reserving the right not to be bound by it in the future, when he shall have had opportunity to thoroughly study the question.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I want to go on record as calling the attention of the Chair to the fact that——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. While a motion to recommit is of such high privilege in the House that even the Committee on Rules can not set aside that motion, a motion to recommit can only give the House an opportunity to go upon record on a matter that it has had no other opportunity to go on record upon. The House has had opportunity to go on record with every one of these rates. The Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union passed upon them and sent them up to the House, and the House agreed to them one after another. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] could have demanded a separate vote on each one of these amendments. The demand was not made. Then the House voted to agree to every one of these amendments. We can not now refer these amendments in a motion to recommit, because it has just agreed to them, and it can not be called upon to substitute for the rates which have just been agreed to rates proposed in a motion to recommit. A motion to recommit is for the sole and only purpose of giving the House an opportunity to go on record on a matter it can not otherwise go on record upon.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield.

Mr. GARNER. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the policy which he suggests would nullify the rule for recommital. Let us suppose a committee composed of two-thirds of the majority and one-third of the minority, as composed now, would decide that they would want to prevent the House of Representatives from going on record with reference to a proposition reported from their committee; the result would be that they would introduce a bill and to that bill they would provide certain amendments. These would be adopted by the majority of the Committee of the Whole, and when they came back to the House, under the point of order made by the gentleman from Ohio there would be no such thing as getting a record vote on the minority proposition.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. But a separate vote could have been demanded on every one of these amendments, and the House could go on record on every one of them.

Mr. GARNER. You might get a separate vote on each one of these amendments, but they might not be the amendments that the majority would like to go on record upon, and so it would be impossible to get a record vote on the issue that exists between the majority and the minority. I could take this ruling, and if it were sustained on the point of order made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH], it would be impossible to get a record vote for the minority and impossible for the minority to make a motion to recommit, because you could go into the original committee and report the bill with certain amendments, and therefore you could not entertain that motion to recommit, and therefore you could not fulfill the object of the institution of the motion to recommit, which was in order that the two parties of the House of Representatives might squarely place their issue before the American people on a record vote. If you should adopt the policy you suggest here, you would deprive them of having that issue, and I would think the decision of the Chair was a wise one, whether we were in the majority or in the minority.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The motion to recommit can not commit the House to the folly of immediately recommiting a matter upon which it has just passed and upon which it has had an opportunity to have a record vote. That is exactly what is being done here. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] could have demanded a separate vote on each of these amendments, and could have had a record vote in the House, but he did not do so.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina under the circumstances would have had no chance to put forward the rates which the minority wanted.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. But even so, Mr. Speaker, the minority of the House, if it were opposed to the rates as they are, could record themselves on a record vote, and then it would be for the House to consider such a rate as might be agreeable to the House.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. In this instance that the gentleman speaks of he would give an opportunity for a negative vote; but nowhere, unless you have a motion to recommit, have you the right to obtain a positive vote, an affirmative vote. You have a right to vote against these rates, but no opportunity to vote for another rate; and the motion to recommit was intended to make an issue, I repeat, and give us an opportunity for an affirmative vote as to what we would like the law to be. [Applause and cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas has stated with much force the argument, which to the Chair is perplexing. The House has had an opportunity to vote upon each one of these amendments.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, will the Chair pardon me?

The SPEAKER. As the Chair stated before, the Chair intends to look this subject up carefully, and before it shall arise again he will have had an opportunity to thoroughly determine upon it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. May I interrupt the Chair to say that not only is it true that both the committee and the House has had a chance to vote upon these amendments, but also as to the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. GARNER. But that was in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The whole purpose of this motion to recommit is to have a record vote upon the program of the minority. That is the main purpose of the motion to recommit, and while the decision has been cited—and the argument of the gentleman from Kansas does seem to the Chair to forcibly point in the direction a committee wishing to avoid allowing the minority to get a record vote could always ingeniously bring in a bill and perfect it by amendments, and then have those amendments adopted in the House, and thereby, according to this ruling, prevent the minority from ever bringing its program before the House, yet it seems to the Chair that thereby they would nullify the main purpose of the motion to recommit. So the Chair will provisionally decide that the point of order is not good. The question is on agreeing to the motion to recommit.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina demands the yeas and nays on the motion to recommit.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of the motion to recommit will answer "yea" when their names are called; those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 117, nays 154, answered "present" 2, not voting 156, as follows:

So the bill was passed.

The following additional pairs were announced:

On this vote:

Mr. KNUTSON (for) with Mr. BELL (against).
Mr. KAHN (for) with Mr. DENT (against).
Mr. ELLIOTT (for) with Mr. DRANE (against).
Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky (for) with Mr. MONTAGUE (against).

Mr. MONDELL (for) with Mr. SMALL (against).
Mr. BRITTEN (for) with Mr. CLARK of Florida (against).
Mr. REAVIS (for) with Mr. HOWARD (against).
The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. FORDNEY, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks that I made this afternoon in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PROHIBITION OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report upon the bill (H. R. 6810) to prohibit intoxicating beverages and to regulate the manufacture, production, use, and sale of high-proof spirits for other than beverage purposes, and to insure an ample supply of alcohol and promote its use in scientific research and in development of fuel, dye, and other lawful industries, for printing under the rules.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order on the conference report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota presents a conference report for printing under the rules.

BRIDGE ACROSS RED RIVER, LAMAR COUNTY, TEX.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 8986) granting the consent of Congress to the Paris-Hugo Bridge Co. to construct a bridge and approaches thereto across Red River, near Arthur City, Lamar County, Tex.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is the urgency for taking this matter up at this time?

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, plans are ready for the construction of the bridge and the company is very anxious to make the contracts. The matter is very urgent, that they be able to do so during the present month of October.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object—and I shall not do so—I would suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts that if he had ever attempted to cross the Red River without a bridge, he would never raise any objection to building a bridge across it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the Paris-Hugo Bridge Co., a corporation, and its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across Red River from a point on its south bank, north of and near Arthur City, in Lamar County, Tex., to a point immediately north of said beginning and located in Choctaw County, Okla., in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby reserved.

With the following committee amendments:

Line 5, page 1, after the word "operate," insert the words "at a point suitable to navigation interests."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BLACK, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. DONOVAN, for three days, owing to death in family.

To Mr. DRANE, for to-day, on account of important business.

To Mr. ANDREWS of Maryland, for one week, on account of illness.

SENATE BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bills and joint resolution of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 495. An act for the relief of Walston H. Brown, sole surviving partner of the firm of Brown, Howard & Co., and of the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co.; to the Committee on Claims.

S. 2300. An act for the relief of the estate of Henry A. V. Post; to the Committee on Claims.

S. J. Res. 90. Joint resolution to readmit Frances Scoville-Mumm to the character and privileges of a citizen of the United States; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. DALE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the subject of my speech a few days ago, Cardinal Mercier.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, October 8, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report on preliminary examination of San Bernard River, Tex. (H. Doc. No. 259), was taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. VESTAL, from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 9755) to establish standard of weights and measures for the following wheat-mill and corn-mill products, namely, flour, hominy, grits, and meals, and all commercial feeding stuffs, and for other purposes, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 359), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. ROMJUE, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 6522) for the relief of F. M. Barfield, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 354), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. EDMONDS, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 822) for the relief of James W. Cross, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 355), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. MacCRATE, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 6881) for the relief of Joseph A. McCarthy, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 356), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. ROMJUE, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 728) for the relief of the Buffalo River Zinc Mining Co., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 357), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. GLYNN, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 2740) for the relief of Maude H. Mosher, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 358), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. DENT, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 80) to correct an error in the wording of the appropriation of $71,000 made in the act approved July 9, 1918, and to authorize the Secretary of War to pay said sum to respective parties entitled thereto, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 361), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. DOMINICK: A bill (H. R. 9776) for the purchase of a site for and the erection of a post-office building, courthouse, and other Government offices at Anderson, S. C.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9777) for the purchase of a site for and the erection of a post-office building, courthouse, and other Government offices at Greenwood, S. C.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. NOLAN: A bill (H. R. 9778) to provide for the establishment, operation, and maintenance of foreign-trade zones in ports of entry of the United States, to expedite and encourage foreign commerce, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania: A bill (H. R. 9779) providing for the deportation of aliens who evaded military service and that aliens admitted to the United States shall take the necessary steps to become citizens of the United States; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

By Mr. EVANS of Montana: A bill (H. R. 9780) to provide for the payment for certain lands within the former Flathead Indian Reservation, in the State of Montana; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. STEENERSON: A bill (H. R. 9781) to amend an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States," approved March 4, 1909; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, letter from the Denny Bar Co. and the Alpha Hardware and Supply Co., of Nevada City, Calif., protesting against Senate bill No. 2896; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, October 8, 1919.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we come before Thee in the consciousness of our interdependence, and lift up our hearts to the Father of us all, and ask Thy guidance and blessing. Give us the spirit of sonship that we may know all the qualities of life and character that make, refine, and purify the social and political life of the world. May we follow after God's great thought of the unity of life that is in Christ Jesus. We ask it for Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of yesterday, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

DEVELOPMENT OF UNUSED LANDS (S. DOC. NO. 124).

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report upon the development of the unused lands of the country. The communication only will be printed and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

ESTIMATES OF APPROPRIATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of War, submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation in the sum of $137,000 required for support of the Mountain Branch, National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, at Johnson City, Tenn., for the fiscal year 1920 (S. Doc. No. 122), which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation in the sum of $15,000 required by the Office of the Treasurer of the United States for examiners of checks (S. Doc. No. 123), which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in order to save the time of the day by having morning business attended to when morning business is called, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. PITTMAN. The junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON] is absent on important business. He has a general pair with the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK]. I ask that this notice may stand for the day.

Mr. GERRY. I desire to announce that the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS] are engaged in a committee hearing.

I also desire to announce that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] are detained by illness in their families. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] are detained on official business.

Mr. GAY. The senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] is detained from the Senate by illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-six Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House agrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7478) to amend sections 5200 and 5202 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by the acts of June 22, 1906, and September 24, 1918.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 5218) to provide revenue for the Government and to establish and maintain the production of magnesite ores and manufacturers thereof in the United States, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

CONDITIONS IN RUSSIA.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have the Secretary read a brief newspaper dispatch from Vladivostok.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Secretary read as follows:

"VLADIVOSTOK POINTS TO DUTY OF ALLIES—COMMITTEE OF NATIONAL DEFENSE WANTS CLEAR EXPLANATION OF POLICY REGARDING RUSSIA.

"OMSK, Thursday, September 25.

"The central committee of national defense in Vladivostok has issued an open letter to the leaders of all political parties in the United States, England, and France, declaring it the duty of the Allies to publish a clear explanation of their policy, showing their opposition to Bolshevism and their sympathy with the movement for the regeneration of Russia. In the letter it is stated, 'in the Far East the American military authorities declared that they considered the Bolshevist band a de facto government of Russia.'

"SUBSTANCE OF THE LETTER.

"The letter declares that the action of the peace conference in inviting the Bolsheviki to the proposed conference at Prinkipo on equal terms with 'the representatives of loyal and patriotic Russia' was a serious blow to the cause of anti-Bolshevism in Russia, and that the peace conference, without listening to the Russian representatives, has approved various separatist tendencies aiming at the dismemberment of Russia. The peace conference, it is declared, treats Russia not as an ally but as a conquered country.

"SAYS CONFIDENCE IS SHAKEN.

"Russia's confidence in her allies, it is added, has been shaken by the above events, by the French abandonment of Odessa 'without any visible cause,' by the interference of the Allies in Russia's internal affairs, by the disintegration of the economic and financial life of the country, and by the humiliation to which the patriotic feelings of Russia are constantly subjected.

"For this reason a clear declaration of policy is considered necessary."

STATEMENT BY EX-PRESIDENT TAFT.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement by ex-President Taft appearing in the Washington Post of this date. Mr. Taft in the statement makes comment upon the speech delivered by Mr. Hoover at Palo Alto, Calif., a few days ago. That speech, I understand, was printed in the RECORD by request of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK]. I think this statement will be of interest to Senators.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TAFT SAYS HOOVER'S PLEA FOR A LEAGUE OF NATIONS DESERVES CONSIDERATION—NO ONE KNOWS MORE OF EUROPEAN SITUATION THAN CALIFORNIAN, AND HIS VIEW OF PERIL INVOLVED IN REJECTION OF PACT IS CONVINCING, FORMER PRESIDENT HOLDS.

[By William Howard Taft.]

"Herbert Hoover is one of the foremost figures of this war. He began as the head of the Belgian relief movement, took charge of our Food Administration, and then became the chief executive of the efforts to relieve the starving peoples of the world after the armistice.

"No one knows more of the actual European situation than he does. He has had to reckon with the political and military and economic situation of every country of Europe in the field of the late war. He has not been in the peace commissions, but he has been where he could and must follow the negotiations and where he was constantly consulted by the participants in the Paris council.

MAN OF WIDE EXPERIENCE.

"Hoover is not an academic idealist. He is a plain, modest man of affairs and wide European business experience. He is a patriotic American who, during the five years of this war, has given all of his time and energy to the cause of the world and to that of his country without compensation in a field new and unworked, but of critical importance in the struggle. He has been a pioneer. He has shown the genius of invention and organization to meet a new emergency.

"From such a man the speech he delivered at his home in Palo Alto, under the eaves of his alma mater, Stanford University, in favor of the treaty and league, deserves the earnest consideration of Americans struggling to reach a just conclusion as to the issues now being discussed in the Senate. Though Mr. Hoover has had no training as a speaker or writer, when he has anything to say he develops a clearness and force of statement and a trenchant style that make it a great satisfaction to read his words.

POINTS OUT PERIL IN EUROPE.

"Mr. Hoover makes clear that we have been foremost in creating a number of independent States in the field of war, whose lives as nations depend on a league of nations of which our country must be a member. If we stay out of it and do not bear our part, and by doing so fail to strengthen the weakening morale of our allies and our infant nations, there is every danger that the condition of Europe will degenerate into that which prevailed in the Thirty Years' War.

"He points out that such a state of things in Europe will, of course, affect us seriously on the material side, and that ultimately we shall be drawn in again. He says that for good or ill we are entangled, and the only question is whether we shall join in this effort, which the league is, to restore law and order in Europe and Asia, or whether we shall hold aloof while chaos and anarchy become worse confounded, and then act with all the additional burden and expense the delay will entail.

"His speech should be printed and sent far and wide as from one who knows, with the hope that it may open the eyes and widen the vision of those who do not seem to realize that we are the greatest and most powerful Nation in the world, and so, whether we will or not, are charged with responsibilities which sooner or later we shall have to meet, and which the quicker we assume the more easily we shall successfully discharge."

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have a telegram from U. S. S. Tampa Post, of the American Legion, of Tampa, Fla., which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TAMPA, FLA., October 7, 1919.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The U. S. S. Tampa Post, of the American Legion, last night passed resolution indorsing league of nations and treaty without reservations or amendment. We urge you to support these measures.

E. B. PRIEST, Post Commander.

Mr. LODGE. I present resolutions from citizens of Hardinsburg, Ky., and as they are very brief I should be glad if they could be printed in the RECORD without reading, with the signatures attached, as they are few in number.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HARDINSBURG, KY., October 4, 1919.

Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE,
United States Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The League to Enforce Peace is flooding this section of the country with "form" telegrams to be sent to the Members of the Senate.

There are in Kentucky 200,000 100 per cent Americans who are without representation in the United States Senate. We therefore appeal to you as the spokesman of Americanism that you do not fail to stand firmly against the league unless it be accepted with the reservations proposed.

We oppose the league in any form, but would be willing for it to be adopted, provided the reservations are made a part of the resolution of adoption.

W. Sherman Ball, county attorney of Breckinridge County; A. T. Beard, county court clerk; P. M. Basham, clerk of the circuit court; J. Raleigh Meador, superintendent of county schools; Herbert Hall, deputy county clerk; J. B. Carman, sheriff Breckinridge County; S. B. Payne, judge Breckinridge County court; D. D. Dowell, cashier Bank of Hardinsburg & Trust Co.; J. M. Crunes, assistant cashier Farmers Bank & Trust Co.; Harry T. Bates, deputy tax commissioner; H. M. Beard, farmer and tobacconist; Geo. E. Bess, manager Trust Department Bank of Hardinsburg & Trust Co.; Allen R. Kincheloe, attorney; W. A. Meador, sergeant, A. E. F.

THE BULGARIAN TREATY.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD a summary of the Bulgarian treaty which appeared in the London Times of September 20. I will not ask to have it printed as a public document, as it is only a summary, but I have not seen it printed in this country, and I think it may be of interest.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator from Massachusetts permit an inquiry?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator know whether or not in that treaty Thrace was divided and any portion of it given to Bulgaria?

Mr. LODGE. I have not read the summary of the treaty; I have only just received it from the Library. It is a photostat copy of the London Times summary.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the London Times, Sept. 20, 1919.]

"THE BULGARIAN TREATY—THRACIAN SEABOARD LOST.

"We print below the official summary of the draft treaty of peace handed to the Bulgarian peace delegates in Paris yesterday. It is arranged on the same plan as the draft treaty with Austria, the summary of which was published in the Times of June 3, while the text of the material reserved clauses from the final treaty was published in the Times of September 4. The following parts of the Bulgarian treaty are identical with the draft Austrian treaty:

"Preamble.
"Part I.—Covenant of the league of nations.
"Part VI.—Penalties.
"Part X.—Aerial navigation.
"Part XII.—Labor convention.

"Part II.

"THE FUTURE FRONTIERS OF BULGARIA.

"On the North, the frontier with Rumania remains unchanged.

"On the West, the frontier with the Serb-Croat-Slovene State for the most part follows the line of the old frontier with Serbia. Small portions of territory are ceded to the Serb-Croat-Slovene State, of which the most important is the town of Strumnitza and the surrounding district.

"A modification is introduced into the southern frontier with territories to be subsequently attributed by the Principal Allied and Associated Powers and the new boundary follows a line which may be drawn roughly from a point about eight miles south-west of Bashmakli to Kilkik, passing close to Ardabashi and Daridere, which remain in Bulgarian territory and crossing the Kartal Dagh and the Tokatjik Dagh.

"On the South-East line a slight modification taking in a small piece of Turkish territory north-west of Mustafa Pasha is introduced. The Black Sea forms as before the Eastern frontier.

"Part III.

"POLITICAL CLAUSES.

"Section 1.—Serb-Croat-Slovene State.—Bulgaria recognizes the Serb-Croat-Slovene State and renounces in favour of that State all rights and title over the territories of the Bulgarian Monarchy situated outside the frontiers of Bulgaria, as defined by the present Treaty or by any Treaties concluded for the purpose of completing the present settlement. A Commission, consisting of seven members, five of whom shall be nominated by the principal Allied and Associated Powers, one by the Serb-Croat-Slovene State, and one by Bulgaria, shall be constituted within 15 days of the coming into force of the present Treaty to trace on the spot the frontier line. Bulgarian nationals who became resident in the territories assigned to the Serb-Croat-Slovene State after January 1, 1910, will require a permit from the Serb-Croat-Slovene State to acquire Serb-Croat-Slovene nationality. All other Bulgarian nationals resident in those territories will acquire Serb-Croat-Slovene nationality ipso facto and lose their Bulgarian nationality.

"Section 2.—Greece.—Bulgaria renounces in favour of Greece all rights and titles over the territories of the Bulgarian Monarchy situated outside the frontiers of Bulgaria as laid down in the sections dealing with frontiers and recognized by the present Treaty as forming part of Greece. Bulgarian nationals habitually resident in the territories assigned to Greece in accordance with the present Treaty will obtain Greek nationality ipso facto and will lose their Bulgarian nationality. They will, however, be entitled within a period of two years from the coming into force of the present Treaty, if over 18 years of age, to opt for Bulgarian nationality, a similar privilege being accorded to Greeks over 18 years of age who are Bulgarian nationals habitually resident in Bulgaria who may wish to opt for Greek nationality. The proportion and nature of the financial obligations of Bulgaria which Greece will assume on account of the territory placed under her sovereignty will be determined in accordance with the financial clauses of the present Treaty.

"Section 3.—Thrace.—Bulgaria renounces in favour of the Principal Allied and Associated Powers all rights and title over the territories in Thrace which used to belong to the Bulgarian Monarchy and which being situated outside the new frontiers of Bulgaria have not at present been assigned to any State. Bulgaria undertakes to accept whatever settlement may be made by the Principal Allied and Associated Powers in regard to these territories and the Principal Allied and Associated Powers undertake, on the other hand, to ensure economic outlets for Bulgaria to the Aegean Sea under the conditions which will be fixed at a later date.

"Section 4.—Protection of Minorities.—The provisions for the protection of minorities reproduce exactly those laid down in the Austrian Treaty, adding the proviso that all persons not nationals of any other State habitually resident in Bulgaria at the date of the coming into force of the present Treaty, as well as all persons born in Bulgaria who are not born nationals of another State, ipso facto become Bulgarian nationals.

"Section 5.—General Provisions.—Bulgaria undertakes to recognize all Treaties or agreements which may be entered into by the Allied and Associated Powers with States now existing or coming into existence in future in the whole or part of the former Empire of Russia as it existed on August 1, 1914, and to recognize the frontiers of any such States as determined therein.

"Bulgaria accepts definitely the abrogation of the Brest-Litovsk Treaties and of all Treaties, Conventions, and Agreements entered into by her with the Maximalist Government in Russia.

"The Allied and Associated Powers formally reserve the rights of Russia to obtain from Bulgaria restitution and reparation based on the principles of the present Treaty. Bulgaria undertakes to recognize the Treaties of Peace and additional Conventions which have been or may be concluded by the Allied and Associated Powers with the Powers who fought on the side of Bulgaria.

"Bulgaria declares that she recognizes the Protectorate proclaimed over Egypt by Great Britain on December 18, 1914, and that she will make no claim on behalf of herself or her nationals to the benefits or immunities derived from the régime of the capitulations in Egypt regarding all Treaties, agreements, arrangements, and contracts concluded by Bulgaria with Egypt as abrogated as from October 11, 1915.

"Bulgaria declares that she recognizes the French Protectorate in Morocco, and that she will make no claim on behalf of herself or her nationals to the benefits or immunities derived from the régime of the capitulations in Morocco regarding all Treaties, agreements, arrangements, and contracts concluded by Bulgaria with Morocco as abrogated as from October 11, 1915.

"Part IV.

"MILITARY, NAVAL, AND AIR CLAUSES.

"MILITARY CLAUSES.

"The military terms fix the total number of effectives of the Bulgarian Army, the sole function of which shall be to maintain internal order and control frontiers, at 20,000, including officers, and it is provided that there will be no other military forces raised outside this figure. This army shall be recruited both as regards officers and men on a voluntary basis; in the case of officers (who shall not be retired before the age of 40), for not less than 20 years' service, and in the case of non-commissioned officers and men, for not less than 12 years' service. The number of Customs, forestry, or police officials shall be fixed by a military Inter-Allied Commission of Control, and in no case shall the number of these officials who are armed with rifles exceed 10,000, so that the total number of rifles in use in Bulgaria shall not exceed 30,000.

"The proportion of officers, including personnel, staffs, and special services, shall not exceed one-twentieth of the total effectives with the colours, and that of non-commissioned officers shall not exceed one-fifteenth of the total effectives with the colours. The effectives of units shall be compulsorily fixed between the maximum and minimum figures laid down in the Treaty.

"On the expiration of three months of the coming into force of the present Treaty, there must only exist in Bulgaria one military school for the sole purpose of the recruitment of officers for the authorized units. The number of students admitted to instruction in the school shall be strictly in proportion to the vacancies to be filled in the officer cadres, and both cadres and students shall be reckoned as part of the effectives of the Bulgarian Army.

"Within three months of the coming into force of the present Treaty, the Bulgarian Government shall deposit in places notified by the Allied and Associated Powers any surplus of armament and munitions exceeding the figures fixed per thousand men in the present Treaty, and no other stock, depot, or reserve of munitions shall be formed. The number and calibre of guns constituting the fixed normal armament of fortified places existing at present in Bulgaria shall constitute the maximum amount which may not be exceeded. Within three months of the coming into force of the present Treaty, the maximum stock of ammunition for these guns will be reduced to and maintained at the rates of 1,500 rounds per gun of the calibre of 105 mm. and under, and 500 rounds per gun of higher calibre.

"No new fortifications shall be constructed in Bulgaria. No poisonous gas or liquid fire shall be manufactured or imported, nor any tanks nor armoured cars, and within three months of the coming into force of the present Treaty, all arms, munitions, and war material of whatever origin or kind existing in Bulgaria in excess of the authorized quantity shall be handed over to the principal Allied and Associated Powers at such point in Bulgarian territory as they may appoint. The Allied and Associated Powers shall also decide on the disposal of such material.

"The manufacture of arms, munitions, and of war material shall only be carried on in one single factory, controlled by and belonging to the State, whose output shall be strictly limited to such manufacture as is sanctioned above.

"NAVAL CLAUSES.

"The naval terms provide that from the date of the coming into force of the Treaty, all Bulgarian warships, including submarines existing or under construction, are finally to be surrendered to the principal Allied and Associated Powers or broken up. Submarines may not be constructed or acquired even for commercial purposes. All naval arms, munitions, and other war material belonging to Bulgaria at the date of the Armistice must be surrendered to the Allies. The Bulgarian wireless station at Sofia will be under Allied supervision and may only be used for commercial messages during the three months after the coming into force of the present Treaty. Nor during the same period may Bulgaria build any more high-power wireless stations.

"AIR CLAUSES.

"The air clauses provide that the armed forces of Bulgaria must not include any military or naval air forces. The entire personnel of the air forces in Bulgaria is to be demobilized within two months.

"The aircraft of the Allied and Associated Powers is to enjoy full liberty of passage and landing over and in Bulgarian territory until the complete evacuation of that territory by the Allied and Associated troops. The manufacture of aircraft and parts of aircraft is forbidden for six months. All military and naval aircraft, including dirigible and aeronautical material, are to be delivered on the ratification of the present Treaty.

"SECTION IV. Inter-Allied Commissions of Control.—All Military, Naval, and Air Clauses contained in the present Treaty for the execution of which a time limit is prescribed shall be executed by Bulgaria under the control of Inter-Allied Commissions appointed for this purpose by the Principal Allied and Associated Powers.

"The Inter-Allied Commissions of Control may establish their organizations at Sofia and shall be entitled to proceed as often as they think fit to any point in Bulgarian territory or to send sub-commissions to any such point. The Bulgarian Government must furnish to the Inter-Allied Commissions of Control all such information and documents as the latter may think necessary to ensure the execution of their mission, and all means (both in personnel and material) which said Commissions may need to ensure complete execution of the Military, Naval, or Air Clauses. The Bulgarian Government must also attach a qualified representative to each Inter-Allied Commission of Control with the duty of receiving the communications which the Commission may have to address to the Bulgarian Government and of furnishing it with or procuring all information or documents demanded.

"The upkeep and cost of the Inter-Allied Commissions of Control and the expense involved by their work shall be borne by Bulgaria.

"Part V.

"PRISONERS OF WAR AND GRAVES.

"This section follows the similar one in the Austrian Treaty, except for one article, which, in the case of Bulgaria, provides for an Inter-Allied Commission of Inquiry into offences against the laws of war committed by the Bulgarian Authorities and to search for non-repatriated Allied and Associated nationals.

"Parts VII. and VIII.

"REPARATION AND FINANCIAL CLAUSES.

"Reparation.—The Allied and Associated Governments, while recognizing that the resources of Bulgaria are insufficient to enable adequate reparation to be made, agree to accept from Bulgaria such reparation as she can make, and fix the sum of 2,250,000,000 (two-and-a-quarter milliards) of francs, in gold, which amount (except as hereinafter provided) shall be discharged by a series of half-yearly payments on January 1 and July 1 in each year, beginning on July 1, 1920. The payments on July 1, 1920, and January 1, 1921, shall represent interest at the rate of 2 per cent. per annum on the total sum from January 1, 1920. Thereafter each half-yearly payment shall include payment of interest at 5 per cent. per annum on the amount of the capital sum outstanding, and the provision of a sinking fund sufficient to extinguish the total amount on January 1, 1958.

"The sums shall be remitted through the Inter-Allied Commission referred to in this Treaty to the Reparation Commission created by the Treaty of Peace with Germany on June 28, 1919 (hereinafter referred to as the Reparation Commission), in accordance with the arrangements already made. The Reparation Commission shall have power at any time to dispose, either by sale or otherwise, of gold bonds based on the payments to be made by Bulgaria, the nominal amount of which bonds shall be fixed by it in consultation with the Inter-Allied Commission, but shall in no case exceed the total capital sums then outstanding. In such case Bulgaria undertakes to deliver to the Reparation Commission through the Inter-Allied Commission the necessary bonds in such form, number, and denominations and terms as the Reparation Commission may determine. Bonds so delivered shall be direct obligations of the Bulgarian Government, but all arrangements for the service of the bonds shall be made by the Inter-Allied Commission. The Inter-Allied Commission shall pay all interest, sinking fund, and other charges connected with the bonds out of the half-yearly payments to be made by Bulgaria in accordance with this Treaty. Any surplus shall continue to be paid to the order of the Reparation Commission.

"The Inter-Allied Commission shall have discretion to recommend to the Reparation Commission either the reduction of any particular payment due or a reduction of the total capital sum to be paid by Bulgaria, and the Reparation Commission shall have power by a majority of votes to make any such reduction or postponement up to the extent recommended by the Inter-Allied Commission. Bulgaria, on the other hand, shall have power at any time to make immediate payments in reduction of the total capital sum due over and above the half-yearly payments.

"While Bulgaria recognizes the transfer to the Allied and Associated Powers of any financial claims which her late allies may have against her, particularly those derived from the execution of undertakings entered into during the war, the Allied and Associated Powers agree not to require any payment in respect of those claims which have been taken into account in fixing the amount of the financial reparation to be paid by Bulgaria.

"Bulgaria undertakes to return to Greece, Rumania, and the Serb-Croat-Slovene State respectively all records, archives, and articles of archæological, historic, or artistic interest which have been taken away from the territories of these countries during the present war, and live stock of the descriptions and in the numbers set out in the Treaty, in restitution for the animals taken away by her during the war from the territories of the countries named. Bulgaria undertakes by way of special compensation for the destruction caused to the coal mines situated on Serbian territory by the Bulgarian armies to deliver to the Serb-Croat-Slovene State during five years from the coming into force of the present Treaty 50,000 (fifty thousand) tons of coal a year from the output of the State mines at Pernik, provided these deliveries are sanctioned by the Inter-Allied Commission, which will require to be satisfied that such deliveries of coal will not unduly interfere with the economic life of Bulgaria.

"The Inter-Allied Commission above referred to shall be established at Sofia as soon as possible after the coming into force of the present Treaty. It shall consist of three members, to be nominated respectively by the Governments of the British Empire, France, and Italy. Bulgaria shall be represented at the Commission by a Commissioner who shall take part in the sittings whenever invited by the Commission to do so, but shall not have the right to vote.

"In the law relating to the Commission there shall be laid down a list of the taxes and revenues (now existing or hereafter to be created) estimated to be sufficient to produce the sums above referred to. This list shall include all revenues or receipts arising from concessions made or to be made for the working of mines or quarries, or for the carrying on of any works of public utility, or of any monopolies for the manufacture or sale of any articles in Bulgaria. This list may be altered from time to time with the unanimous consent of the Commission.

"In case of default by Bulgaria in the performance of her obligations the Commission shall be entitled to the extent, and for the period it may determine, to assume the full control of and undertake the collection of such taxes and sources of revenue, and to hold and disburse the proceeds thereof, and to apply any net proceeds after meeting the cost of administration and collection to the satisfaction of reparation obligations of Bulgaria, subject to any priorities laid down in this Treaty.

"Financial.—Bulgaria is required to make the following payments in the following order of priority—

"1. Cost of military occupation.

"2. The service of such part of the external Ottoman Public Debt as a Commission appointed for the purpose may attribute to Bulgaria.

"3. The cost of reparation as prescribed by the present Treaty.

"Part IX.

"ECONOMIC CLAUSES.

"The Economic Clauses are virtually identical with those in the Austrian Treaty.

"In the section on property, rights, and interests, a modification has been introduced. The Bulgarian Government is required to revoke all the exceptional war measures affecting the property of Allied nationals, whereas similar measures put into operation by the Allied and Associated Powers are declared final and binding. Bulgaria, in a series of new provisions, is made responsible for certain obligations incurred by her owing to her acquisition of certain property after the Balkan Wars.

"Part XI.

"PORTS, WATERWAYS, AND RAILWAYS.

"The section dealing with Ports, Waterways, and Railways follows almost exactly the lines of the Austrian Treaty.

"Part XIII.

"MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS.

"This section follows the similar one in the Austrian Treaty, except for a few minor points."

INTERNATIONAL BROTHERHOOD OF LOCOMOTIVE ENGINEERS.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD four sections from the constitution and statutes of the Grand International Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers. I do not ask to have any of them read, but they will be found in the book which I send to the desk. The first is found on page 40, section 51; the second on page 53, section 92; the third on page 78, sections 34 and 35; and the fourth on page 93, section 10.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SEC. 51. Any member of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers who takes the place of anyone engaged in a strike recognized as legal by the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers shall be expelled when proven guilty, and shall forever be ineligible for readmittance to this brotherhood.

* * * * * * *

SEC. 92. All divisions, or members of divisions, are prohibited from issuing circulars or signing any form of petition relative to brotherhood business among members of the brotherhood or others. If issued by a division, its charter shall be suspended, and the length of such suspension shall be at the discretion of the grand chief engineer. If issued or signed by a member, he shall be suspended or expelled: Provided, That the foregoing shall not prevent or hinder in any manner any official or division of the brotherhood in properly conducting the business of the organization as to sending out notices, reports, etc., for the purpose of securing or giving information.

* * * * * * *

SEC. 34. Any member who by verbal or written communication to railroad officials or others, interferes with a grievance that is in the hands of a committee, or at any other time makes any suggestion to any official that may cause discord in any division, shall be expelled as per sections 49 and 54 of statutes when proven guilty: Provided, however, That this law shall not apply to a brother in official position when called upon to express an opinion in his official capacity.

* * * * * * *

SEC. 35. Any member of a general committee of adjustment who wilfully and premeditatedly does, with malicious intent, by act or word in the presence of any railroad official, injure any matter under discussion by said committee which has for its purpose the enforcement of the standing rules of the G. I. D., shall, by a two-thirds vote of said committee, be deprived of serving on the same, the general chairman to fill such vacancy from the membership of the division to which the deposed member belongs, he serving until relieved by one appointed by division so affected.

* * * * * * *

SEC. 10. Any member or division refusing to sustain the official acts or instructions of the legislative board or who circulates or signs a petition, or who, by verbal or written communication to railroad officials or others, that is calculated to injure or interfere with legislative matters offered by the legislative board, or at any time makes suggestions to railroad officials or to Dominion or provincial legislators that may be detrimental to the interest of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, or who by verbal or written communication to anyone calculated to injure or interfere with national legislative matters offered by our legislative representative at Washington, Canada, or Mexico, or at any time makes suggestions to anyone that may be detrimental to the interests of such legislation, shall be expelled when proven guilty, as per section 49 of statutes.

SHIPMENT OF WHEAT.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I have in my hand a letter from the United States Railroad Administration explaining that they can not move the wheat crop in the West more rapidly than they are now doing because there are no ships adequate to remove it from the ports; that the elevators are therefore congested; and that there is no use of loading the wheat on the cars because they can not get it stored or shipped faster than they are now doing. I ask to have the letter printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES RAILROAD ADMINISTRATION,
DIRECTOR GENERAL OF RAILROADS,
Washington, October 7, 1919.

MY DEAR SENATOR OWEN: Referring to the telegram from Mr. Whitehurst, of Oklahoma City, and our telephone conversation relative to the wheat situation in Oklahoma and elsewhere:

As I said to you yesterday, all of the ports are full of wheat and we have wheat in cars backed up at each one of them awaiting ships. The movement of wheat from these ports is limited very largely by the foreign vessels available, as the principal receivers, England, France, and Italy, will not use American ships for their wheat on account of the high cost compared with their own. Furthermore, shipping to English ports has been curtailed on account of the strike of railway employees. The Oklahoma wheat moves both to Kansas City and to the Gulf ports. At Galveston and the vicinity thereof the elevators are full and we have 3,000 cars awaiting unloading. We are only able to take 50 cars per day into Galveston from both Texas and Oklahoma. Kansas City elevators are full and a large number of cars are backed up awaiting unloading. We are only able to take into Kansas City 125 cars a day from all points west.

You can see it would be useless for us to continue to furnish cars for wheat when there is no possibility of wheat being taken from the ports in any greater quantities than at the present time. From my investigation I can not find that the rate of exchange has anything to do with the slow movement of wheat. It may have something to do with the slow movement of coarse grain, but that is a small part of our trouble at the present time.

For your information, we have moved about 65,000,000 bushels of wheat from the farms from the 1st of July to date in excess of the movement for the same period last year. For the Southwestern region we have moved from July 1 to date 65,610 cars of grain, which is 16,221 cars in excess of what was moved during the same period last year—an increase of 33.8 per cent. We are giving especial attention to the movement of wheat that is now on the ground in preference to any other.

I am sorry I can not give you greater assurance of relief for shippers in your State. I will be glad to keep you advised from time to time as the situation develops.

Yours, very truly, J. H. YOUNG.

HON. ROBERT L. OWEN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

THE PACKING INDUSTRY.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD an article embracing a summary of a discussion on the subject of the proposed Federal legislation for the control of the packing industry. It embraces a debate that took place between Mr. William B. Colver, the chairman of the Federal Trade Commission, and Prof. L. D. H. Weld, of Swift & Co., representing the American Institute of Meat Packers, before the National Swine Show, which was held at Des Moines, Iowa.

Mr. NORRIS. May I ask the Senator from Mississippi a question in regard to that article?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. From what publication did the Senator take it; from the Drovers' Journal, of Chicago?

Mr. HARRISON. From the Drovers' Journal, of Chicago.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection to its publication in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FARMERS HEAR BOTH SIDES OF PACKER CONTROVERSY—DEBATE BETWEEN TRADE COMMISSIONER COLVER AND PROF. L. D. H. WELD, OF SWIFT & CO., PROVES INTERESTING FEATURE OF DES MOINES SWINE SHOW.

[By L. E. Troeger.]

"DES MOINES, IOWA, October 3.

"National Swine Show visitors heard two sides of the packer controversy last night in a debate between William B. Colver, chairman of the Federal Trade Commission, and Prof. L. D. H. Weld, of Swift & Co., representing the Institute of American Meat Packers.

"W. J. Carmichael, secretary of the National Live Stock Growers' Association, presided and introduced the debaters briefly.

"Both speakers were accorded generous applause. Through a misunderstanding as to the place of debate and its inconvenience the attendance was small. It included leading business men of the city.

"Both speakers used charts and presented their cases in a ready, forceful manner. Mr. Colver opened the debate with a 40-minute argument and closed with a 10-minute rebuttal. Prof. Weld spoke for 30 minutes.

"The subject of the debate was 'Proposed Federal legislation for the control of the packing industry.'

"Chairman Colver discussed it in an indirect way, devoting most of his time to a review of the Federal Trade Commission's investigation of the food industry, which he said centered on the Big Five packers.

WHAT COMMISSION RECOMMENDED.

"He denied that the commission had recommended Government ownership or control of the packing industry. What the commission recommended was:

"1. Keep the yards open for all buyers of live stock.

"2. Provide refrigerator-car service for every meat shipper.

"3. Confine the packers to handling meat. That is a big enough job.

"Chairman Colver complained that it was impossible to get denials into the newspapers when the commission was attacked by the packers, a case in point being the charge that the body had conspired with foreign nations to buy meat lower and hurt live-stock producers.

"He emphatically denied this and challenged any packer to prove it. 'And they can't send a boy,' said he. 'They must come themselves.'

"Prof. Weld said that he regretted his opponent had not stuck to his subject, the Kenyon-Kendrick bills, as he was prepared to show they were unsound and full of danger for the packers and producers.

"'Government interference,' said he, 'is sure to make meat prices higher to the consumer and prices of live animals lower.'

"'Chairman Colver has said in discussing the packers that it was a good thing sometimes for a business to go through a receivership. It's a good thing sometimes to have typhoid fever, but there's a lot of danger in going through it,' said Prof. Weld, causing a ripple of laughter over the audience.

COLVER CHARGES MONOPOLY.

"Chairman Colver's argument in substance follows:

"'We set up the proposition after we had gotten into the investigation pretty well that there is a monopoly in the meat-packing industry.

"'It rests on a device for the division of purchases of animals. We found the five big packers united, operating together in many different lines and in the same proportion.

"'The proportion of the expenses connected with elections was worked out before the money was spent, sometimes not always the same, but it existed.

"'The annual appropriation of $5,000 to control the editor of the Provisioner was a case in point. Each of the big five contributed a certain proportion.

"'It works out on the purchase of live stock, hence there be no competition. It can't be explained as phenomena. There is a theory that it is plant capacity. But that can only be true if plants are working full capacity all time.

"'The five big concerns are buying live stock in 12 markets and we found them in various combinations. Sometimes two, three, another three or two, etc., and they claim the keenest competition.'

CHARTS INTRODUCED.

"Here a chart was introduced showing purchases by the packers. A red saw-tooth line showed fluctuation in prices paid for animals. A black line showing the result when the prices paid by the five at all points ran nearly straight across the chart.

"'It is called a coincidence," said Mr. Colver, 'but it's too big to explain that way.'

"Another chart was exhibited showing the relation of hog prices to the prices of pork cuts during August, 1919.

"A red irregular line indicating New York pork prices and a blue line for Boston prices showed a steady advance in prices.

"Another line showed the downward trend of live-hog prices at Chicago.

"'Do you see any relation between live hogs and pork prices?' asked the speaker. 'That difference is possible through control of the yards.'

HISTORY OF THE YARDS.

"'The history of the stock yards refutes the packers' statement that they can be operated without packer support. The packers have taken over most of the yards after they were developed.

"They permitted private ownership only as long as they could get rebates and bonuses, but when that was forbidden they began the absorption of the yards.

"'The only cases where independent packers are doing well is at privately owned yards. They have built up a three-story structure for the Chicago yards to absorb profits. A man don't know when he owns stock; he just has a warrant that he can have stock if he wants it.

"'We found the packers running into all kinds of food. The process is: First, get control of meats; second, get control of foods competing with meats.

HOW PACKERS GOT IN BUTTER.

"'They found butter competing with oleo, so they got control of butter. It is not the five big packers, but 574 big food firms owned by the packers. Twenty pages are required in our report to give a history of packers' progress. They carry on their business so they absorb the customer, then the man who sells to him. It works forward, sideways, and backward.

"'If continued for five years, the five firms will control all we eat. They tell about the little profits on beef and how they are just scrubbing along, but they never say anything about pork profits.

"'The Big Five in 1904 had a total worth of $92,000,000. Up to 1919 they put in $87,000,000 new capital and $105,000,000 dividends came out. Their capital now is $479,000,000.

"'They have a great publicity bureau, and you always hear their side. They give out copies of testimony at hearings before the witness goes on the stand. We can't get a fair hearing in the press.'

WELD SHOWS CHART ALSO.

"Prof. Weld offered a chart as his first exhibit, showing the trend of hog prices since June 1, showing the high point on July 21.

"A line showed the trend of pork loins, a very small part of the fresh part of the carcass. It showed a trend generally upward for the period.

"Another line showed the trend of the principal fresh pork products. It was in keeping with hog prices.

"'Mr. Colver's chart shows only the trend of pork loins,' declared Prof. Weld, 'a very small part of the fresh cuts.

"'The reason why loins have been high is that the supply of hogs has been light, as usual at this time of the year, and there has been a heavy demand for loins.

"'Cured products have declined in price with the live animal. My opponent's diagram is not a fair picture of the hog situation.

"'Why have prices of hogs fallen off? Here are the reasons:

"'1. Slump in foreign demand and pooling of future orders with the avowed intention of buying on a 12-cent basis.

"'2. Agitation on high cost of living.

"'In the packers' cellars to-day is the product of 2,000,000 hogs, representing an invoice of $17,000,000. This invoice value has decreased $10,000,000 to $12,000,000.

"'Can you see where they are making any profit in hogs under present prices?

ANSWERS CHARGES OF MONOPOLY.

"'Two charges are made against us:

"'(1) We are a monopoly.

"'(2) We are getting control of other foods.

"'The first charge is based on the percentage of purchases being fairly constant, but which are a natural result of competition and not agreement.

"'There is not a single bit of evidence to support this, more than it is a coincidence. The truth is that each packer watches the other so closely that it is impossible for one to gain on the other.

"'We keep figures, it is true, showing the percentage of purchases. But they are to keep our buyers in the race. If the percentage at our Omaha house drops, the manager is likely to be called to account. We want and must get our share.

"'The percentage figures don't remain quite so constant as you think. Swift's percentages of cattle purchases of the number bought by the big packers increased from 33 to 35 per cent from 1913 to 1918. They all try to increase the percentage.

"'We have never used the plant-capacity theory, but I agree it is not a phenomenon. It applies to smaller packers, so they must have an agreement, too. It also applies to other trades where competition is keen.

"'The "50–50" reference to the purchases at Denver in a letter cited by the commission meant that Armour wanted to get that per cent if possible. But the commission failed to show that Swift's per cent runs 55 against Armour's 45 per cent.

"'They are greatly alarmed because we are extending to other lines. They are fearful of what they call the 1920 model of packing organization, but I say it is just as much more efficient and economical than the old form of business as the 1920 automobile is superior to the old model.

"'The attacks on our methods create a scare without basis of fact. They seem to be an obsession on the part of the Government authorities. It is being used to create distrust.

"'The handling of other products makes a better outlet for meat products. It is not a menace, but a public service, and it is not fair to say control, as the percentage of food handled is so small.'

WHY PACKERS GOT OTHER LINES.

"Prof. Weld then went into an explanation of how and why the packers had gotten into other lines.

"'They bought an Illinois coal mine to insure a daily supply of fuel. Swift uses 40 carloads a day at Chicago.

"'They went into tanning to prevent being at the mercy of tanneries and to make it unnecessary to tie up capital for so long. They tan only about half the hides they get. About half the hides used in the United States are imported, and the packers do not anywhere near control the supply.

"'They must figure close to prevent any more money being tied up than possible, as they pay out $2,000,000 a day to stockmen at Chicago and do not get any return short of several weeks, and not all for many weeks.

"'The packers got into selling other foods to use their big corps of salesmen, their 400 branch houses, refrigerator service, delivery trucks, etc.

"'It has made more direct marketing from farm to consumer, and better service all around.

"'Swift's only food side lines are butter, eggs, poultry, cheese, and dried fish.

"'The commission says the Big Five handle 50 per cent of the supply of these products entering trade channels. The fact is that Swift handles 6 per cent of butter, eggs, and poultry entering trade channels and the Big Five handle about 15 per cent.

THE RICE CONTROL FALLACY.

"'Mr. Colver said the retail grocers would disappear in five years. But our control amounts to only about 3 per cent of the grocery business.

"'They mentioned in a report that Armour handled 16,000,000 pounds of rice in 1916. That is 1 per cent of the total United States consumption. I could give scores of such misrepresentations of facts and suppression of information.'

"Prof. Weld closed his argument with reasons why the K-K bills are objectionable and a menace to the live stock and packing industry, giving those which have been advanced heretofore and which are familiar to readers of the Drovers Journal, and declared the legislation drastic, revolutionary, and setting a precedent for Government control of all business.

"'There would be small chance that a man of packing experience would be put over us,' said he, 'for if there was the country would say the Secretary of Agriculture had sold out to the packers.'

COLVER IN REBUTTAL.

"In his rebuttal Mr. Colver declared the big packers were too efficient already, and that one small packer now falls by the wayside through this efficiency every 60 days. He cited the Veeder letter as the most conclusive evidence of an agreement between the Big Five to control the market.

"Against Prof. Weld's example of direct marketing he cited the handling of 800 cans of tomatoes by a Swift subsidiary, Libby, McNeill & Libby, three times.

"There was no more danger in putting a man in control of the packing business than we now have in the relation of the Comptroller of Currency to banks. This power could be under the review of the courts.

"'An Omaha packer says the packers are bigger than the Government,' said Mr. Colver in conclusion. 'We will have the Big Five in control of the Government or the Government in control of the Big Five.'"

PEACE TREATY AND LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I ask permission to have read at the desk two telegrams from Los Angeles, Calif.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

LOS ANGELES, CALIF., October 7, 1919.

Senator WILLIAM E. BORAH,
Washington, D. C.:

Our attention called to 2,000-word telegram sent Minority Leader HITCHCOCK by highly financed local branch of the League to Enforce Peace. A complete answer to their propaganda may be found in the fact that Senator JOHNSON addressed two of the most enthusiastic audiences ever gathered in this city, the evening meeting of more than 7,000 persons completely filling the largest hall in the city. As vice president of the meeting, there were present several hundred business men, bankers, judges, lawyers, including three former United States Senators—Cornelius Cole, who was in the Senate during Lincoln's administration; Frank P. Flint; John D. Works; former Gov. Henry T. Gage; and just plain, common people. One result of the meeting was a telegram, signed by men above mentioned and many others, including prominent Democrats, asking Senator PHELAN to join Senator JOHNSON in his valiant fight for Americanism and calling attention to inconsistency of condemning Japanese in California while tolerating them in Shantung. Suggest that Senator PHELAN produce telegram for the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Please advise Senate that red-blooded Americans are just as numerous in Los Angeles as they are elsewhere in the United States, and sentiment against the league and treaty is rapidly growing as a result of Senator JOHNSON'S visit. JOHNSON has always taken his fights to the common people of California, who are with him now more earnestly than ever before. This organization numbers many returned soldiers among its members, including two majors, as officers thereof. There is no question but that a great majority of the people of this city and the southern portion of California are absolutely behind Senator JOHNSON and his colleagues in the Senate who are trying to preserve our national welfare, honor, and independence.

LEAGUE FOR PRESERVATION OF AMERICAN INDEPENDENCE, LOS ANGELES BRANCH, ROBERT M. CLARKE, President.
FRANK S. HUTTON, Secretary.

LOS ANGELES, CALIF., October 7, 1919.

Hon. WILLIAM E. BORAH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Clarke, signing telegram, is former superior judge and Maj. Hutton, secretary, was in charge of draft of State all through the war.

MEYER LISSNER.

Mr. PHELAN subsequently said: Mr. President, I have just read the telegram which was read from the desk during my temporary absence, in which it is stated by gentlemen in Los Angeles that they had sent me a telegram to be inserted in the RECORD and calling attention to the very great success of the meeting at which Senator JOHNSON spoke in that city. The telegram evidently was sent in answer to one that was read into the RECORD by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] the day before, in which it was made to appear that a great many had regretted that their names had been used as vice presidents and had withdrawn their names as indorsing that meeting, thereby indicating their opposition, not so much to the Senator from California as to the opponents of the league of nations.

The gentlemen have seen fit to animadvert upon my position in opposing the presence and immigration of the Japanese into California, while at the same time supporting the provision of the treaty which gives the Province of Shantung in part to the Japanese as against the Chinese. Of course, a Senator's first duty is to his own country; and I desire simply to say that I am opposing by every possible means the introduction of the Japanese into California, as the Chinese are opposing the absorption of their territory by the Japanese. With the Chinese I have a very sincere sympathy, but I am not quite sure how far the United States should commit itself to taking up the cudgels for the Chinese, a nation consisting of 400,000,000 people. I recall the stanzas of Byron:

Hereditary bondsmen! know ye not.
Who would be free, themselves must strike the blow?

And unless the Chinese take the initiative in the expulsion of the Japanese from their territory it is asking a great deal to call upon another nation to do so, in view of the fact that treaty obligations on the part of France and Great Britain with the Japanese seem to give a certain protection to the claim of Japan, of which treaty obligations the United States had no knowledge, however, when it went into the recent conference at Versailles. The league is designed to stop this practice in future. I think it is irrelevant for the gentlemen to bring up in such a manner the Japanese question in California. I am opposed to the Japanese in California, and I am opposed to the Japanese without authority or consent from the people of China taking any part of the territory of China; but as a Senator of the United States I recognize the important fact that treaty obligations give the Japanese some color of title, but voidable and subject to attack. The league will also take cognizance of this. I will be pleased to discuss that question at much greater length, and I intend to do so before the final vote upon this question.

I must say, however, that I have not received the telegram referred to. I have sent to my office, and am advised that it has not yet been received; and I presume, since it appears that only the League to Enforce Peace is properly financed, that these thrifty gentlemen may have sent it by mail, and not by wire. When it is received I will be glad to have it printed in the RECORD, as requested.

After a few moments' pause, Mr. PHELAN said:

Mr. President, I have just heard from my office that the telegram referred to by the gentleman from Los Angeles in the dispatch presented by the Senator from Idaho has not been received; but I have received another telegram of like import from Mr. W. B. Williams and others, and also several telegrams in opposition.

I desire to state that when the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] arrived in Los Angeles for the purpose of making an address, I am informed, he was met by delegates from the Central Labor Council, from the Chamber of Commerce, and from five other civic bodies, asking him to withdraw his opposition to the league, and that evening he made his address. These telegrams were sent subsequently; and I ask unanimous consent that they be printed in the RECORD in answer to the one submitted by the Senator from Idaho.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SANTA ANA, CALIF., October 6, 1919.

Hon. JAMES D. PHELAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

We respectfully urge you to join HIRAM JOHNSON in his fight against the Japanese occupation of Shantung and his demands for equal representation with the British in the league of nations.

Senator JAMES D. PHELAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Members of First Methodist Episcopal Church South, of Hollywood, Calif., voted unanimous indorsement of immediate ratification of treaty and league of nations covenant without amendments or reservations. They believe the covenant is a notable triumph for American principles and the opposition wholly unwarranted and contrary to public sentiment.

Senator JAMES D. PHELAN,
Washington, D. C.:

Referring to our telegram of September 26 in reference to cold-storage bill, we understand this matter has been taken up by the Interstate Commerce Committee. Senator CUMMINS, chairman, and we request that you voice our opposition to the bills.

DRIED FRUIT ASSOCIATION OF CALIFORNIA.

LOS ANGELES, CALIF., October 5, 1919.

Hon. JAMES D. PHELAN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We believe that the treaty of peace and covenant for the league of nations should be ratified without reservations or amendments at the earliest possible date. Official action of our church on ratification Sunday in Los Angeles.

Sincerely, yours,

Rev. R. H. JONES, D. D.

LOS ANGELES, CALIF., October 6, 1919.

Hon. JAMES D. PHELEN,
Washington, D. C.:

The Syrian American Association, all of whom are citizens of the United States, unqualifiedly support the President and the league of nations and have passed resolutions to that effect. This association represents 192 intelligent, loyal, and worth-while families in Los Angeles who desire to be placed on record as standing firmly behind the league of nations without enfeebling reservations, and whose earnest desire is that you may lend your strong support to the same end.

SAN FRANCISCO, October 7, 1919.

Hon. JAMES D. PHELAN,
Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The Lafayette Club of San Francisco, a nonpartisan political organization duly incorporated, comprising a membership of over 2,000 American citizens, in general meeting assembled on the 6th day of October, 1919, unanimously adopted the following resolution:

Whereas the treaty of peace and the covenant of the league of nations represent the combined wisdom and statesmanship of the greatest nations of the world; and

Whereas we believe that the prompt ratification of said treaty and covenant without amendment by the allied and associated powers would subserve the best interests of all nations and would immediately result in restoring to more normal conditions the affairs and business of the world:

Now, therefore, we respectfully, but urgently request the Hon. JAMES D. PHELAN and the Hon. HIRAM W. JOHNSON, our United States Senators representing the State of California, to use their best endeavors to secure the prompt ratification of said treaty and covenant without amendment.

PETER TREICH, President.
JOHN ARBES, Secretary.

PERSONAL EXPLANATIONS—VOTES ON FALL AMENDMENTS.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, I understand that in some of the press dispatches it has been stated that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] was absent, but not paired on the votes on the Fall amendments. This statement is incorrect. The Senator from South Dakota was paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE], his pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] having been transferred to that Senator. If the Senator from South Dakota had been present, he would have voted against the Fall amendments. He was absent on account of illness in his family.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in view of the statement made by the Senator from Rhode Island respecting the attitude of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] upon the Fall amendments, I should like to say that when those amendments were voted upon in the Senate I was absent from the city on account of illness. I had understood before leaving the city that a pair had been arranged and that my position would be announced and thoroughly understood upon any votes taken upon the treaty. Apparently there was some misunderstanding and the pair was not arranged for all votes. If I had been present, I should have voted against each of the Fall amendments.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a petition of the National Association of United States Civil Service Employees at Navy Yards and Stations, praying for grant of not less than 40 per cent increase in salaries of all clerical employees of the Naval Establishments, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CAPPER presented a petition of Local Lodge No. 277, Brotherhood of Railway Carmen, of Parsons, Kans., praying for the adoption of the so-called Plumb plan for the operation and control of railroads, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of Pleasant Valley Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, of Hackney, Kans., remonstrating against universal military training, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. FERNALD presented a memorial of Local Grange No. 321, Patrons of Husbandry, of Wilton, Me., remonstrating against the adoption of the proposed plan of the Secretary of the Interior to reclaim swamp and arid lands, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HALE presented a petition of Napoleon OueLette Post, American Legion, of Rumford, Me., praying for an investigation into alleged unnecessary wrongs inflicted upon officers and soldiers of the American Expeditionary Forces, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

CUTTING OF TIMBER ON THE PUBLIC DOMAIN.

Mr. PITTMAN. From the Committee on Public Lands I report back unanimously, with an amendment to the title, the bill (S. 1) authorizing the cutting of timber for mining purposes by corporations organized in one State and conducting mining operations in another, and I submit a report (No. 256) thereon. The bill has passed the Senate three times in prior sessions. Its purpose is simply to grant corporations organized in other States the same rights in the State of Nevada with regard to timber on the public lands and water rights that domestic corporations have. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, and it was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of an act entitled "An act authorizing the citizens of Colorado, Nevada, and the Territories to fell and remove timber on the public domain for mining and domestic purposes," approved June 3, 1878, chapter 150, page 88, volume 20, United States Statutes at Large, and section 8 of an act entitled "An act to repeal timber-culture laws, and for other purposes" approved March 3, 1891, as amended by an act approved March 3, 1891, chapter 559, page 1093, volume 26, United States Statutes at Large, and the several acts amendatory thereof, be, and the same are hereby, extended so that it shall be lawful for the Secretary of the Interior to grant permits to corporations incorporated under a Federal law of the United States or incorporated under the laws of a State or Territory of the United States, other than the State in which the privilege is requested, said permits to confer the same rights and benefits upon such corporations as are conferred by the aforesaid acts upon corporations incorporated in the State in which the privilege is to be exercised: Provided, That all such corporations shall first have complied with the laws of that State so as to entitle them to do business therein; but nothing herein shall operate to enlarge the rights of any railway company to cut timber on the public domain.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill authorizing the cutting of timber by corporations organized in one State and conducting operations in another."

COLD-STORAGE REGULATIONS.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, a few days ago while I was in the chair—I mention that fact so as to take the responsibility for it—the bill (H. R. 9521) to prevent hoarding and deterioration of, and deception with respect to cold-storage foods, to regulate shipment of cold-storage foods in interstate commerce, and for other purposes, was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce. That committee properly has jurisdiction of the subject matter, but the bill was considered in the other House by the Committee on Agriculture, and, in my opinion, it ought to be considered in the Senate by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. For that reason I have been directed by the Committee on Interstate Commerce to ask that that committee be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that it be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. OVERMAN:

A bill (S. 3185) to provide for the establishment of a United States naval coaling station at Southport, N. C. (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

A bill (S. 3186) to provide for an examination and survey of the harbor at Southport, N. C., with a view to increasing the depth of said harbor (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. HALE:

A bill (S. 3187) to dispose of a certain strip of public land in Waterville, Me. (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. GORE:

A bill (S. 3188) providing for an increase in salary for the United States district attorney for the western judicial district of Oklahoma; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. SMITH of Maryland:

A bill (S. 3190) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Pocomoke River, at Pocomoke City, Md.; to the Committee on Commerce.

RENT COMMISSION IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill; and I should like to state to the Senate, in a word, just what it proposes.

The so-called rent bill with reference to the District of Columbia went into conference, and after two or three weeks of discussion and some compromises the conference report was agreed to and passed through the Senate. It went out in the House on a point of order, striking out what all the conferees, both of the House and Senate, think was a vital provision that ought to be in the rent bill.

I have taken the conference report, with the exception of the term of the law, which, under the conference report, was to be three years, and made it four years, which it was agreed by all of the conferees, both of the House and Senate, would be preferable to three, and put it in the shape of a bill. I now introduce it, and ask that it be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The bill (S. 3189) to create a rent commission in the District of Columbia was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I wish to have published in the RECORD a petition in the shape of resolutions coming from the committee and chairman, members of the Red Cross and Liberty Loan Workers and Council of Defense Workers of Hollywood, Calif., signed by some of the most prominent people of that section, and very emphatically worded, in favor of an immediate ratification of the treaty without reservations or amendments.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"We favor league. War workers' organization, Hollywood, Calif. Committee and chairman members of the Red Cross and liberty-loan workers and council of defense workers of Hollywood, Calif.

"We are sending to the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations of the United States an important message. We know our soldiers have laid a foundation for world peace, and the people of the United States want it. With sincerity and firm purpose we have set our faces toward the goal; men and women are in this equal fight urging that the peace treaty containing the covenant of the league of nations be promptly ratified. The great sacrifice of our soldiers is calling now to us to finish what they began. The loyalty of peace must now inherit the loyalty awakened and offered in war. There must be fruit for the spirit of 8,000,000 men who died for a cause, a better world. They call to us to ring out of this great cause the awful party strife (that will make a black spot in our history) and hasten to ring in the noble modes of life, the love of truth and right, the common love of good to all mankind—the dead ask this of us.

"The undersigned urge that the peace treaty containing the covenant of the league of nations be promptly ratified by the Senate of the United States without attempting to embarrass it by amendments, thus delaying the conclusion of peace and the establishment of a greater agency for its future preservation.

Shewman, 1811 Tamarind Avenue, Los Angeles; R. E. Briggs, 1345 West Seventeenth Street, Los Angeles.

"These are the names of officials in various war drives. They have been holding community meetings. We have given careful consideration to all objections that you (especially JOHNSON) have offered to ratification, and we are all now convinced that the treaty should be ratified without amendment or reservation.

"We believe in the league, and are ready to work and fight for it as we did to gain the war.

"By a unanimous vote we joined the organization to promote the League to Enforce Peace and the adoption of the league of nations.

"We unanimously voted to ask JOHNSON to reverse his action with regard to the league, and to give it his immediate and hearty support if he ever expects votes in California again.

"(The signers above ask this.)"

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to add to that a request to publish in the RECORD a magnificent article which appeared in the Public Ledger of Philadelphia, signed by Henry Wharton, whom a majority of Senators know by reputation, at any rate, as a very able man and a very original thinker. It admits that the peace treaty is short of perfection, but declares that rejection invites world disaster. I ask that that be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADMITS PEACE TREATY IS SHORT OF PERFECTION, BUT DECLARES REJECTION INVITES DISASTER—WRITER TAKES ISSUE WITH THE 18 SIGNERS TO THE OPEN LETTER TO THE UNITED STATES SENATE PROTESTING AGAINST TREATY AND SAYS THEY WOULD JEOPARDIZE WHOLE WORK OF CONFERENCE.

To the EDITOR OF PUBLIC LEDGER.

SIR: I have greatly admired the Public Ledger's courageous stand on the league of nations and the peace treaty. It is not always easy to go ahead, even when you are sure you are right particularly in a hard-and-fast party stronghold like Philadelphia, despite the sound advice of David Crockett. I have also been impressed with your broadmindedness in printing both sides of the question.

In this latter connection I have been struck by a letter which has but recently come to my attention. I refer to the letter published in your issue of September 1 addressed to Members of the United States Senate and signed by 18 men and women whom I take to be Friends (Quakers) and so-called pacifists or conscientious objectors, or both, the letter being transmitted to you by Edward W. Evans in a note dated August 28, 1919.

It is perhaps rather late to recall it, for in the topsy-turvy world of to-day so much happens overnight that one is apt to forget even the sensations of yesterday. But this letter to which I refer, albeit well expressed and evidently most sincere, is not only so contradictory in itself as to be almost paradoxical, but also totally at variance with the previously expressed views of at least some of this group that one wonders why this has come about—what change has come over the spirit of their dreams. As this applies equally to all of their way of thinking who are now opposing the peace treaty, and as I am still in agreement with them as regards my dislike of and disbelief in militarism, I would like to put to them what seems to me some pertinent questions by way of answer.

In the first place, I would like to ask them why they, of all people, who at one time were accused of being for peace at any price, or, as I believe, were willing to pay a big price for peace, which they then thought essential for the salvation of the world, are now urging others to refuse the peace that is now offered to us because they do not like the price.

Admitted that the terms of the treaty are far from perfect, is it not a fact that these terms have been agreed to by the accredited representatives both of the Allies and Germany? Also, is it not true that they were only agreed to after many months of desperate pulling and hauling and that they are the only ones now before us, so that to refuse them would be to begin all over again, there being no alternative?

And if, as seems evident enough, Mr. Wilson was weakened by the pressure on him by the reactionaries over there, encouraged by the attacks on him by the reactionaries here at home, what do they (the writers of the letter to which I refer and their like) think they will gain by striking hands with those very reactionaries who weakened the hands of the President? For, plainly, the reactionaries on both sides of the Atlantic do not want a league of nations, and as the reactionaries are in control in France and in the ascendency in Italy and would be in England were it not for Lloyd-George—whatever one thinks of him—to refuse to accept the peace treaty or to return it to Paris with amendments, which would amount to the same thing as refusing it, would in all human probability not only result in a worse treaty from our point of view, but also in the loss of the league of nations as well—or chaos.

The signers of this letter to the Senate not only admit but maintain that the supreme need is for a league of nations in order to bring about "the uprooting of the evil thing which has brought this woe"—"the destruction of militarism and the day of disarmament." As they truly say, "to continue the blood-stained error of the past is to invite for posterity catastrophe far beyond all that we know."

That being so, the present peace treaty is purely secondary to the league of nations and is capable of adjustment when the passions bred by war that still influence the world have subsided.

Then why jeopardize the whole for a part?

If to defeat the league of nations would invite disaster in future—and one has only to look at Fiume to see that even delays are dangerous—then who will be responsible therefor? The framers of the treaty or the reactionaries who either do not want a league of nations or who are willing, for their own selfish ends, to put a spoke in its wheel, plus those well-meaning idealists who insist upon perfection all at once and in their blind haste to attain it would put the cart before the horse, would sacrifice the substance for the shadow?

Finally, why is it that they who, when we would have had a triumphant Germany to treat with, urged the Allies to make peace for the sake of stopping the slaughter, trusting in God and public opinion to regenerate an unrepentant Germany, are not now willing, after the Allies have prevailed, to trust in the same God and public opinion to soften and straighten out the mistakes of the Allies? Most natural mistakes of people who have suffered even unto their very souls from more than four years of desperate strggle with death and destruction, so that they are still not able to see their present path clear, let alone their future!

Can it be that these idealists placed more belief in a war-maddened Germany than they do in their war-stricken friends and Allies who were dealt such foul blows by that same Germany?

It seems to me that the answer is, not that these high-minded idealists have lost their faith, not that they are pro-German, but that they, too, have suffered anguish in their souls from overcontemplation of the horrors of this bloody war, and that once the war was over and the reaction come, in the joy of rekindled hope, they, following their natural bent, thought that not only the dawn but the day itself had come. So they have come to believe that now is the moment—and now only—and that nothing short of perfection will do.

Not being able to realize fully—who, indeed, can who has not suffered the like?—how impossible it is for men whose homes have been destroyed, the flower of whose youth have been slain in defense of those homes, to reason clearly and dispassionately the very moment the battle is won and retribution within their grasp; and, judging all others by their own high ideals, they, too, these earnest idealists, have lost their way in the fog of feeling born of war's bitter hates that still envelop the world, and so they can not see the light to come.

For myself I have no doubt whatever about the matter, and firmly believe that not to accept the peace treaty would be the gravest of mistakes. Americans who were in Paris in December, when President Wilson first arrived, and who happened also to return there later on, say in March and April, saw things grow in a very curious way. And to those who could read the multitudinous French newspapers freely, and particularly the so-called "intellectuals," the trend of thought was quite evident. Some of the latter, indeed, were even talking of "1814," etc., meaning thereby the boundaries forced on an unhappy and an unwilling world by that greatest of all disturbers of the peace, Napoleon Bonaparte. But how 18 plus 14 equaled the 14 articles was quite beyond my simple arithmetic.

No; it is not a perfect treaty. How, indeed, under the circumstances, could a perfect treaty have been framed, let alone consummated? But to reject it would invite disaster.

Recommend, if you please, interpret, if you prefer, but do not amend or reserve, for the first means rejection and the second nullification.

HENRY WHARTON.

SAUNDERSTOWN, R. I., September 27, 1919.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, there appeared in the Times of Los Angeles, Calif., a magnificent description of the visit of the President to the Pacific coast and of the effect of that visit. It is entitled "The thoughts he left." I ask that it be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"THE THOUGHTS HE LEFT.

"The President has come to Los Angeles and gone, leaving behind him thoughts that have compelled thousands to assume a different attitude toward the league of nations.

"No man or woman who heard the President with the determination that they would not be convinced by him is convinced.

"But those who went with open minds, willing to listen and judge, have a new appreciation for the league of nations.

"The President's address in Los Angeles was effective.

"He made the people awaken to the real meaning of the covenant in a manner in which they would not have been awakened had he not have come here.

"In the first place, the President emphasized the fact that the covenant will prevent wars, and that had it been in effect in 1914 the world would have never been dragged through the late holocaust.

"If the covenant would prevent 10 per cent of the wars, the President argued, it would be worth its adoption.

"In his opinion, however, it would prevent 98 per cent of the wars.

"He pointed out how each member of the league bound itself not to enter into war until after nine months of deliberation and attempts at settlement of the matter in dispute, and called attention to the certain conclusion that nine months' enlightened discussion would have prevented the terrible experiences of the world during the past five years.

"He called attention to the fact that during all the years of discussion as to means for preventing wars there has never been any plan evolved excepting a plan for a world league.

"After having explained so clearly what the future of the world would be under a league of nations, one naturally wondered why we would stand willing to sacrifice so great a blessing to mankind for the sake of a few slight objections.

"And then the President took up the objections, and the only objections, as all know, that we have heard anything much about and which are worthy at all of consideration, are the objections that Great Britain should not have six votes in the assembly of the league to one vote of the United States and the objection that the United States should not countenance the Shantung settlement.

"Great Britain's so-called six votes, he pointed out, were only advisory votes, and were worth no more than the one vote of the United States.

"The six votes which Great Britain has are in the assembly of the league, where a representation is given to the six great nations that go to make up Great Britain.

"This assembly is only for the purposes of debate and advice.

"Final action is taken by the council of the league, where Great Britain and the United States each have but one vote.

"He asked if it would be fair to give Cuba and Panama a representation in the assembly and deprive such great nations as Canada and Australia of the right to enter into discussions.

"If the United States were given 48 votes in the assembly, where would it be any better off than with its 1 vote?"

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, in connection with this request, I have not very often asked to have anything printed in the RECORD, but I have here a sermon by Rev. Charles Wadsworth, jr., D. D., delivered in the Union Chapel, Magnolia, Mass., Sunday, July 13, 1919. I think it will be found very interesting in connection with the subject of the peace treaty, and I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEBUCHADNEZZAR'S IMAGE—A DISCOURSE DELIVERED IN THE UNION CHAPEL, MAGNOLIA, MASS., SUNDAY, JULY 13, 1919, BY CHARLES WADSWORTH, JR., D. D.—A MODERN VIEW OF AN ANCIENT AUTOCRAT.

"Nebuchadnezzar the king made an image of gold." (Daniel 3:1.)

"Nebuchadnezzar was an oriental autocrat, and this image which he set up represented the high-water mark, the culmination of his autocracy. It is difficult for Americans to imagine an autocratic personality. We have been accustomed for so long to constitutional liberty and to the happy conditions of a republican government that the idea of one man attempting to impose his personal opinion upon a nation, to say nothing of the entire world, would be inconceivable. This third chapter of the Book of Daniel brings before us an interesting example of an autocrat, and it is worth our while to study it, as we study extinct monsters like the mastodon and mammoth, which in former ages pranced about upon the earth, but are never seen to-day. Especially in the early part of July is such a study appropriate, when the spirt of Independence Day is still with us, as it will help us to appreciate our blessings and see how far we have advanced beyond the forlorn conditions of a benighted past.

"In the brief study of autocracy which I shall make I would ask you to consider first what the autocrat did; second, why he did it; and third, the results.

"First, What did the autocrat do?

"'Nebuchadnezzar the king made an image of gold.' He did not consult with his subjects, nor even with the rulers of his kingdom. What were they, that he should consult with them? They were merely inferior beings, who ought to be only too thankful to accept with becoming humility whatever of light or beauty he might condescend to communicate to them. So he resolved in his own superior will and carried out the conclusions of his own exalted mind. He made an image embodying his own ideas of contour and proportion.

"One of his aims was size.

"He made his image three score cubits high. He wanted the biggest. He wanted to put more into it than had ever been put into an image before. We have never seen the image, but we may be sure it was a grotesque conglomeration of incongruities. But as he had evolved it out of his inner consciousness, it represented his ideal and seemed to him perfect and sacrosanct. For anyone to criticize it would have been sacrilege, a sure sign of depravity. To suggest that it could be improved or that it needed amendment would have been both blasphemy and treason, the act of men without vision and without shame. At last perfection had been wrought out, and woe to any reprobates who did not immediately recognize and reverence the revelation thus generously given.

"Nebuchadnezzar made his grotesque image out of gold, the precious metal; and this fact is an illustration of the truth that the finest material can be put to mean uses and twisted into undesirable and ridiculous shapes. It is possible to take a really choice idea or a really noble aspiration, such as the yearning for peace and brotherhood, the very gold of the spirit, and mutilate it into a crazy contrivance. It is possible to play politics with a holy sentiment, such as the hatred of war. The fault lies, not in the material used, not in the idea or aspiration exploited, but in the crude egotism of the autocrat who works precious gold up into a monstrosity. When this deformity, hatched in his own brain, had been wrought out in all its grotesque details by Nebuchadnezzar, he brought it forth from its concealment and forced it upon the people. For those were still the dark days of secret diplomacy, and the world had not yet reached the high enlightenment, where "open covenants are openly arrived at." So this weird image which had been conceived in secret was suddenly set up before a submissive horde.

"To the egotistic mind of the autocrat it seemed the loveliest creation which had ever glorified the low plain of earthly life, something almost too ethereally beautiful for mere mortality. As Minerva was fabled to have sprung full armed in all her dazzling splendor from the head of Jupiter, so this contrivance had sprung from his supernal intelligence complete in its amazing perfection. You remember Kipling's wonderful poem,

'Evarra and his Gods,' in which with the intuition of genius he expounded the psychology of conceited image makers:

"Read here,
This is the story of Evarra—man—
Maker of gods in lands beyond the sea."

"After 'in lands beyond the sea' he had finished his monstrous contrivance, then 'drunk with pride,' he wrote above it:

"Thus gods are made,
And whoso maketh them otherwise shall die.

"That is the attitude and language of all dogmatists and autocrats. They are so obsessed of their own subjectivity, so carried away with admiration for their own weird device, so drunk with pride, that they declare: 'Thus creeds are made, and he who makes them otherwise shall die.' 'Thus ideals, thus Utopias are made, and whoso makes them otherwise shall die.' 'Thus treaties are made, and whoso makes them otherwise, has his eyes on the ground, has no vision, and is anathema.'

"If the aim of Nebuchadnezzar had been to get his image right, what it really ought to have been if humanity was to accept it, he would, of course, have consulted with the wisest men of his country. If he had been seeking sincerely to appropriately embody a worthy ideal, and help the world, he would have invited comment and suggestion, and have submitted his image to the tests of logic and to the canons of art. But his aim was not exalted. It was egoistic. He was interested, not in getting the best for his country, but in forcing upon his country his own handiwork. He was first of all out to assert himself. No one was to touch his idea. He arranged matters so that no change could be made. The image as it came from his infallible hands was to be forced upon his nation.

"To behold the indescribable device, he assembled his vassals upon the plain of Dura. To them, the final beauty, the perfection of wisdom, the climax of leadership, was to be unveiled—not for their consideration or debate, but for their unquestioning and immediate acceptance. So they stood before the image which Nebuchadnezzar had made. 'Then an herald cried aloud:

"'To you it is commanded, O peoples, nations, and languages, that at what time ye hear the sound of the cornet, flute, harp, sackbut, psaltery, dulcimer, and all kinds of music, ye fall down and worship the golden image that Nebuchadnezzar the king hath set up. And whoso falleth not down and worshippeth shall the same hour be cast into the midst of a burning fiery furnace.'

"The threat of a burning fiery furnace is the favorite threat of autocrats in all ages. If you do not do what I say, you will be consumed. The demagogic autocrat says, 'If you do not accept my device, I will set the people on you. Do what I say or you will be cast into the burning fiery furnace of war. Do what I say, or you will be cast into the burning fiery furnace of Bolshevism. Accept my contrivance, or you will be cast into the burning fiery furnace of enormous taxes.'

"Americans will wonder at the way Nebuchadnezzar took to force his device upon his people. They will ask why he resorted to ill-natured threats, why he had to be so thoroughly disagreeable. Why could he not have acted like a gentleman, even if he had made a golden image? Why not treat the governors and rulers of his nation as if perchance they had some little intelligence? We must remember, however, that, while for those having any traditions of breeding and independence, such conduct is repulsive, the subjects of Nebuchadnezzar did not mind it. They did not mind being treated like vassals, for that is all they were. To have treated them like rational beings would have been to cast pearls before swine. They had no minds of their own. They were only partisan henchmen, whose lofty rôle was to sneeze whenever their Nebuchadnezzar took snuff; to accept with huzzahs whatever he handed them; to go wherever he pointed; and to applaud frantically whatever he did, no matter how ill-advised, mischievous, crooked, or immoral it was. None of them ventured to think for himself. They waited till the autocrat spoke, then they knew what they were to think. He has decided thus. He has shut to his massive jaw. To question then, to hesitate for a moment then, would be disloyalty. So at his brutal command, these poor vassals vied with each other to see who could first fall upon his face, grovel most abjectly in the dirt, and worship most frantically the golden image.

"'Therefore,' says the record, 'when all the people heard the sound of the cornet, flute, harp, sackbut, psaltery, and all kinds of music all the people, the nations, and the languages fell down and worshipped the image which Nebuchadnezzar, the King, had set up.'

"It is an edifying spectacle to see them casting themselves posthaste into the dust, accepting with record speed the so-called ideal arrogantly forced upon them.

"Of course, to-day Nebuchadnezzar would not have been able to put anything like that through quite so easily. There would be a redeeming leaven; some would dare the anger of the autocrat and tell him the truth about his image. But in that forlorn and far-distant time which we are studying all the autocrat had to do was to hurl his threat of the burning, fiery furnace and fulminate in ill-tempered arrogance and his subservient henchmen rallied his vassals and hastened to put through any wild plan which he commanded.

"Nebuchadnezzar arranged the program for the performance on the plain of Dura very skillfully and with an eye for dramatic effect. The signal for the universal acceptance and prostration was given by all sorts of musical instruments bursting forth simultaneously. A chorus of sound blared out at a given moment. There were prearranged tootings from all sorts of wind instruments. The cornets of subservient propagandists gave ear-splitting blasts. The flutes of subsidized officeholders poured forth their most seductive lures. The harps of partisans twanged their brazen strings. and the sackbuts of fanatical adherents joined with the psalteries of employees to swell the big noise. An organized effort was turned loose to produce a desired effect. The entire machinery of the government was exploited and converted into a barker for the image. Like a bureau of information it proclaimed, 'This is what the world has been waiting for. This is the latest word, the revelation of the ultimate wisdom. This will heal the world's ills, change human nature, curb passions, and bind all together in brotherhood. This will start the new era and usher in the long-desired Utopia. Former generations did not know of this, because they did not have Nebuchadnezzar. That crowning blessing has been reserved for you. Down on your knees, and with thankful hearts accept the wonderful gift which your great sovereign has been pleased to bring you from the treasure house of his supersoul.'

"So it came to pass that when all heard the big noise they all fell down and worshiped the image.

"I am thankful that I did not live in that age, when subservience was so universal, so thoroughly disciplined, and so easily controlled. We sometimes feel concern for our own time, and are tempted to question its freedom and its sanity. But the leaven of independence is more in evidence to-day than in the day of Daniel. In that degenerate and hypnotized generation no question was raised as to whether the image which they were commanded to accept was right, or true, or beautiful. The only point they emphasized was, Nebuchadnezzar made this, he demands its immediate acceptance; therefore, it must be accepted at once.

"The second question to which our study of this far-distant time brings us is, Why did Nebuchadnezzar do this thing?

"There are two explanations of his conduct, the personal and the political. From the personal point of view it must be regarded as the natural culmination of unbridled egotism. History teaches that human nature can not endure too much power. The human personality becomes unbalanced when it is permitted to exercise too large an authority. It gets power mad. The mortal loses his head and commits excesses. Shakespeare puts it in his matchless diction:

"Man, proud man,
Drest in a little brief authority
Most ignorant of what he's most assured,
His glassy essence like an angry ape,
Plays such fantastic tricks before high heaven
As make the angels weep.

"This process was working in Nebuchadnezzar. He grew to believe in his own superwisdom, his ability to settle every question. He became convinced that whatever he thought was correct; whatever he desired was right; whatever he resolved upon was what ought to be. To oppose him in anything was the deepest baseness, not to support him in everything was the most vicious treason. This overweening admiration for oneself is a variety of insanity. The German Kaiser had this disease. His brutal people had it also; and many in other countries and generations have had it. It is progressive, and leads to some extravagance. Nebuchadnezzar's making of this image, and his demand that the whole world accept it, was the climax of his mania for power. No longer content with domineering over the external activities of his subjects, he was seized with an irresistible yearning to control also the internal realm of their individuality; to prescribe their ideas for them; as we would say, to tell them how to vote. All his achievements in autocracy up to this point, prodigious though they were, seemed as nothing to his increasing thirst for power, so long as this inner realm of individuality, this inward kingdom of ideals, remained uncontrolled by his supermind. Above him seemed his realm alone, and 'thitherward he bent his eagle eye.' He took the last step in autocracy, and essayed to construct for mankind the ideal which they must receive and serve. In the natural development of power insanity he set up his golden image on the plain of Dura, and commanded men to fall down before it. In which conduct we can see how far the sinister disease had progressed in his personality.

"The other explanation of his conduct is the political. Of course, this image was contrived for some political purpose, nor is that purpose obscure or far to seek. Nebuchadnezzar's great desire was to unify the race. Mankind was, as Daniel tells us, split up into peoples, nations, languages. Each had its own god or gods, which represented its point of view, its ideal; preserved its individuality; and kept it from merging with other nationalities. Nebuchadnezzar was interested in world unity. He was tired of being autocrat of merely one nation. He chafed under the limitations imposed upon him by these separations. He wanted to get rid of the dividing lines. He aimed at internationalism, to fuse all peoples in one cosmic community, so that he might be the superman over a unified humanity. It is a vision that has fascinated many; an ambition that has taken some captive—not the large unselfish natures like Washington, but the smaller, egotistic beings, the Cæsars, the Alexanders, the Napoleons, the Nebuchadnezzars. Having this desire in his soul, Nebuchadnezzar set out to attain it with the practical sagacity that characterized him as a political leader. He knew human nature. He knew that custom and tradition, religion, kept nations separate and individual. He was convinced that if he could only get all peoples, nations, and languages to accept the same ideal, to worship the same deity, the barriers between them would disappear and they could all be fused into one family. Worship of a common object would make them one. So, with characteristic modesty, he undertook to construct the deity for all mankind, the ideal which the entire race should accept and serve. That was what his golden image was intended to be. That was the purpose it was intended to serve. It was to be the means of bringing all men into the new unity, the tie which should bind them together in internationalism or supernationalism. When at the sound of the cornets, flutes, harps, and all kinds of music the peoples, nations, and languages fell down and worshiped the golden image which he had set up, he expected old separations of customs, ideas, individuality to be wiped out, and that the acceptance of his device would create the international unity which would be the throne of his supremest power and the pedestal of his most enduring fame. He was so eager to accomplish this that he strained his authority to the uttermost to put it through. He organized his government into a propaganda bureau to praise his image. The tootings of the official orchestra deafened the crowds on the plain of Dura. If any did not understand that Nebuchadnezzar's image was heaven-born, they were both perverse and stupid. No suggestion of change was permitted. With haughty command and arrogant threat he pushed his device along and, by the most approved steam-roller methods, stampeded the mob into immediate acceptance.

"In the brief study which we are making of autocracy as embodied in its Biblical example, we have seen what Nebuchadnezzar did, and also considered why he did it, examining the personal and political motives which actuated him. In closing I would ask you to note the results of his effort. These results would fall into two classes, the immediate and ephemeral and the ultimate and permanent.

"The immediate result was undoubtedly success. He put his scheme through. He forced men to accept his device. His ideal in all its grotesque absurdity was swallowed whole. All peoples, nations, and languages fell down on the plain of Dura and worshiped the image which he had made. He became the autocrat of the inner realm of man's thoughts and the superlord over an international conglomeration of peoples.

"But while the immediate result was thus a conspicuous success, the ultimate result was one of the most complete failures of history. Where is Nebuchadnezzar's image to-day? It is one of the things that the world has been only too glad to get rid of and forget. An image that is the real expression of a genuine ideal, like the statue of the Venus of Milo, is cherished even in its mutilation as one of the priceless treasures of mankind. It does not need organized propaganda or autocratic commands or savage threats to push it along. It commends itself to the ages by the symmetry of its ineffable beauty and it makes its way from generation to generation by the white light of its dazzling perfection. An image that requires the tootings of an official claque to launch it and has to be backed up by the threats of burning fiery furnaces is a self-confessed farce. It troubled the world for a brief period, and then, when the acid tests of time had demonstrated its worthlessness, a long-suffering race buried it in oblivion with a sigh of relief. It did not accomplish any of the things it was intended to achieve. It did not make all peoples one. It did not wipe out the separations of nationality or individuality. It did not change nature or human nature. The compulsory acceptance upon the plain of Dura was only a perfunctory make-believe. When they got up from their knees and their pretended worship of the hybrid image the peoples, nations, and languages were exactly the same they had been before the hypocritical performance. Each retained its own customs, its own point of view, its own interests, its own ambitions. Each continued to revolve in its own orbit, unaltered by the pretended acceptance of the autocrat's device.

"The sum total of result was a great splurge for Nebuchadnezzar. It gave him an opportunity to strut in the lime light. But there was no benefit to anyone else, no benediction to the race, and certainly no blessing to his own nation.

"There were three persons, and only three, who played a creditable part in that far-off drama. Nebuchadnezzar played the part of a power-loving autocrat. The crowd showed themselves to be a brainless, cowardly, hypnotized mob. Against this background of second-rate humanity Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego stand out as real men, heroes and philanthropists, the redeeming features of a dreary landscape. They scorned the command of the autocrat and defied his threat, saying, 'We will not worship the golden image which thou hast set up.'

"The immortal service which they rendered to humanity that day was this, they championed independence against external dictation.

"That is the great treasure of humanity, independence, the independence of individuality and the independence of nationality.

"The treasure of humanity is not the golden images which visionaries and autocrats devise. History is full of image makers, egoists who work their own vagaries up into erratic contrivances which they have the effrontery to call 'ideals' and which they proclaim as the panaceas for the race, the keys to peace, the doors to the millennium. The world has been a vast plain of Dura, on which image after image has been set up, sometimes by autocrats drunk with pride, sometimes by ambitious demagogues, sometimes by unbalanced visionaries. The plain of Dura has heard a deal of foolish shouting through the centuries, as feeble-minded crowds have acclaimed now one fad and now another as the divine device which was going to change nature, to change human nature, and to transform the world. One after another these much-applauded fads have failed, as intelligent men knew from the start that they would fail. Image after image, fad after fad has gone to the scrap heap. What a motley assortment of exploded panaceas lie along the pathway of the years, from the Tower of Babel, which was to lift the race to heaven, to the image of Nebuchadnezzar, which was to unify mankind; from the Reign of Terror to the single tax; from Karl Marx to kultur; from socialism to Bolshevism. Each one of these grotesque images was heralded at the time as the latest revelation from heaven and as the greatest treasure of humanity. But they were all worse than useless. They were blights so long as they were tolerated, and always the race escaped from them with thanksgiving and forgot them as soon as possible. The real treasure of the race is not these panaceas, these fads, not the golden images, the grotesque devices and systems set up by visionaries. The real treasure of mankind is independence.

"The real benefactors of the race are not the egoistic contrivers of these images, not the Evarras of Kipling's poem, the framers of ideals for others to serve, the makers of monstrous gods for others to worship. The real benefactors are the Shadrachs, the Meshachs, the Abednegos of the ages, who champion independence, the independence of individuality and the independence of nationality, against the interferences of fanatics and the dictation of autocrats.

"These three Hebrew heroes knew it would be useless to argue with Nebuchadnezzar or his henchmen about this image; useless to point out its impossible absurdities and its fatal defects. In that hysterical hour truth, reason, science, philosophy, history, and common sense would have been pearls cast before swine. So they said, 'O, Nebuchadnezzar, we are not careful to answer thee in this matter.' All they could do in such a time was to stand firmly for independence. They knew that such a stand meant the burning fiery furnace. They did not crave this, but bad as it was and much as they would have preferred to avoid it, there was one thing which to them seemed worse, and that was the surrender of independence to external dictation. They made their choice, took their stand, and spoke out fearlessly, 'O, Nebuchadnezzar, we are not careful to answer thee in this matter. But be it known unto thee, we will not worship the golden image which thou hast set up.'

"Those words are the everlasting declaration of the rights of individuality, the Magna Charta of independence.

"This is what all the real benefactors have done in all ages.

"They have championed this greatest treasure of mankind, and refused to surrender the independence of individuality or of nationality to visionary, autocrat, or mob.

"That is what our forefathers did on July 4, 1776, on the Independence Day, whose anniversary we have just celebrated. They championed and refused to surrender or betray the independence of America. They faced the burning fiery furnace of war. It was not a pleasant prospect. They did not want war. To avoid it they were ready to do everything save one. One thing seemed to them worse than even the furnace of war, and that was to betray the independence of America to external control. That they would not do. Their reply is known to the ages. The shot fired by the embattled farmers beside Concord bridge was heard round the world. Like the three Hebrew heroes they answered, 'We will not. Fiery furnace or no fiery furnace, war or no war, we will never surrender the independence of America nor betray the individuality of this New World.'

"That is the reason why all generations will revere them as patriots and praise them as benefactors of humanity, because they defended and preserved this priceless treasure of man, this crown of human life.

"This is the eternal question continually arising generation after generation, Shall human life preserve its independence?

"To-day two passionate delusions menace this treasure. On the one hand, socialism would surrender the independence of individuality to the crowd and submerge it in the mob. On the other hand, internationalism would surrender the independence of the Nation to a crowd of nations and submerge nationality in a mob of peoples.

"Shall independence be preserved or shall it be surrendered?

"To preserve it burning fiery furnaces must be faced to-day as always. The air is full of threats, threats of the wars, the anarchies, the Bolshevism, the taxes, into which those will be cast who do not immediately at the appointed signal fall down and worship when the tootings of the well-organized orchestra fill the land. No one wants war ever again. No one, I imagine, wants any more taxes. Long-suffering citizens have been taxed beyond reason or need. But if it were a question of surrendering independence or of being cast into even the worst fiery furnace that an angry Nebuchadnezzar could stir up, then there would be only one course open for genuine Americans; there would be only one conclusion possible for worthy descendants of the founders of this Republic under the shadow of Independence Day.

"The independence of America, the individuality of this Republic is the most precious political treasure of mankind to-day. It is worth more to the race; it means more to the future, infinitely more, than all the preposterous images constructed by visionary egotists through all the ages. If we were faced by the terrible dilemma and compelled to choose between the dread alternatives, either of surrendering this independent nationality and submerging the individuality of this New World in a chaotic internationalism and falling down to accept an ill-considered device miscalled an ideal, or of being cast into a furnace heated seven times more than it was wont to be heated, as Nebuchadnezzar threatened, then, so long as the spirit of July Fourth burned in American hearts, so long as the manhood and nobility of the patriots of 1776 glowed in American breasts, the decision would be instantaneous and enthusiastic. Not selfishly; not because our eyes are on the ground; but just because we have genuine vision; for the sake of this poor world, for the sake of struggling humanity, the independence of America, the individuality of this Republic shall be preserved inviolate and unweakened and shall never be surrendered to external control, no matter what threats may be held over us. The answer of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego would again echo in every heroic soul, 'Be it known unto thee, we will not.'

"The independence of America, the individuality of this New World! The patriots of 1776 secured it; the patriots of 1860 preserved it; the patriots of 1918 fought and died for it in France. Washington and Lincoln were men of vision. They were not visionaries. They followed a genuine ideal, not a will-o'-the-wisp, not a poisonous, phosphorescent vapor exuding from the festering marsh of egotism. The independence of the United States for which they struggled is the hope of the world and the treasure of the race. So long as Americans have any real vision, so long as they are philanthropists and patriots, they will see that it is preserved, even though burning, fiery furnaces must be faced.

"The words of the beloved poet of Massachusetts and America seem written especially for such a time as this:

"Sail on, sail on, O Ship of State!
Sail on, O Union, strong and great!
Humanity, with all its fears,
With all its hopes of future years,
Is hanging breathless on thy fate.
Our hearts, our hopes are all with thee;
Our hearts, our hopes, our prayers, our tears,
Our faith triumphant o'er our fears,
Are all with thee, are all with thee."

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, if this is the hour of the exchange editor, I ask that an article by Mr. Simonds on the breakdown of the principles embodied in the covenant be added to the sum total of literary provender supplied the printer.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"SEIZURE OF FIUME SEEN AS TREATY DEFIANCE—MR. SIMONDS BELIEVES VERSAILLES DOCUMENT DEAD LETTER AS AFFECTING NATIONALISTIC ASPIRATIONS OF VARIOUS COUNTRIES.

"[By Frank H. Simonds.]

"The exploit of D'Annunzio at Fiume has recalled for the whole world that equally brilliant page in Italian history filled with the story of the adventure of Garibaldi and his thousand when they set out from Quarto, almost 60 years ago, on that expedition which gave Italy her first real foretaste of unity.

"The circumstances are hardly dissimilar. Before Garibaldi set out, the King and the great architect of Italian unity, Cavour, knew of the plan. The attack upon a friendly State, the Kingdom of Naples, itself under the protection of the European concert, at least theoretically, has a strong resemblance to the present attack upon Jugoslavia. Moreover, as England looked with undisguised satisfaction at the gallant culmination of so long and brave an effort on the part of the Italians to obtain unity, not a few Frenchmen, probably a certain number of Britons, regard the new incident with approval.

"SAYS TREATY IS PARTLY DEAD.

"The truth of the matter must now begin to appear to the American people, as it has long been clear in Europe. In so far as the treaty of Versailles has done violence to the nationalistic aspirations of the various nations united against Germany, it has become a dead letter, less than six months after it was signed and before it has been ratified either by France or the United States.

"A few weeks ago Roumanians demonstrated by their march to Budapest their supreme contempt for the mandates of the Paris conference. Not only did they go to Budapest against orders, but they have remained there ever since. At the same time they have continued to hold the territory occupied by their soldiers, but forbidden them by the conference of Paris, notably in the case of Bessarabia, a Province three times as big as Alsace-Lorraine.

"The Roumanian episode, as I pointed out at the time, was manifestly only a beginning. Roumania, in going to Budapest, was really making the test case for Italy and for all the other nations which regarded the Paris conference and its decisions with resentment. It was, in fact, a matter of life or death for the Paris conference to bring Roumania to terms, because if Roumania were able to flout it, to deny its authority and proceed on her own way, then there would be no obstacle in the pathway of other nations.

"But, apart from notes, warnings, threats of economic pressure, which seem hardly to have been made good, the conference of Paris could do nothing. French sentiment would not permit the employment of French troops against the Roumanians; Italy undeniably advised Roumania to make the test; as for Britain and the United States, neither country was in a mood to make war in the Balkans, and real war, too, for Roumania can put at least 300,000 veteran troops in the field, with an equally large trained reserve.

"Paris, therefore, having told the Roumanians not to go to Budapest, and then, when they disobeyed, to get out of Budapest, ended by relapsing into painful silence, rather ridiculously broken by protests against a Roumanian evacuation of Budapest, which might be followed by a return of Bolshevism. So far as the Roumanians were concerned, they got what they wanted, they did as they pleased, and no one has yet found a way to punish them or to deprive them of territory actually in their possession, but not awarded them by the Paris conference.

"GOT CUE FROM ROUMANIA.

"Logically enough, Italy read in the Roumanian episode, in which she certainly played at least a friendly part, the real solution of her own difficulties. Her troops occupied Fiume and certain Dalmatian ports claimed by the Italians as well. But there were allied troops there also. After many months, following Mr. Wilson's famous Paris appeal to the Italian people, it was clear that the whole Italian Nation, the radicals quite as unanimously as the conservatives, insisted that Fiume should be Italian.

"All the hope of acquiring title to Fiume through negotiations was at an end. Mr. Wilson could not recede from his position of the spring, because he had affirmed the question to be moral before it was political. But, impossible as was the task of acquiring title with American consent, there was nothing in the way of actually completing Italian possession, save the reserve of the Italian Government, which feared that an overt act might lead to the denial to Italy of the loans and other assistance terribly needed.

"On the other hand, Roumania had managed to survive, and the rising national spirit of resentment made it difficult for the Italian Government longer to stand in the pathway of national aspiration, even when it was led to such a position by a wise regard for national welfare. Nothing then was more natural than that the way out of the dilemma should be found in the revival of one of the most glorious and romantic episodes in all history.

"Of course, the Italian ministry knew of the D'Annunzio plan, just as Cavour and the King were thoroughly conversant with Garibaldi's plan. Not to perceive this is to be a dupe of a maneuver which has deceived no one on the other side of the Atlantic. Moreover, D'Annunzio was a particularly available leader for such a venture, since he had actually forced the reluctant Italian Government into the war on the allied side in May, 1915, and there was due him the gratitude of the statesmen and publics of the allied nations, for whom Italy's entrance, at the very moment of the great Russian defeat at the Dunajec, was almost a life-saving affair.

"Accordingly D'Annunzio took Fiume, the Italian officers in his pathway politely effaced themselves, the Italian Nation made no attempt to disguise its approval and enthusiasm. The Government, which could not have lived a moment had it undertaken to use force, and as certainly could not have commanded any Italian force to attack Fiume, politely turned the task over to the Allies, after certain delays, not disadvantageous to D'Annunzio.

"'Terribly sorry; but we can't just manage to do this thing; awkward for us to attempt to deal with this wild fellow; please take it in your own hands.' Such was the burden of the Italian official statement. Meantime Garibaldi's imitator was well established in Fiume and actually embarrassed by the influx of volunteers. What nation in Europe desired to undertake to expel him, knowing full well that Italian national sentiment would be up in arms in a moment and a war with Italy was an immediate possibility, while, if the war did not come at once, enduring hatred would be the consequence? Not France; certainly least of all France, with an Italian frontier and a German menace still to be thought of. Not Great Britain, out of humor with fighting, whether at Archangel or Fiume, and anxious, like the United States, to get its troops home and have done with war-making for a time.

"ECONOMIC PRESSURE DANGEROUS.

"As for economic pressure, the thing was only a little less dangerous. How could one starve the Italians and the inhabitants of Fiume, while the Italian Navy dominated the Adriatic and the Italian Army and Navy openly celebrated the recent coup? As in the case of Roumania, the weapons, direct and indirect, turned out to be unavailable under the circumstances. Italy stayed at Fiume as Roumania had tarried at Budapest, and, in the delay, the opposition in European capitals grew steadily less. This is a personal matter between the President of the United States and the Italian people. Why should we interfere?

"This was the temper discoverable in France, within limits in Great Britain.

"Now, it seems perfectly clear that Italy will keep Fiume; she has it, the whole nation is resolved upon retaining it, and there is no one of the nations represented at Paris, no concert of nations, ready to begin a brand-new war in order to expel Italy from an Italian town, albeit the town which is the natural seagate for the southern Slavs. There was no one ready to take up arms to drive the Roumanians out of Bessarabia; there will be no one to drive the Roumanians out of the Banat, if they make good their threats and take the Torontal, allotted to Serbia at Paris.

"WHO WILL DISCIPLINE GREECE?

"Again, will there be anyone to discipline Greece if she proceeds to occupy that portion of Thrace which the Paris conference can not make up its mind to give to her, although it has subtracted it from Bulgaria? At the very least I should not be surprised to see the Greeks try out the matter before many days. Why shouldn't they? Their claim to this portion of Thrace is several thousand years old and stands the rigorous test of the 14 points quite as well as Fiume.

"But the case of Greece is relatively minor. The world will possibly worry along with Hellenic troops in Dedeagatch, as the world endured the temporary stay of Bulgarian troops in the same region. As far as France and Great Britain are concerned, they will welcome such a solution, for the United States is the only quarter in which the Bulgar has any friends, and President Wilson is the sole opponent to the Paris proposal to give all of Thrace to the Greeks. What is really important now is the effect of the Fiume episode upon the other parts of Europe.

"Let us take, for example, the case of the Saar Valley. The French have it. They own or will own every coal mine; they are authorized to extend their customs lines to include this territory. Fifteen years in the future they will have to submit to a plebiscite to decide whether the territory shall go back to Germany or remain French. But this condition was imposed solely because the President of the United States set his face against an out-and-out annexation, as inconsistent with the 14 points. But since Italy and Roumania are not permitting President Wilson's views to prevent them from acquiring territory on which they have a claim, not more justifiable, one would say, than the French claim to the Saar, why should France permit herself to be restrained?

"PROPOSED FRENCH TREATY.

"Further than this, Mr. Wilson, for the United States, pledged, so far as he could pledge it, an American alliance to protect France against a German attack in the future. Only by this pledge did Mr. Wilson persuade Clemenceau to abandon the claims of Foch and the French Army to the military occupation of the left bank of the Rhine. Now, if the treaty of Versailles, particularly in the parts regarded as vital to protect French interests, is amended in the Senate—above all, if the United States Senate refuses to ratify the treaty insuring France against German attack—what is more certain than that France, which has not yet ratified the treaty herself, will, with equal promptness, add amendments of her own?

"We are, then, passing rapidly out of the zone momentarily created by the league of nations circumstances at Paris. The Italians, the Roumanians, and the Jugo-Slavs have openly defied the whole Paris conference. The Roumanians and the Italians have proceeded to the occupation of territory expressly forbidden them by the Paris conference and in open defiance of league of nations principles. At any moment we may find that the Clemenceau government will fall and be succeeded, not as certain misguided 'liberals' in the United States think, by a radical ministry, but by a reactionary one—reactionary in the sense that it will repudiate the whole treaty as framed at Versailles and proceed to use the power now in French hands to safeguard the French future.

"The fact is, of course, that the Germans could not now defend themselves against the French if the French chose to send armies to Berlin; they could go with the approximate ease with which the Roumanian armies reached Budapest.

"Moreover, the recent murder of French soldiers in the Saar Basin, the refusal of the Germans to retire from the Baltic Province, their outrageous behavior in Upper Silesia—all these supply admirable justifications for such a French course.

"Once such a step was taken then there would be an obvious end of the treaty of Versailles. The statesmen who carried through such a program would not hesitate to take such safeguards for the future as have not been taken by the Clemenceau government solely because it relied upon President Wilson's assurance that he would be able to procure the ratification, both of the treaty of Versailles and the treaty of alliance. France would then enter into permanent occupation of the Rhine barrier and annex the Saar Basin. In doing this she would go no further than has Italy or Roumania, and she might be assured the support of both Latin powers as a consequence.

"This possible French procedure would be described as imperialistic by a certain fraction of American and British sentiment, which does not sympathize with France in any event and regards with utmost disapproval French apprehension of a new German attack. But most reasonable Englishmen and Americans will see in French effort to achieve security against German aggression a natural and inevitable national instinct. Above all, neither Americans nor Britons will be prepared to make war upon France, which is the essential fact.

"FRANCE WAITING ON THE UNITED STATES.

"In my judgment future French action will be entirely dependent upon the course of the United States Senate in adopting or rejecting the treaty of alliance. The French are not interested in the league of nations, do not believe in it, and have accepted it only as a matter of policy, not as an act of faith. If the Senate rejects the treaty of alliance the French will in their own time and in their own way follow the example of the Roumanians and the Italians; they will proceed to the absorption of the Saar Basin, and find adequate justification for a permanent occupation of the left bank of the Rhine. Such a course will, in the end, have the same support in France as D'Annunzio's Fiume venture has enlisted in Italy.

"Had the United States Senate accepted the treaty of Versailles without delay and by a unanimous, or approximately unanimous, vote the European reaction would have been far different from what it now is. It was the undisguised conviction of both the French and British representatives at Paris that the President was supported by the mass of American people, without regard to party, in his European course. France bowed to certain entirely unpalatable demands of the President simply because France needed American financial assistance and feared that any other course would deprive her of this aid. Italy, at least, hesitated in the matter of Fiume. Roumania listened for the moment, biding her time. As for Poland, she consented to the greatest sacrifices of all, as her need of American support was the most considerable of all.

"But what has happened in America since the President returned has been at once a surprise and a shock to the European statesmen. The extent of the opposition to the President in the Senate has already called forth debate in the French Chamber, and if the treaty be modified and the treaty of alliance rejected may result in an upset in French politics. If America is not unanimous in its support of President Wilson's policies as they affect France and Italy, as they affect all European nations; if there is no possibility of winning American sympathy and support by accepting American ideas, as expressed by the President, at real sacrifices of national security and aspiration, then Europe is prepared to reject them, is already rejecting them.

"Fiume, like Budapest, is an incident of world-wide concern. It is a natural and consecutive step. It reveals Italy following the Roumanian precedent, a rebel against the moral and the political authority asserted by the Paris conference. It discloses a great power resolved to follow its own policies, consult its own interests, even when these interests conflict with principles which were proclaimed at Paris as the new constitution of the world. It is a repudiation of the idea that Italians can think other than as Italians when a question of national sentiment is at stake. When he addressed his appeal to the Italian people over the heads of the Italian ministry a few months ago President Wilson had the opposite idea.

"But Fiume is only a step; far more important steps are still to come. We shall see a French general election at no distant date, and we may see a French ministry fall before the election, for the American episodes have been terribly expensive for the Clemenceau ministry, which has held on up to the present moment only by reason of the promised treaty of alliance, and any new French ministry would, in my judgment, adopt a far different course with respect of Germany than the Clemenceau ministry has been led to adopt in the belief that such a course was necessary to enlist essential American aid for France.

"IDEALISM GIVING WAY.

"But whether the treaty of alliance and the treaty of Versailles be rejected, amended materially, or accepted as the President asks that they shall be accepted, it seems to me that we are doomed to pass rapidly, are actually passing from world policies founded upon idealism to those based upon realism. The Italians and the Roumanians have very frankly disclosed their total unwillingness to sacrifice territory or security to any general scheme of pacification and good feeling. No sacrifice was asked of the British, but in advance they announced that they would not make any surrender in the one direction where it might be asked, namely, in the matter of the 'freedom of the seas.'

"So far the French and the Poles have been asked to make great sacrifices, asked by President Wilson, in the name of the world peace, and both have consented, but with misgivings and against the wishes of many Frenchmen and Poles. But now it becomes clear that the French and the Poles alone of the European nations, one on the Vistula, the other on the Rhine, have given up security, while America seems by no means ready to accept the doctrines which at the President's behest France and Poland accepted. In addition, the security promised each in the league of nations and in the France-American-British alliance begins to seem insubstantial, to say the least.

"As I see it, this can only have one consequence, namely, a resettlement of many of the questions 'settled' or compromised in the Paris conference, questions such as Danzig, the Rhine barrier, the Saar Basin, Thrace, and not impossibly the Banat and Dalmatia. The Paris conference decisions were actually a compromise between the American idea, as Mr. Wilson's views were invariably described abroad, and the European idea. Now, Italy and Roumania have repudiated any compromise and insisted upon settling their problems in a thoroughly European fashion, while the United States, so far as the Senate is concerned, at least, has challenged the American idea, and the resulting political debate in America has disclosed a divided sentiment. Therefore it seems to me that France, Poland, and the rest of the continental nations will swiftly or slowly—the French have many years to decide in the matter of the Saar and the Rhine, as the circumstances dictate—seek a continental solution, conforming with Italian and Roumanian action."

NATIONAL PROHIBITION—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. STERLING. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on House bill 6810, being the national prohibition bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none.

The Senate proceeded to consider the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6810) to prohibit intoxicating beverages and to regulate the manufacture, production, use, and sale of high-proof spirits for other than beverage purposes, and to insure an ample supply of alcohol and promote its use in scientific research and in the development of fuel, dye, and other lawful industries.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The conference report will be read.

The Secretary read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6810) to prohibit intoxicating beverages and to regulate the manufacture, production, use, and sale of high-proof spirits for other than beverage purposes, and to insure an ample supply of alcohol and promote its use in scientific research and in the development of fuel, dye, and other lawful industries, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 20, 25, 46, 47, 61, 66, 72, 90, 118, 123, 127, 133, 134, 164, 178, 184, 219, 232, and 233.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 21, 23, 24, 26, 27, 29, 30, 32, 33, 34, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 48, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 64, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 73, 75, 76, 78, 79, 82, 83, 84, 86, 87, 88, 89, 92, 93, 94, 96, 97, 98, 100, 101, 103, 104, 105, 106, 107, 108, 109, 110, 112, 113, 114, 115, 116, 117, 119, 120, 121, 122, 124, 125, 126, 128, 131, 132, 135, 136, 138, 139, 140, 141, 143, 144, 145, 146, 147, 148, 149, 150, 151, 152, 153, 154, 155, 156, 158, 159, 160, 161, 162, 167, 168, 169, 170, 171, 172, 173, 174, 175, 176, 177, 179, 180, 181, 182, 183, 186, 187, 188, 189, 190, 191, 192, 193, 194, 196, 197, 198, 199, 200, 201, 202, 203, 204, 205, 207, 208, 209, 210, 211, 213, 214, 215, 216, 217, 220, 221, 222, 223, 224, 227, 228, 229, 230, 235, 236, 237, 238, 239, 240, 241, 242, 243, 244, 245, 246, 247, 248, 249, 250, 251, 252, 253, 254, 255, 256, 258, 259, 260, 261, 262, 263, 264, 265, 266, 267, 268, 269, 270, 271, 272, 273, 274, 275, 276, 277, 278, 279, 280, 282, 283, 284, and 285, and agree to the same.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 5218. An act to provide revenue for the Government and to establish and maintain the production of magnesite ores and manufactures thereof in the United States was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to call up the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 151) to provide additional compensation for employees of the Postal Service, and making an appropriation therefor. This is a measure which has passed the House increasing the salaries of the postal employees. The Senate committee has reported on the matter, and I ask for its consideration at this time.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the report was submitted only yesterday. It was not printed until this morning, and, indeed, I am not sure that it has been printed as yet. It involves some very important matters. It calls for the appropriation of a large sum. I think the Senator ought not to press the consideration of that measure now, so that we may have an opportunity to examine the report and examine the measure itself.

I ask the Senator not to press consideration until to-morrow and give us a chance to examine the report. I do not want to be called upon to object, but I do think that the importance of the measure is such as to warrant an opportunity for Senators to examine the report and to examine the joint resolution.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am very willing and very anxious, indeed, that the Senator should understand this proposition. It, however, has been before Congress for a long time, the House having passed the resolution some months ago; and if the Senator has in mind urging objections to the consideration of the measure to-morrow, or on any other day, if it goes over, I would rather move now to take it up. If, however, in good faither the Senator asks more time to consider the report—and I am bound to believe that that is the case—I certainly do not wish to oppose his request; but the Senator understands that with the press of business that is before the Senate, unless we can act upon some of these matters during the morning hour there will be no opportunity for us to give consideration to them.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator that I have no desire whatever to object to the consideration of this bill, but it is an important one; the report has just been laid before the Senate, and I have not had time to examine it, and I doubt whether half a dozen Senators have had a chance to read the report. If it may go over until to-morrow, that is all I ask, and I shall join with the Senator to-morrow in asking the consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, before the Senator determines which course he will take, I should like to suggest that it would be helpful to all of us if the chairman of the committee would explain the bill briefly and then let it go over until to-morrow for us to continue the discussion.

Mr. KING. That will be entirely satisfactory to me.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I shall be very glad to do that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If that could be done, I know it would be helpful to all of us.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I will cheerfully do that.

I think it is an almost universally recognized fact that the Post Office Department is in need of relief. The House of Representatives recognizes this fact, and granted a temporary increase in salary of postal employees for this fiscal year of $150 each, in addition to the compensation provided in the last Post Office appropriation bill. The committee of the Senate has spent a great deal of time on this subject, has investigated the needs of the department, and finds that much of the difficulty arises from the fact that an insufficient number of employees can be secured and retained in the service to meet the postal demands. The Postmaster General insists that an appropriation of a few millions of dollars, giving him discretion as to the expenditure of the amount, would meet the condition. Neither committee of Congress agreed with him or felt like granting him discretion. They felt, in view of past experiences, that it was absolutely necessary for the Congress to determine what amount should be granted to relieve the emergency condition and to direct specifically how it should be expended. The Postmaster General either does not understand the true condition in his own department or he is not frank with Congress. The committee does not believe it is the duty of Congress to compete with salaries paid by corporations in the ordinary industries of the country. It does feel, however, that it should pay a sufficient amount—and only a sufficient amount—now, which, with the strictest economy on the part of the employees, will enable them to live during the present emergency.

One of the greatest difficulties is experienced in securing substitutes. The substitute clerk or carrier under present law is paid 40 cents per hour. His hours of employment are uncertain. He serves three years before he gets a permanent appointment, and therefore he finds it to his convenience and to his welfare to take employment in other branches of industry. The result has been that most inefficient and insufficient help has been obtained.

It is a known fact that many of these substitutes work for a day or two and then leave the job. They have no notion of remaining in the service. The evidence is indisputable that many of the people whom the department has been obliged to pick up were illiterate and could not even write their names. The evidence disclosed by employees' bonding companies as to some of these "noncertified" people was that when they made their applications they had to do it by making their marks.

It is known that the turnover of employees in many parts of the service has been several hundred per cent during the last year or two. Perhaps that is not greater than in the ordinary business concern, but you can readily understand that the Post Office Department must be a permanent institution. It is at the very basis of the business interests of the country. For that reason we have a civil-service system which governs the employee. It has been practically abandoned in so far as substitutes and those in the lower grades are concerned. The greatest separations from the service outside of substitutes have been made in the $1,000, $1,100, and $1,200 grades.

Your committee felt that instead of granting a flat increase of $150 per man, regardless of the salary which he received, the greater amount of the House appropriation should be given to those classes where the greatest separations have occurred and where the greatest difficulty has been experienced in securing adequate help. Therefore we increased the substitutes' pay from 40 cents to 60 cents an hour. We increased the $1,000-a-year man from $1,000 to $1,240. In other words, we increased the latter's pay $20 a month.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Certainly.

Mr. MYERS. Do not the postal employees share in the $240 bonus for this year that was voted to all other Government employees by Congress?

Mr. TOWNSEND. They do. In stating the salaries of $1,000, I am including the bonus. I am talking about the compensation which they actually receive.

Mr. MYERS. Do they already get the bonus of $240?

Mr. TOWNSEND. They get $200.

Mr. MYERS. And this bill will give them more?

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is right. Without the bonus, the salary of the low grade is $800; but that man, under his compensation with the bonus which has been granted him, receives now $1,000, according to the report that has been filed, which includes the $200 bonus given to postal employees.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, what character of work has been done by the man who received only $800?

Mr. TOWNSEND. It is his first year in the service—clerical work. Eight hundred dollars is the basic salary, but he is given a bonus, not of $240 but of $200. I am recognizing the fact that he receives $1,000. We propose to increase that compensation by $240.

The department itself recognizes the fact that these first-year men, these entrance men, should receive more than $1,000 with the bonus. So in this case we propose to increase the pay to $1,240; we increase the $1,100 and the $1,200 man $200, giving them $1,300 and $1,400, respectively; and we permit the House provision of $150 to remain the same as to $1,300, $1,400, $1,500, and $1,600 men.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. Does the joint resolution cover the employees in the department here?

Mr. TOWNSEND. It does.

Mr. NELSON. It covers all the employees?

Mr. TOWNSEND. All the employees.

Mr. NELSON. Of the Postal Service?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Of the Postal Service.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the Senator is in error when he says that the $240 bonus applies to the employees of the post office.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I did not say it did. I said it did not. Somebody said $240, but I said it was $200.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from Michigan that that is the regular promotion that is allowed the employees each year.

Mr. TOWNSEND. No; the Senator is mistaken. The regulation promotion is $100 a year, and the bonus last year was $200.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] asked the Senator from Michigan if the $240 bonus granted to the Government employees applied to the post-office employees.

Mr. TOWNSEND. And I said it did not.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. MYERS. I understood the Senator from Michigan to say that it did.

Mr. TOWNSEND. If I said that, I misspoke, because I repeated that it was $200. That is what I wanted to have understood.

Mr. MYERS. The general $240 bonus does not apply to these employees, then?

Mr. TOWNSEND. It does not.

Mr. MYERS. That is what I wanted to know.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Understand me, Senators, so that there will be no mistake about it, the figures given in the joint resolution and in the report include all the compensation which the clerks are receiving to-day. That includes bonus and promotion, where there is promotion.

Mr. MOSES. I hope the Senator from Michigan will point out, before he leaves this particular part of his explanation, that in connection with the $200 bonus for the first year of its application all automatic promotions in the department stop, so that the employees of the department, whom Congress had intended to benefit by a bonus of $200, receive, as a matter of fact, only $100.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That was true up to this year. This year they have made the ordinary promotions. But then they are a year behind, as the Senator from New Hampshire has stated. They are a year behind the salary they would have received from promotions if that rule had been followed.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I understand that a joint commission of the two Houses of Congress has been created to reclassify and readjust the salaries of the postal employees. I should like to inquire of the Senator if the increases in salary which the joint resolution proposes apply to those employees who are to be reclassified and their salaries adjusted by that commission?

Mr. TOWNSEND. The increases apply to all the employees of the Post Office Department mentioned in the joint resolution, those receiving not to exceed $2,500 per year. The joint commission is investigating for future congressional action. Its business is to discover and report facts which will enable Congress to adjust the great inequalities which exist in the Post Office Department, and which the joint resolution does not seek to remedy. We are only proposing temporary relief for this year. We simply make increases in the appropriation act of the last Congress to meet the emergencies of this fiscal year.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. This is not to apply to the compensation for the next fiscal year?

Mr. TOWNSEND. No; it is only temporary.

Mr POMERENE. Mr. President, I have not had an opportunity to read the report presented by the committee. May I ask whether this increased compensation is to date back to the first of the year?

Mr. TOWNSEND. It dates back to July 1.

Mr. POMERENE. Of this year?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Of this year.

Mr. POMERENE. If the Senator will permit me——

Mr. TOWNSEND. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. This matter has been called to my attention so repeatedly, and I have had such a mass of telegrams from, I think, every substantial village as well as city in the State of Ohio, that I am satisfied something very substantial must be done in behalf of the carriers and the clerks if we are to maintain a high standard of efficiency in the Post Office Service. I took occasion some time ago to telegraph to the postmasters in the large and small cities of Ohio to get their views as to conditions prevailing, and whatever information has come to me from them has been at my solicitation. I have quite a number of telegrams here bearing upon this subject; and if the Senator from Michigan will permit me, I should like to read one from Cleveland, because it is typical.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. POMERENE. This comes from the postmaster at Cleveland, and he says:

[Telegram.]

A conservative increase should be allowed city carriers, rural carriers, and clerks; difficult to recommend a definite amount because of the abnormal high price of food, clothing, and rents in this city, and no one seems to know just how long these exhorbitant prices will continue. Fifty-four clerks and fifty-nine carriers resigned last 12 months on account low salaries; in addition 425 temporary clerks and 481 temporary carriers resigned for the same reason. These men would work a few days and resign, which accounts for the large number department has allowed this office—12 additional carriers and 50 clerks. However, the number of clerkships provided in the current appropriation bill have been apportioned, forcing this office to wait until such time as additional places are provided. When definitely allowed they can not be secured for two reasons: First, our civil-service register is exhausted; and, second, because of the rate of compensation. There exists in Cleveland a very serious shortage of all kinds of labor notwithstanding the fact that wages in excess of established scales are being paid. Post-office jobs are no longer attractive because of the high salaries paid by industrial companies, making it impossible to secure competent men for our service on account of low salaries.

The difficulty which the Cleveland post office has met with is duplicated in Cincinnati, Columbus, and Toledo, as well as in the smaller cities, like Canton, Youngstown, and Akron.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Especially Akron.

Mr. POMERENE. Yes. It is true also of Portsmouth and Springfield. It does seem to me that the Government has been very unfair with this class of employees, when we take into consideration the increased living cost, and the high wages which are paid for common labor. Many of these carriers and clerks, if they would go out and do even common labor, could get a better wage than that which requires the skill which is so necessary in the performance of the duties of their office. I am not only hoping that this joint resolution will be passed, but I hope it will be passed with a very substantial increase. We will have to do something along this line if we are to maintain the very high efficiency of the different post offices.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, the Senator's statements as to the necessity for relief are corroborated by similar proofs from every State in the Union. These facts are known to every Senator, and it is impossible to successfully deny them. I do not assume that the Senator from Georgia desired me to talk so much upon the necessity of the joint resolution, but rather to explain its provisions.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I just felt that it would help us all, as we would look into the details of the measure during the next 24 hours if the Senator would give us the kind of explanation he is giving. I can not help feeling that everyone must realize the necessity for some such legislation.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I think everyone must realize it who looks into the subject even casually, because it is a most deplorable condition, which, I believe, menaces the Post Office Department. The Postmaster General either looks with complacency upon the matter or denies the emergency, which the experience of Senators shows to exist, which mayors, boards of trade, and business men all over the country insist does exist, and demand is made that Congress speedily remedy the situation so far as a living wage to postal employees will remedy it.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I will.

Mr. HARRISON. From an examination of the joint resolution and the report I take it that the larger percentage of increase is on the smaller salaries.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes; that is true.

Mr. HARRISON. And the larger the salary, the smaller the percentage of increase?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARRISON. That is the rule?

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is correct.

Mr. HARRISON. In looking over the joint resolution I see that the fourth-class postmasters are provided only with a 10 per cent increase. Why is that distinction made? They are paid very small salaries, I understand, and, in carrying out the general rule, it would seem that you should give them a larger percentage of increase.

Mr. TOWNSEND. A great many fourth-class postmasters run the post offices as branch institutions to their business. They conduct other kinds of business besides that of a post office. Their clerks in their grocery stores, or dry-goods stores, or whatever they may be, frequently serve the post office, without special compensation. The Senator from Mississippi is absolutely right in suggesting that many of the fourth-class postmasters are grossly underpaid, and I am hopeful that the joint commission which has been established is going to be able to segregate the postmasters of the fourth class who are devoting their whole time to the post offices and those who have other businesses connected with them. The committee felt, as I said a moment ago, that it was not its province at this time to try to adjust equitably all the postal salaries in the United States. It has tried to propose something which would permit the functioning of the Post Office Department in as effective a manner as possible; that is, so far as the securing of efficient help is concerned. Therefore it retained the House proposition of a 10 per cent increase for fourth-class postmasters. In a great many of the cases that increase just about pays for their fuel and light. In some cases it does not, where the salary is larger and, perhaps, the expense greater. But in looking over the list of fourth-class postmasters I found that was approximately the expense of fuel and light for fourth-class post offices, and I thought that might be sufficiently far for us to go at this time.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator what is the average pay of a fourth-class postmaster? Is it two or three hundred dollars?

Mr. TOWNSEND. It runs all the way from $200 to $1,000. When it reaches $1,000, the post office goes into the third class.

Mr. HARRISON. I have had my attention called to the fact, and I am sure the Senator has, that in a great many instances fourth-class post offices have been closed because they were unable to get anybody to serve as fourth-class postmasters, and that was due to the inadequate pay.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I think that condition exists in many places; but those abandoned offices have generally been served by rural delivery—that is, their patrons have—and therefore the offices have been abandoned. Where it was found desirable to have a fourth-class office, I imagine they have not had any very great difficulty in getting some business man in the locality to take it, if he could pass the civil-service test. I repeat, we do not attempt to deal absolutely justly with fourth-class postmasters or with anybody else. It is rather an arbitrary provision we propose here, but after great consideration and considerable study, with information from the best sources we could obtain, the committee thought that the increase which we provide would be sufficient to carry the department over this crisis and until the joint commission has a chance to report and Congress can act upon its report. I have said in this report that if the cost of living is not reduced within the year, the increases which we have provided are going to be altogether insufficient and we will have to make another increase.

We have felt also that, in view of the action of the President in reference to the demand of the railroad men for increases in salary, we ought not at this time to impose any burdens upon the Treasury of the United States except such as were absolutely necessary for the maintenance of the Government. I think these increases are absolutely necessary. Some of the men who are to get these increases would have stayed in the service even if they had not had the promise of them. I also know that there are those who have remained in the department since July 1 upon the assurance that they were going to get relief of some kind. The House passed this joint resolution giving them notice that Congress was going to act, and therefore we make this retroactive to July 1, because, while I believe that most of these men are of the very highest patriotism and want to stay in the service, to which many of them have given their lives up to this date, and many of them feel that it is a patriotic duty to remain, I do not think the United States Government has any right to demand that they should stay at a sacrifice to the living of themselves and of their families. So we have attempted to meet this situation by the joint resolution.

If there is any other question to be asked relative to the provisions of the joint resolution I shall be very glad to answer it; but when the measure comes up for discussion I want to go a little more into detail as to some of the reasons why some emergency legislation should be enacted and why, in my judgment, this is the least that we can afford to do.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator what is the least amount that will be paid to fourth-class postmasters under the joint resolution?

Mr. TOWNSEND. The least is 10 per cent of his present compensation, whatever that is. It ranges from $200 up to $1,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the joint resolution increase the pay of fourth-class postmasters only 10 per cent?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Ten per cent of their present compensation.

I will say to the Senate that I suggested 15 per cent when the proposition was under consideration, but after talking with the Post Office Department, and after considering the condition of the Treasury, I felt that possibly these officers could exist for the present under a 10 per cent increase, and therefore it was made 10 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. I notice this provision in the last appropriation act with reference to fourth-class postmasters:

Provided further, That if the compensation does not exceed $75 for any one quarter, fourth-class postmasters shall be allowed an increase of 20 per cent of the compensation allowed under existing law.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is, they get an excess of cancellations.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly; and they get 20 per cent. It seems to me the fourth-class postmasters are paid so small a salary that they certainly can not live on what they get from the Government. They have got to do other business, and with a 10 per cent increase it seems to me they are not given the increase, in comparison with the other employees of the Government, that they should receive.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I think the Senator's criticism is fairly just. The committee's only excuse is that a great many of these people are not dependent upon the salaries which they receive from the Post Office Department. They could not live upon them; they could not maintain the offices for them; nobody presumes that they would. But in most cases they want the office in connection with their local business and they are permitted to do business in connection with it and conduct it purely as an accommodation to the public, although, as I said, if we were to base it upon the Federal compensation that they receive, it is insufficient standing by itself, and I am not trying to defend it on equitable grounds.

Mr. President, with this explanation, I am going to ask the indulgence of the Senate to-morrow morning to take up the joint resolution for consideration, because it truly is an emergency measure. I think it is easily understandable, and I ask Senators to read the report. I have endeavored to explain the details of the provisions. Some of them may seem rather arbitrary, but I have tried to give the reasons for them. I have tried to arrange the provisions of the resolution so that no one will receive for a certain grade of work a salary that is in excess of the salary paid for a higher grade of work. I had that in mind because I thought it would be easily adjustable after the report of the joint commission comes in and an effort is made properly to adjust the salaries of all of the employees of the Post Office Department. There is no equity in the present method. Some of the most grossly underpaid people, for the work they do, are supervisory officials. Men who handle millions of dollars, for which they are required to give large bonds, are getting a compensation which is exceeded by bank clerks even in some of the ordinary banks. Many of these men could obtain even in ordinary times double the salary the Government pays them. They are entitled to much greater pay.

So I ask Senators to give consideration to the report, in order that to-morrow morning we can take up the measure and dispose of it as soon as possible.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, it is very probable that the salaries of post-office employees should be rearranged, and that they should be increased. Almost every day since I have been here I have heard the administration criticized for extravagance in having unnecessary employees and for the high cost of running the Government. I undertook to investigate the matter and looked into this particular case. I have a copy of a letter which the Postmaster General wrote to the chairman of the committee, which I ask may be read by the Secretary. We certainly have one man who is in favor of economy.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEPTEMBER 10, 1919.

Hon. CHARLES E. TOWNSEND,
Chairman Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Your letter of August 14, inclosing a communication from Mr. Everett C. Fish, president of the Michigan Council of Postal Associations, was brought to my attention upon my return to the city. In reply I wish to state that the conditions in the Postal Service as to the matter of securing employees are the same as in industrial institutions. At a few places in the United States, because of the extraordinary and unusual conditions prevailing, it is difficult to secure a sufficient number of employees. This condition, however, would not be remedied by increases in salaries as it is due solely to a shortage of labor. This condition is more pronounced at Detroit, Mich., than at any other city, and because of the extraordinary conditions prevailing at Detroit and a few other cities the department gave its approval to House joint resolution 151, as originally introduced by Representative MADDEN, which would have granted the Postmaster General the authority to increase the salaries of employees not to exceed 35 per cent of their basic salary in cities where extraordinary and unusual conditions prevail. It would enable the department to take care of any situation and to handle each case on its merits. A few million dollars spent under this resolution would amply provide for exigencies of the service. The resolution, however, as passed by the House eliminated this provision and provides for a flat increase of $150 for each of the employees enumerated and will cost approximately $40,000,000 per annum.

The statement frequently made by those interested in securing increases in salary for postal employees that the experienced employees are leaving the service by thousands is not borne out by the facts. There are regularly employed at the 125 largest post offices in the United States approximately 51,500 clerks and carriers. Of this number during the past year 4,701, approximately 9 per cent, resigned from the service. These cities include the industrial centers where the labor conditions are acute, and our information is that the turnover in such institutions has been from 75 to 300 per cent per annum. It will therefore be seen when this is compared with the turnover of 9 per cent in the Postal Service that the changes have been infinitesimal. There is no doubt that the turnover in the Postal Service has been less than that of any business institution. It also indicates clearly that the employees of the Postal Service are not to any great extent dissatisfied with their employment and are not leaving the service in the manner stated so frequently by the agitators who attempt to speak in their behalf. Of the 4,701 employees who resigned from the service 3,427 were in the $1,000, or entrance grade.

The postal employees were granted on July 1 of this year an increase in most cases of $100 in addition to the $200 war bonus authorized last year and which has been continued during this fiscal year, and it is believed that with the exception of the few instances cited this is sufficient until the congressional commission which is now making an investigation of salaries in the Postal Service with a view to reclassifying same has completed its work and made its recommendation to Congress.

To grant the employees the $150 increase provided in House joint resolution 151 will involve an additional expenditure of $40,000,000, and as the revenues of the Postal Service, because of the increased salaries, are not now sufficient to meet the expenditure, it will place an additional burden of that amount upon the public. The resolution as amended, therefore, does not have my approval.

Very sincerely,

A. S. BURLESON,
Postmaster General.

Mr. DIAL. There is a second letter, Mr. President, dated October 7, which I wish to have read also.

The Secretary read as follows:

OCTOBER 7, 1919.

Hon. CHARLES E. TOWNSEND,
Chairman Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I have noticed in statements contained in the press that your committee has agreed to report out House joint resolution 151, which provides for increases in salaries of postal employees of approximately $38,000,000.

This matter was fully covered in my letter addressed to you recently, in which it was stated that the resolution as it passed the House did not have my approval. Extraordinary conditions do exist in a few places, and the salaries of the employees should be increased in such instances, and if authority were granted to do se, the department could amply care for the needs of the postal service at a cost of not more than $2,000,000.

I feel it my duty to again call to your attention that an appropriation of $38,000,000 for increased compensation to postal employees at this time, in my judgment, is unnecessary and would simply add a burden to that extent on the public, and which must be borne by taxation or otherwise, as the postal revenues will not be sufficient to meet it.

Very sincerely,

A. S. BURLESON,
Postmaster General.

BUILDING REGULATIONS FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6863) to regulate the height, area, and use of buildings in the District of Columbia and to create a zoning commission, and for other purposes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I shall object to taking up the bill. We have Calendar Monday. A number of us are interested in measures on the calendar. Every time Calendar Monday comes along, some one asks unanimous consent to pass over the calendar for that day, and then bills on the calendar are taken up and everybody loses interest in the calendar. I have no doubt in the world that this bill will have speedy consideration and be speedily passed at any time when the calendar is called. Until next Monday, if I have any say in the matter at all, I shall object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER].

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, the bill establishes a zoning commission in the District of Columbia to regulate the height, area, and use of buildings in the District. It has passed the House, is strongly urged by the District Commissioners, and I think meets with the approval generally of the people of the District. The commission provided for in the bill is composed of the District Commissioners, the officer in charge of public grounds of the District, the chairman of the Fine Arts Commission, and the Superintendent of the United States Capitol Building and Grounds. The commission must meet within six months after the passage of the bill and lay out the District into districts in which certain character of buildings will be permitted and certain other character of buildings prohibited. I shall be glad to go into a further explanation of the bill if Senators desire. I ask that the bill may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments, and stated the first committee amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the bill be read and that the amendments be passed over at this time. When the bill shall have been read, we may then have the amendments stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The reading of the bill will be continued.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the bill, which is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That to protect the public health, secure the public safety, and to protect property in the District of Columbia there is hereby created a zoning commission, which shall consist of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, the officer in charge of public buildings and grounds of the District of Columbia, and the Superintendent of the United States Capitol Building and Grounds, which said commission shall have all the powers and perform all the duties hereinafter specified and shall serve without additional compensation. Such employees of the government of the District of Columbia as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this act shall be assigned to such duty by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia without additional compensation.

SEC. 2. That within six months after the passage of this act and after public notice and hearing as hereinafter provided, the said commission shall divide the District of Columbia into certain districts, to be known, respectively, as height, area, and use districts and shall adopt regulations specifying the height and area of buildings thereafter to be erected or altered therein and the purposes for which buildings and premises therein may be used: Provided, That the permissible height of buildings in any district shall not exceed the maximum height of building now authorized upon any street in any part of that district by the act of Congress approved June 1, 1910, and amendments thereto, regulating the height of buildings in the District of Columbia: And provided further, That no such districts shall be established, nor shall any regulations therefor be adopted, nor shall the height, area, or use of buildings to be erected therein be prescribed until said commission has afforded persons interested an opportunity to be heard at a public hearing as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 3. That wherever, under the provision of this act, it is required that a public hearing shall be held, notice of the time and place of such hearing shall be published for not less than 10 consecutive days in one or more newspapers of general circulation printed and published in the District of Columbia; and such public hearing may be adjourned from time to time: Provided, That if the time and place of the adjourned meeting is publicly announced when the adjournment is had, no further notice of such adjourned meeting need be published.

SEC. 4. That after the public hearings herein provided for shall have been concluded, said commission shall definitely determine the number and boundaries of the districts which it is hereby authorized and directed to establish, and shall specify the height and area of the buildings which may thereafter be erected therein, and shall prescribe the purposes for which such buildings thereafter erected may or may not be used. Said districts so established shall not be changed except on order of said commission after public hearing. Said commission may initiate such changes, or they may be initiated upon the petition of the owners affected. Where the proposed change is to add a contiguous area to a use, height, or area district, the owners of at least 50 per cent of the street frontage proposed to be changed must join in the petition: Provided, That if the frontage proposed to be changed is not a contiguous area, the owners of at least 50 per cent of a frontage within the area not less than three blocks in length must join in such petition before it may be considered by said commission. No such change shall be made, either by said commission on its own motion or upon such petition, except with the unanimous vote of said commission, if the owners of at least 20 per cent of the frontage proposed to be changed protest against such change.

SEC. 5. That said commission is authorized and empowered to make such orders and adopt such regulations not inconsistent with law as may be necessary to accomplish the purposes and carry into effect the provisions of this act: Provided, That no order or regulation so adopted shall require any change in the plans, construction, or designated use of (a) a building for which a permit shall have been issued, or plans for which shall be on file with the inspector of buildings of the District of Columbia at the time the orders or regulations authorized under this act are promulgated; or (b) a permit for the erection of which shall be issued within 30 days after promulgation of the orders or regulations authorized or adopted under this act and the construction of which in either of the above cases shall have been diligently prosecuted within a year from the date of such permit and the ground story framework of which, including the second tier of beams, shall have been completed within said year, and which entire building shall be completed according to such plans within two years of the date of the promulgation of such orders or regulations; or (c) prevent the restoration of a building partially destroyed by fire, explosion, act of God or the public enemy, or prevent the continuance of the use of such building or part thereof as such use existed at the time of such partial destruction, or prevent a change of such existing use except under the limitations provided herein in relation to existing buildings and premises: Provided further, That no frame building that has been damaged by fire or otherwise more than one-half of its original value shall be restored within the fire limits as provided by the building regulations of the District of Columbia; or (d) prevent the restoration of a wall declared unsafe by the inspector of buildings of the District or by a board of survey appointed in accordance with any existing law or regulation.

SEC. 6. That any lawful use of a building or premises existing at the time of the adoption of orders and regulations made under the authority of this act may be continued, although such use does not conform with the provisions hereof or with the provisions of such orders and regulations; and such use may be extended throughout the building, provided no structural alteration, except those required by law or regulation, is made therein and no new building is erected. Where the boundary line of any use district divides a lot in a single ownership at the time of the adoption of orders and regulations under the authority of this act, the commission may permit a use authorized on either portion of such lot to extend to the entire lot, but not more than 25 feet beyond the boundary line of the use district.

SEC. 7. That maps of the districts established by said commission and copies of all orders and regulations as to the height and area of buildings to be erected therein and as to the uses to which such buildings may be lawfully devoted, and copies of all other official orders and regulations of the commission shall be filed in the office of the Engineer Commissioner of the District of Columbia. Copies of all orders and regulations shall be published in one or more newspapers printed in the District of Columbia for the information of all concerned.

SEC. 8. That it shall be unlawful to use or permit the use of any building or premises or part thereof hereafter created, erected, changed, or converted wholly or partly in its use or structure until a certificate of occupancy shall have been issued by authority of said zoning commission.

SEC. 9. That buildings erected, altered, or raised, or converted in violation of any of the provisions of this act or the orders and regulations made under the authority thereof are hereby declared to be common nuisances; and the owner or person in charge of or maintaining any such buildings, upon conviction on information filed in the police court of the District of Columbia by the corporation counsel or any of his assistants in the name of said District, and which court is hereby authorized to hear and determine such cases, shall be adjudged guilty of maintaining a common nuisance, and shall be punished by a fine of not more than $100 per day for each and every day such nuisance shall be permitted to continue, and shall be required by said court to abate such nuisance. The corporation counsel of the District of Columbia may maintain an action in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia in the name of the District of Columbia to abate and perpetually enjoin such nuisance.

SEC. 10. That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall enforce the provisions of this act and the orders and regulations adopted by said zoning commission under the authority thereof, and nothing herein contained shall be construed to limit the authority of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to make municipal regulations as heretofore: Provided, That such regulations are not inconsistent with the provisions of this law and the orders and regulations made thereunder. In interpreting and applying the provisions of this act and of the orders and regulations made thereunder they shall be held to be the minimum requirements for the promotion of the public health, safety, comfort, convenience, and general welfare. This act shall not abrogate or annul any easements, covenants, or other agreements between parties: Provided, however, That as to all future building construction or use of premises where this act or any orders or regulations adopted under the authority thereof impose a greater restriction upon the use of buildings or premises or upon height of building, or requires larger open spaces than are imposed or required by existing law, regulations, or permits, or by such easements, covenants, or agreements, the provisions of this act and of the orders and regulations made thereunder shall control.

SEC. 11. That all laws or parts of laws and regulations in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

The first amendment of the Committee on the District of Columbia was, in section 1, page 1, line 8, after the words "District of Columbia," to insert "the chairman of the Fine Arts Commission," so as to read:

That to protect the public health, secure the public safety, and to protect property in the District of Columbia there is hereby created a zoning commission, which shall consist of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, the officer in charge of public buildings and grounds of the District of Columbia, the chairman of the Fine Arts Commission, and the Superintendent of the United States Capitol Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Borah	Harris	McNary	Smoot
Brandegee	Harrison	Nelson	Spencer
Calder	Hitchcock	New	Sterling
Chamberlain	Jones, Wash.	Newberry	Sutherland
Dial	Kenyon	Norris	Trammell
Fletcher	Keyes	Nugent	Wadsworth
France	King	Page	Walsh, Mont.
Gay	La Follette	Penrose	Watson
Gerry	Lenroot	Pittman	Williams
Gronna	Lodge	Pomerene
Hale	McCormick	Sheppard
Harding	McKellar	Smith, Md.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-five Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of absent Senators.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. JONES of New Mexico, Mr. OVERMAN, Mr. PHIPPS, Mr. POINDEXTER, Mr. SIMMONS, Mr. SMITH of Arizona, Mr. SMITH of Georgia, Mr. TOWNSEND, and Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts answered to their names when called.

Mr. ASHURST, Mr. CUMMINS, Mr. KELLOGG, Mr. COLT, Mr. PHELAN, Mr. MOSES, Mr. KENDRICK, Mr. BALL, Mr. WARREN, Mr. BANKHEAD, Mr. CAPPER, Mr. FERNALD, Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. WOLCOTT, Mr. DILLINGHAM, Mr. GORE, Mr. UNDERWOOD, Mr. BECKHAM, Mr. KIRBY, and Mr. CURTIS entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to announce that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS], and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] are absent from the Senate on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-four Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I feel that it would be very unwise to try to pass this most important bill between now and the hour of 2 o'clock. I have not a doubt in my mind that there ought to be some regulation in regard to the height and area of buildings in the District of Columbia, and I have no objection to the creation of a zoning commission for the purpose of directing how buildings shall be erected, their height, and the area of the same. I think it would be very wise to create a zoning commission, as provided in the bill; but, as I read the bill, it gives a power to this commission as to the use of all classes of buildings that is far beyond reason or safety.

If the power granted to this commission as to the use of buildings for improper or unlawful purposes was all that was granted, I should have no objection to it whatever. But the bill is so broad in its scope that this commission can set aside any part of the District of Columbia for business purposes, for residential purposes, or for manufacturing purposes, or for any purpose that they may desire or think of, and anyone within a designated district who erects a building as authorized under the bill, if it should become a law, would have little to say as to how it should be used. In other words, the commission could say just what sized buildings could be built in any district or what character of buildings. They could exclude any character or design of a building they desired to.

But that is not all. A man may build himself a home, and, being well to do, may build it in such a way and of such a size as his present financial condition would warrant. Reverses may come to the man, and he may be compelled, in order to take care of his family and support them, to rent a part of the building. The owner of a building, if this bill should become a law, would have nothing to say as to whether he could or could not rent a part of that building, for the commission may decide to so do would make it a rooming house and not a residence. This commission could say to him there can not be two families live in the house at the same time, or it would prevent the renting of any part of it. It does seem to me that if we give the commission the power to regulate the height of the building, to regulate the area of the building, to regulate the character of the building, and to map the city off in zones, that is power enough to give to any commission.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Utah a question. If I understood him aright a moment ago, he said that under this bill the commission could say how many people should be in a building.

Mr. SMOOT. There is nothing in the bill that would prevent them from saying that the building should be occupied by only one family, and they could say under the provisions of the bill that there should not be two families occupy any building within a designated zone.

Mr. WILLIAMS. From what language of the bill does the Senator get that idea?

Mr. SMOOT. Let me call the Senator's attention to some of the provisions of the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish you would. I am asking for information.

Mr. SMOOT. Beginning with section 2, it reads:

That within six months after the passage of this act, and after public notice and hearing as hereinafter provided, the said commission shall divide the District of Columbia into certain districts, to be known, respectively, as height, area, and use districts, and shall adopt regulations specifying the height and area of building thereafter to be erected or altered therein, and the purposes for which buildings and premises therein may be used.

That is only one provision.

Mr. PHELAN rose.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator from California to wait until I get through with this, because I want the Senator from Mississippi to consider all the use provisions of the bill at the same time. These are the regulations we authorize the commission to make as to the purpose for which buildings shall be used. There is no limitation whatever as to regulations that may be made and enforced. Then later in that same section there is the following proviso:

And provided further, That no such districts shall be established, nor shall any regulations therefor be adopted, nor shall the height, area, or use of buildings to be erected therein be prescribed until said commission has afforded persons interested an opportunity to be heard at a public hearing as hereinafter provided.

That, I think, is perfectly right, and should be there. The next provision to which I desire to refer is in section 4:

That, after the public hearings herein provided for shall have been concluded, said commission shall definitely determine the number and boundaries of the districts which it is hereby authorized and directed to establish, and shall specify the height and area of the buildings which may thereafter be erected therein, and shall prescribe the purposes for which such buildings thereafter erected may or may not be used.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does not that mean that they shall specify that it shall be a residence, or a shop, or an apartment, or a hotel?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; that may be done; but it is not limited to such specifications.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Has the Senator any idea that they may say how many people shall be in the house?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly. The regulations I have already read give them that authority. But let me continue with the other provisions. I will simply read to the Senator all that have reference to the use of buildings.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Go ahead.

Mr. SMOOT. Section 8 provides:

That is shall be unlawful to use or permit the use of any building or premises or part thereof hereafter created, erected, changed, or converted wholly or partly in its use or structure until a certificate of occupancy shall have been issued by authority of said zoning commission.

In other words, no part of it could be changed for any purpose until they received the authority of the zoning commission. It is entirely in the hands of the commission, and they are to say what the building shall be used for, whether it shall be used for a residence, and if for a residence there is nothing to prevent a regulation being made as to just how many people shall live in it. There is nothing to prevent them from saying that the kitchen of the house shall be in the basement or ground floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, it seems to be a far cry from an authority which gives the right to designate the purpose for which a building shall be used, whether as a residence, or for shopkeeping, or manufacturing, or what not, and saying that an authority is given because it is not denied; that it is given, according to the Senator's argument, to say how many people shall live in the building and whether the kitchen shall be in the basement or on the ground floor. It seems to me to be a far cry, I repeat, from what the Senator has read to the conclusion which the Senator has drawn.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there is nothing to prevent the zoning commission from doing exactly what I have contended.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There is nothing in the act to prevent a hundred things, but the act does not give any authority for them.

Mr. SMOOT. It gives the zoning commission authority to make regulations, and if you began to enumerate them——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Regulations as to height and area, and the purposes for which the building shall be used.

Mr. SMOOT. And the use of the building covers all I have said it does.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The purposes of the use, is all.

Mr. SMOOT. The bill reads that—

This act shall not abrogate or annul any easements, covenants, or other agreements between parties: Provided, however, That as to all future building construction or use of premises where this act or any orders or regulations adopted under the authority thereof impose a greater restriction upon the use of buildings or premises or upon height of building, or requires larger open spaces than are imposed or required by existing law, regulations, or permits, or by such easements, covenants, or agreements, the provisions of this act and of the orders and regulations made thereunder shall control.

Mr. President, power is given to this zoning commission over the question of the change of a building, the whole question as to what you shall do with your property, how it shall be used, and for what purposes it shall be used.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah permit an interruption?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. PHELAN. I served on the committee which drafted this bill. The bill primarily comes from the Fine Arts Commission. The object is simply to protect the residential and public portions of the city of Washington, and to prevent the encroachment of objectionable occupations. Where the use is referred to in the bill, it means in certain sections of the city manufacturing use, in other sections of the city residential use; but the use in the sense of limiting the number of rooms or determining the number of people who shall dwell in a building is utterly foreign to the purpose of the bill, and I do not think such a construction is conveyed in the language of the bill.

I may call the attention of the Senate to the fact that because of the absence of a law of this kind, providing for zoning districts, and regulating the height of buildings, the city of Washington is in a fair way of seriously suffering in its use of Meridian Park, which was purchased by the Government at an expense, including the improvement, of $1,000,000; and now, because there was no restriction of this kind, a permit has been given by the District Commissioners, under the old law, to erect an apartment house which will to a considerable extent obstruct the view of people from that park, which is purely a scenic park. It was selected and improved for the very purpose of commanding a view of the city, and now, because there was no proper and adequate regulation, an apartment house is going up which will obstruct the view.

These things have brought to the minds of the people interested in the District of Columbia that there is need for such a law. So this law will give to a commission, consisting of the District Commissioners, the chairman of the Fine Arts Commission, and the United States officer in charge of public buildings and grounds, the power to zone the city and to regulate the use of buildings in the sense of providing certain parts of the city for machine shops, factories, garages, and other employments, which would be objectionable in parts set aside for residence and for public use.

I think the construction which the Senator from Utah puts upon the bill is strained, and certainly not contemplated. I do not think any fair interpretation would give such power to the newly formed commission, if the bill is passed, as to enable them to regulate the number of rooms which shall be in a dwelling and the number of persons who may be in a house, only in so far as the height of the building controls such a subject.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there is no objection whatever to the greater part of the bill on my part, nor do I believe that there is a Senator or Representative who would object to the provisions of the bill as far as it relates to the height of buildings, or to the designation of the zones in which certain classes or kinds of buildings shall be erected.

Mr. CALDER. That is the very purpose of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I know that is the purpose of the bill, but it does not stop there. The bill proceeds and gives the zoning commission absolute power as to how a building shall be used. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] suggested that the bill does not specify the powers of the zoning commission. That is the danger in the bill. If it specified the powers, the commission could not go beyond the specified powers. It gives a general power of regulation of the use of buildings; and that is the only objection I have to the bill.

Mr. CALDER. I would be pleased if the Senator from Utah would suggest an amendment to accomplish the purpose he has in mind, for I am confident that the bill meets all the objections he raises. It is a meritorious bill and will be more helpful to the District of Columbia than any measure of this character we have ever enacted.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator that I shall offer certain amendments, which I hope the Senator will receive favorably, designed to protect a person who has already built a home, which home falls within the zoning area, so that he shall at least have some say as to what he shall do or how he shall use that home.

Mr. CALDER. The purpose of the bill is to protect people who own property in this city from encroachment by others who are taking advantage of the situation.

Mr. SMOOT. I am not objecting to that part of the bill, I will say to the Senator.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany in open executive session.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

Mr. LODGE. I ask that the Secretary read sections 7 and 8, which were not read yesterday, so as to bring the Shantung amendment before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SPENCER in the chair). The Secretary will read the sections named.

The Secretary read as follows:

"Section VII.

"TURKEY AND BULGARIA.

"Article 155.

"Germany undertakes to recognise and accept all arrangements which the Allied and Associated Powers may make with Turkey and Bulgaria with reference to any rights, interests and privileges whatever which might be claimed by Germany or her nationals in Turkey and Bulgaria and which are not dealt with in the provisions of the present Treaty.

"Section VIII.

"SHANTUNG.

"Article 156.

"Germany renounces, in favour of Japan, all her rights, title and privileges—particularly those concerning the territory of Kiaochow, railways, mines and submarine cable—which she acquired in virtue of the Treaty concluded by her with China on March 6, 1898, and of all other arrangements relative to the Province of Shantung.

"All German rights in the Tsingtao-Tsinanfu Railway, including its branch lines, together with its subsidiary property of all kinds, stations, shops, fixed and rolling stock, mines, plant and material for the exploitation of the mines, are and remain acquired by Japan, together with all rights and privileges attaching thereto.

"The German State submarine cables from Tsingtao to Shanghai and from Tsingtao to Chefoo, with all the rights, privileges, and properties attaching thereto, are similarly acquired by Japan, free and clear of all charges and encumbrances."

Mr. LODGE. All the amendments are the same. I merely ask that they may be read.

The next amendments of the Committee on Foreign Relations were, in article 156, line 1, after the words "in favor of," to strike out the word "Japan" and insert the word "China"; in line 9, after the words "acquired by," to strike out the word "Japan" and insert the word "China"; and, in line 13, after the words "acquired by," to strike out the word "Japan" and insert the word "China."

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does the Senator from Massachusetts think, before we pass by the amendments, that it might be possible to obtain a unanimous-consent agreement for the treatment of these amendments en bloc?

Mr. LODGE. Yes; I shall ask that they be considered en bloc. That is the reason why I asked to have them all read.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. For the purpose of having them considered en bloc?

Mr. LODGE. Yes; that is the reason why I made the request to have them all read.

The Secretary read as follows:

"Article 157.

"The movable and immovable property owned by the German State in the territory of Kiaochow, as well as all the rights which Germany might claim in consequence of the works or improvements made or of the expenses incurred by her, directly or indirectly, in connection with this territory, are and remain acquired by Japan, free and clear of all charges and encumbrances."

The next amendment was, in article 157, line 5, after the words "acquired by," to strike out the word "Japan" and insert the word "China."

The Secretary read as follows:

"Article 158.

"Germany shall hand over to Japan within three months from the coming into force of the present Treaty the archives, registers, plans, title-deeds and documents of every kind, wherever they may be, relating to the administration, whether civil, military, financial, judicial or other, of the territory of Kiaochow.

"Within the same period Germany shall give particulars to Japan of all treaties, arrangements or agreements relating to the rights, title or privileges referred to in the two preceding Articles."

The next amendments were, in article 158, line 1, after the words "hand over to," to strike out the word "Japan" and insert the word "China"; and in line 6, after the words "particulars to," to strike out the word "Japan" and insert the word "China."

Mr. LODGE. I ask that the six Shantung amendments, which are substantially one, be considered as one amendment. They are all the same.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. LODGE. I believe the Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] desires to address the Senate at this time upon this amendment and the league. I wish merely to say that there are several Senators who have given notice of speeches upon this amendment, and there are one or two who can not speak before next week, so that it is impossible at this moment to arrive at an agreement to vote on the amendment; but if Senators are not prepared to go on, I shall ask that the rest of the treaty be read. There is only one other amendment besides.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that if we pass over these amendments temporarily it might be possible for us to agree now upon a date when we shall take them up. I dislike very much to pass them over indefinitely. I think the Senate possibly——

Mr. LODGE. I am not asking to pass them over indefinitely. They are before the Senate now, but there are Senators to speak upon them certainly both to-day and to-morrow, and probably the next day. I was proposing to provide for the future. I do not want to waste any time, and if I can not get an agreement to vote on an early day next week, I only wanted to give notice that I should ask for the reading of the treaty to be continued beyond the amendment, so that time may not be wasted.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the request of the Senator is very desirable. My only suggestion is that there are certain committees, one in particular, which desire to leave Washington, and if we should have a definite agreement that we would return to these amendments at a certain day, say Wednesday of next week, for instance——

Mr. LODGE. Very well, Mr. President; then I ask unanimous consent that if the occasion arises—it may not arise—we may continue the reading of the treaty and return to this amendment on Wednesday of next week.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I will say that if the reading of the treaty should be concluded before that time, certainly something ought to be before the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. I think the league would still be before the Senate.

Mr. LENROOT. No; I think we are reading for amendments.

Mr. LODGE. I suggest to the Senator if we continue the reading, as I desire to do——

Mr. LENROOT. And then return to the Shantung amendment and let it be before the Senate?

Mr. LODGE. And then return to the Shantung amendment, or, continuing the reading, we shall meet with one other amendment, offered by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], relating to the reparation commission, and we shall also meet with the labor provisions of part 13, which, I think, are likely to give rise to a good deal of debate. I think there will be no difficulty in filling the time. I only wanted to give notice that if a moment comes when nobody is ready to go on with a discussion of the Shantung amendment we can continue the reading of the treaty, and that was understood. I have no objection to asking unanimous consent that we shall return to it Wednesday, but I do not think we will gain anything by it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It has been my purpose, as the Senator from Massachusetts knows, to arrange with him, if possible, to set down the Shantung amendment for a vote on Friday, but we discovered that such an arrangement could not be made. However, as I have understood the situation, it might be possible to take up the Shantung amendment definitely on Wednesday next, and there is, so far as known, no objection to doing that.

Mr. LODGE. I am perfectly ready to agree to return to the Shantung amendment on Wednesday next. Of course, that is no agreement to vote.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is about as far as we can get, I suppose. I hope that we shall reach an early vote after Wednesday; but it seems, so far as I can learn, to be the concurrent opinion that we should on Wednesday next begin the discussion which would lead to——

Mr. LODGE. The final discussion.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Which would lead to an early vote. I therefore ask that the unanimous-consent agreement be so framed that we shall proceed with the reading of the treaty after the Senator from Maryland and other Senators have made their addresses, and that thereafter, on Wednesday next, we shall take up for consideration the Shantung amendments en bloc, as agreed.

Mr. LENROOT. Suppose the reading of the treaty is finished on Monday, what will the Senate do in the meantime under such a unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have no doubt there will be ample discussion which will take us until Wednesday. As the Senator knows, I am very anxious to hasten the matter, but I find by investigation that it is impossible to get consent for any earlier date than Wednesday. I think both the Senator from Massachusetts and I have concluded that this would expedite the matter as much as possible. I doubt whether we will be able to finish the reading of the treaty by that time.

Mr. LENROOT. Why does not the Senator request that we go on with the reading of the treaty before we take up the Shantung amendment?

Mr. LODGE. That is what I was desiring to do.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think it is very desirable to clean it up as we go. I think we can return definitely to the Shantung amendments on Wednesday, and that will be pending until we get a vote on it. That will give everybody a reasonable time and will accommodate the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. LENROOT. I think the Senator's suggestion will simply mean further delay.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. How would the Senator frame the request?

Mr. LENROOT. I would frame it so that if we do conclude the reading of the treaty before Wednesday, the Shantung amendments will be before the Senate.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should be delighted with such an arrangement, if other Senators would consent to it.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Nebraska if under his statement the understanding will be that there will be no vote in the Senate on any amendments before Wednesday of next week?

Mr. LODGE. No vote on the Shantung amendment.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. There will be no vote on the Shantung amendments.

Mr. LODGE. As I said, there is another amendment with reference to the reparation commission, offered by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] and there is the labor council provision, which is also amended, and on which there will be a great deal of debate.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. After the Shantung amendments are passed there is only one other remaining amendment, and that is on page 261.

Mr. KENYON. The labor amendment will not be taken up prior to the Shantung amendment?

Mr. LODGE. No; they are all subsequent. Everything is subsequent to the Shantung amendment. I should like to use the time in getting the treaty read, if there are no Senators ready to discuss the Shantung amendment or the league.

Mr. FLETCHER. Would it be possible to agree to vote on Wednesday, and not merely have it brought up at that time for consideration?

Mr. LODGE. I do not think so. I have made inquiry and I do not think it is possible to agree to a vote at that time. I should be very glad to do so, but I do not think it is possible. I think we can agree to return to the Shantung amendment on Wednesday. As it now stands, we can return to it at any time. My desire is to get the treaty read, which I think had better be done.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If the Senator from Massachusetts will permit me, I will endeavor to frame a unanimous-consent agreement which possibly will meet the views of various Senators. It is that after the pending addresses are delivered, the Senate shall pass over temporarily, until next Wednesday, the Shantung amendments, to be considered then en bloc, meanwhile reading the treaty.

Mr. LODGE. Of course, if we pass it over temporarily, which is the custom with appropriation bills, the reading would continue without anything more being said.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; but I am very anxious to have a certain date set, as are very many other Senators.

Mr. LODGE. I shall be very glad to have an agreement that we shall return to the Shantung amendment on Wednesday next.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I suggest the following agreement: That the Senate now proceed to the reading of the treaty, subject to the addresses to be delivered here; that the Shantung amendments be passed over until next Wednesday, to be considered then en bloc, and that if, during the reading of the treaty, amendment No. 45, on page 261, is reached, that also shall be passed over for consideration subsequent and next to the Shantung amendment.

Mr. LODGE. Very well; that is perfectly satisfactory.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the agreement proposed?

Mr. LENROOT. If the Senator would modify that by the further condition, that if the reading shall be concluded before next Wednesday the Shantung amendments shall be taken up upon the conclusion of the reading of the treaty, I should not object.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I shall be very glad to accept that amendment. However, I do not think there is much likelihood of it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. May I inquire of the Senator if he has included in his agreement any provision that we shall come to a vote on Wednesday?

Mr. LODGE. Not at all.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. We will proceed with the reading of the treaty, and there are reasons, which have been explained to me, why it seems that a number of Senators are determined to postpone progress until that time. I am constrained to yield, because I feel that yielding now may promote progress. I do not want to urge it unnecessarily.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I should be very glad to enter into an agreement that would bring this treaty to a vote and a conclusion, for I think the Senate and the country both are very desirous of reaching some conclusion. We have had a very ample debate—and I am not complaining about that fact—but there is no use, so far as I can see, of entering into an agreement concerning the consideration of the treaty and postponing the time for voting unless we are prepared to say that on that day we are going to vote.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, my only purpose was to avoid any waste of time. When those who desire now to speak upon the Shantung amendment shall have done so, if we can then pass the amendment over temporarily, in order to give an opportunity to Senators who wish to speak next week, I want to avail myself of the intervening time to have the reading of the treaty completed. As we can not reach an agreement to take a vote, that seems to me the practical thing to do.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, if the Senator is trying to save time I am thoroughly in accord with him, but it is the most remarkable effort to save time that I have ever seen.

Mr. LODGE. Very well, Mr. President——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It appears to be an effort to postpone a vote without affording any subsequent opportunity to vote, and to postpone debate without giving any opportunity to bring the treaty up for consideration.

Mr. LODGE. Very well, Mr. President. I have done my best, and so has the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] under existing circumstances to expedite the reading and disposition of the treaty. Every line of the treaty we read advances its consideration; for that is something that must be done; but if the Senator prefers that the time should be taken in other ways it probably will be, for there are Senators here who are going to insist that there be an opportunity for those Senators to whom I have referred to express their views upon the Shantung question before a vote is had upon it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I have said very little about this treaty, because I do not care to occupy the attention of the Senate or the time of the country. I have reached a conclusion, in my mind, as to what I am going to do; but I judge from the intimation of the leader of the other side of the Chamber that if an agreement is not made at this time to postpone consideration of the vital questions involved in the treaty we shall witness a filibuster on the part of the controlling element in the Senate to prevent action on this question.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, he must not misstate what I said.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I did not say that the Senator made that statement.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator has misstated it absolutely. I am ready to come to a vote.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I said that was the only conclusion I could draw from what the Senator said.

Mr. LODGE. It is an entirely erroneous conclusion from anything that I said.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If that is so, if I am mistaken in drawing that conclusion from what the Senator said, then I am sure that we will make progress by reading the treaty, because, if no extraneous matter is coming in here for the purpose of delay, of course we will proceed with the consideration of it, and, when the speeches of Senators on the Shantung question are disposed of, we will come to a vote probably before Wednesday. If there is no effort to delay, if it does not mean that we are going to have a filibuster for the purpose of delay——

Mr. LODGE. There will be no filibuster.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then the probabilities are that we will get a vote before Wednesday, and I think that a vote on this question before Wednesday is of great importance.

It is not my purpose, Mr. President, to interfere with the management of this treaty. I think the Senator from Nebraska has been an excellent leader for those of us who follow his side of the case, and it is not my disposition to interfere in any way with his leadership, but I do protest against the pendency of the treaty before the Senate an unnecessary length of time. I do not believe that the debate is going to affect any votes in the Senate. We have got to come to a final conclusion. If the treaty is going to be ratified, it ought to be ratified now, and, if it is going to be amended by the Senate, the sooner it goes back to Europe for further consideration the better it will be for this country. From my standpoint, I do not see that there is any justification whatever for further extended delay in the consideration of this matter. Therefore I think if we are going to enter into an agreement concerning its consideration we ought to have attached to that agreement an opportunity to vote. I am perfectly willing to enter into any agreement that will bring about a vote. I do not say that I intend to object to the proposal of the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Nebraska, but I am not going to sit in my seat without protest and hear it intimated that the treaty can not be voted on because it is for the convenience of this Senator or that Senator when it is not for the convenience of the country to wait any longer on the deliberations on this floor.

Mr. LODGE. Very well, Mr. President, I withdraw my request, and the debate will continue on the Shantung amendment.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if the Senator from Alabama desires to save time, the only way it can be saved now is by reading the treaty, because there is ample reason to believe that the debate will legitimately continue upon the Shantung matter. It is immaterial to me, except for the fact——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Senator will allow me, of course if the debate continues legitimately that amount of debate will take place anyhow.

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But if it is to continue illegitimately, then it is a filibuster. So it is either a filibuster or we are going to occupy time anyhow.

Mr. BORAH. We have got to read the treaty for the next two or three days or we have got to read the treaty after the vote on the Shantung amendment; it has got to be read at some time, and the simple question now is whether we will temporarily pass over the Shantung amendment and read the treaty in the meantime or whether we will debate the Shantung matter and read the treaty afterwards. It is simply a transposition of the time of reading and of debating; that is all, so far as that is concerned, and, as I understand, that was the object of the proposed agreement.

Mr. LODGE. That was the object of my request.

Mr. BORAH. Simply to transpose the time of reading and the time of the debate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I hope the Senator understands that I did not rise to object, because I rarely ever object to what is being done in the Senate. I become very tired of the Senate's way of transacting business at times; I believe we should have a cloture rule and attend to business like other parliamentary bodies attend to it; but I tried that once and did not succeed and I have got to take my medicine, which I proceed every day to do.

Mr. BORAH. Every dog has his day; and the Senator may be successful later.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But I am not here to object to any agreement that the leaders of the two sides of the Chamber desire to make; I am not going to register an objection; but I merely want to express my decided opposition to any further delay in the consideration of the treaty. I believe in being courteous to any Senator on the floor of the Chamber; but when a matter of such great importance as this is pending before the Senate, with the interests of our country and of the world at stake, I think Senators should make their personal engagements conform to the business of the country and not have the great business of the country delayed to conform to their convenience.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request for unanimous consent?

Mr. FRANCE. I object.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I wish simply to state what my purpose was. The Senator from Nebraska and I found there would be objection to the proposed unanimous-consent agreement. Personally I was very willing to agree to a time to vote, but we found it was impossible to get such an agreement. To my knowledge there are five Senators who are going to speak on the Shantung amendment. It seemed to me very desirable, inasmuch as we can not hope to get a vote on it before Wednesday or Thursday of next week, that if there came any gap where no Senator was ready to speak, the time should be occupied in reading the treaty, which would be distinctly advancing the case; for, of course, to get the reading of the long document out of the way—and it must be done—will be helpful. Therefore, I think, Mr. President, it is very well to leave the matter just where it is; let Senators who desire to speak on the Shantung amendment proceed, and if a point is reached where no Senator is ready to go on, then I shall ask that the reading of the treaty be continued.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made to the request for unanimous consent.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I gave notice yesterday that I would submit some remarks on the treaty of peace to-day; but, in view of the fact that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] will address the Senate and is likely to take all the afternoon, I will postpone my remarks until to-morrow at the earliest opportunity.

Mr. FRANCE addressed the Senate. After having spoken for nearly three hours,

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, the Senator from Maryland has been speaking for about three hours. May I inquire of him if he can finish to-night? If not, I will move an adjournment.

Mr. FRANCE. I could conclude in about an hour. If I do not do so now, I would feel compelled to finish to-morrow, and in that case I am afraid I might interfere with other Senators who have already announced their intention to speak to-morrow.

Mr. CURTIS. I do not think it would interfere with the other Senators who will speak to-morrow.

Mr. FRANCE. I shall be very glad to yield, then, with the understanding that I shall have the floor to-morrow to conclude.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate, as in legislative session, adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, October 9, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, October 8, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou infinite source of all that we see, or know, or dream, or imagine; whose love reflects itself in the stars that gild the heavens by night, in the sun which illumines the earth by day, in every blade of grass, tree or flower, in a thousand fields of grain which rustle in the breeze, in the vast storehouses of untold treasure which Thou hast hidden beneath the earth, in the sweet face of the mother who looks with ineffable love down upon the babe that she cradles in her arms, in every thought that shapes itself into a noble deed, help us as intellectual, moral, and spiritual beings to look up and worship Thee, in spirit and in truth, that our life may be well pleasing in Thy sight. In the spirit of the Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 7972. An act to improve the administration of the Postal Service in the Territory of Hawaii.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6810) to prohibit intoxicating beverages and to regulate the manufacture, production, use, and sale of high-proof spirits for other than beverage purposes, and to insure an ample supply of alcohol and promote its use in scientific research and in the development of fuel, dye, and other lawful industries.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 3096. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Red River at or near Moncla, La; and

S. 2867. An act to authorize the President when Maj. Gen. Crowder retires to place him on the retired list of the Army as a lieutenant general.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to bills of the following titles:

S. 794. An act granting lands for school purposes in Government town sites on reclamation projects; and

S. 55. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to adjust disputes or claims by entrymen, selectors, grantees, and patentees of the United States against the United States and between each other, arising from faulty surveys in townships 36, 37, and 38 south, ranges 29 and 30 east, Tallahassee meridian, in the State of Florida, and for other purposes.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under caluse 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. 2867. An act to authorize the President when Maj. Gen. Crowder retires to place him on the retired list of the Army as a lieutenant general; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. 3096. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Red River at or near Moncla, La.; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 253. An act for the payment of claims for loss of private property on account of the loss of firearms and ammunition taken by the United States troops during the labor strikes in the State of Colorado in 1914.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, Mr. SMALL was granted leave of absence, for three days, on account of public business.

RESIGNATIONS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following resignations:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., October 7, 1919.

HON. FREDERICK H. GILLETT,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I hereby tender my resignation as a member of the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, to take effect at once.

Respectfully, JAMES M. MEAD.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., October 8, 1919.

The honorable the SPEAKER,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: Permit me to tender my resignation, effective at once, from the Committees on Public Buildings and War Claims.

Respectfully, yours, JOHN W. RAINEY.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C.

To the Hon. FREDERICK H. GILLETT.

SIR: I hereby tender my resignation from the Committee on Expenditures on Public Buildings, to take effect immediately.

I am, HERBERT C. PELL, Jr.

PRINTING A HOUSE DOCUMENT.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, in the October number of Harper's Magazine is an article by the Hon. JOSEPH G. CANNON on a national budget. It is an article showing great study of this subject, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed as a House document.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that an article by Mr. CANNON on the budget be printed as a House document. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ELECTION TO COMMITTEES.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I send to the desk the following resolution and ask for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. KITCHIN moves that the following-named Members be, and they are hereby, elected members of the standing committees of the House, as follows:

Foreign Affairs: Mr. THOMAS F. SMITH of New York.
Agriculture: Mr. JOHN W. RAINEY, of Illinois.
Railways and Canals: Mr. JAMES M. MEAD, of New York.
Library: Mr. HERBERT C. PELL, Jr., of New York.

The resolution was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a resolution unanimously adopted by the Thirtieth Division Association of the American Expeditionary Forces recently passed at its first reunion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD for the purpose indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, upon what subject did they resolute?

Mr. KITCHIN. The bonus and other bills before Congress proposing aid to the soldiers. It will be enlightening to many of us who are tumbling over each other to do something to catch "the soldier vote."

Mr. WALSH. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The resolution is as follows:

Whereas we are informed that certain bills have been introduced in the Congress of the United States and are now there being considered, which bills provide the payment of bonuses of one kind or another to members of the United States Army, Navy, and Marine Corps who served therein during the late World War; and

Whereas we believe that these bills have for their object the commercialization of the patriotism of the young men and women who served their country during the emergency both at home and overseas, and further seek to make out of the former members of the American Army, Navy, and Marine Corps a football for scheming politicians: Now, therefore, in order to make plain the views of the Thirtieth Division Association of the American Expeditionary Forces, now holding its first reunion, be it, and it is hereby

Resolved, That, in our opinion, the Congress of the United States, through the War Risk Insurance Bureau, makes reasonable provision for the beneficiaries of our fallen comrades, and it is our desire that this provision be continued.

Second. That we indorse and approve the policy of the Government of the United States to continue the war-risk insurance for those soldiers who have returned and been discharged the service.

Third. That we believe it to be the duty of the Government of the United States to make ample provision to care for and maintain in comfort those of our comrades who have been permanently disabled and are rendered helpless by reason of wounds or injuries received in the service.

Fourth. That we believe it to be the duty of the Government of the United States to render aid to and make reasonable provision for those of our comrades who have been partially disabled by wounds or injuries received in the service.

Fifth. That we believe the Government of the United States owes no duty to give bonuses or other financial aid to those of us who have returned to our homes unwounded and uninjured, except that it should give preference in civil and public employment to those of us who seek such employment and are fitted for the same.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

The SPEAKER. To-day is Calendar Wednesday, and the Clerk will call the committees.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts (when the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries was called). Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 9692.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9692) to amend section 13 of an act entitled "An act to promote the welfare of American seamen in the merchant marine of the United States; to abolish arrest and imprisonment as a penalty for desertion, and to secure the abrogation of treaty provisions in relation thereof, and to promote safety at sea," approved March 4, 1915.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, the bill is an amendment which has been reported to the committee by a subcommittee which had it in charge——

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the bill ought to be read.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Very well; I have no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9692) to amend section 13 of an act entitled "An act to promote the welfare of American seamen in the merchant marine of the United States; to abolish arrest and imprisonment as a penalty for desertion, and to secure the abrogation of treaty provisions in relation thereof; and to promote safety at sea," approved March 4, 1915.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 13 of the act entitled "An act to promote the welfare of American seamen in the merchant marine of the United States; to abolish arrest and imprisonment as a penalty for desertion, and to secure the abrogation of treaty provisions in relation thereto; and to promote safety at sea," approved March 4, 1915, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 13. (a) That no vessel of 100 tons gross and upward, except those navigating rivers exclusively and the smaller inland lakes and except as provided in section 4516 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by section 1 of this act, shall be permitted to depart from any port of the United States unless she has on board a crew not less than 75 per cent of which, in each department thereof, are able to understand any order given by the officers of such vessel, nor unless 40 per cent in the first year, 45 per cent in the second year, 50 per cent in the third year, 55 per cent in the fourth year after the passage of this amendment, and thereafter 65 per cent of her deck crew, exclusive of licensed officers and apprentices, are of a rating not less than able seaman.

"(b) The following persons shall be rated and certificated able seaman by any board of local inspectors upon passing an examination under rules to be prescribed by the Department of Commerce as to eyesight, hearing, and physical condition:

"(1) Citizens of the United States of 19 years of age or upward who have graduated from any of the training ships of the recruiting service of the United States Shipping Board, or from school ships approved by and conducted under rules prescribed by the Secretary of Commerce, or who have passed the final examinations given by such recruiting service, and have had nine months' service on deck at sea or on the Great Lakes on a vessel or vessels to which this section applies, including decked fishing vessels, naval vessels, Coast Guard vessels, lighthouse vessels, Coast and Geodetic Survey vessels, and vessels of the Bureau of Fisheries.

"(2) Aliens and citizens of the United States not complying with the foregoing requirements of 19 years of age or upward, who have had at least three years' service on deck at sea or on the Great Lakes on the aforesaid classes of vessels, or, if the rating is for service on the Great Lakes or on the smaller lakes, bays, and sounds, who have had at least 18 months' service on deck or at sea or on the Great Lakes or on the smaller lakes, bays, and sounds on the aforesaid classes of vessels: Provided, That upon a further examination under rules prescribed by the Department of Commerce, as to knowledge of the duties of seamanship, any person of the classes named in this subsection found competent therein, and who has qualified as to eyesight, hearing, and physical condition, may be rated an able seaman after having served on deck 12 months at sea or on the Great Lakes; but aliens examined and rated able seamen under this proviso shall not in any case compose more than one-fourth of the number of able seamen required by this section to be shipped or employed upon any vessel.

"(c) Each board of local inspectors shall keep a complete record of all certificates of service issued by it and to whom issued, and shall keep on file the affidavits upon which such certificates were issued.

"(d) No clearance shall be given to any vessel failing to comply with the provisions of this section. The collector of customs may on his own motion cause a muster of the crew of any vessel to be made to determine whether this section is being complied with, and shall cause such muster to be made upon the sworn information of any reputable citizens of the United States, filed with him at least six hours before the vessel departs or is scheduled to depart, setting forth that this section is not being complied with. Any person who knowingly makes a false affidavit for such purpose is guilty of perjury, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $500 or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both.

"(e) Any violation of any provision of this section by the owner, master, or officer in charge of the vessel shall subject the owner of such vessel to a penalty of not less than $100 and not more than $500.

"(f) The Secretary of Commerce shall make such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this section, and nothing herein shall be held or construed to prevent the Board of Supervising Inspectors, with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce, from making rules and regulations authorized by law as to vessels excluded from the operation of this section."

Mr. ROWE. Mr. Speaker, a very large number of Members have asked opportunity to speak on this bill in general debate, and I would like to ask unanimous consent for three hours' general debate instead of two hours, as provided for by the rule.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that general debate fixed by the rule of two hours be extended to three hours. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask what these speeches will be about?

Mr. ROWE. Entirely on this bill. The Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, both the Democratic side and the Republican side, decided that this was an important measure, and they would like properly to discuss it before the House.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, why does it take three hours to discuss a bill like that?

Mr. ROWE. Well, in the first place, it is an amendment to the seamen's act, on one of the most important sections of the seamen's act, and it will require a good deal of general discussion. There is really only one section to it, so that we can not get in under the five-minute rule very well.

The SPEAKER. There is no five-minute rule, the Chair will state.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If time is to be devoted to harangues of a miscellaneous nature, I am opposed to it. If it is going to be confined to the bill, as I do not know anything about the bill, I do not object to it.

Mr. ROWE. I shall ask that it be confined to the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman whether he is going to have anybody here to hear the debate? There are probably about 45 or 50 Members, not over that, here now. If there is going to be an audience here to hear it, whereby some good may be accomplished, why, then, the time of the House will be well taken up.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I suggest to the gentleman from Texas that he can probably regulate that better than the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROWE].

Mr. BLANTON. I am not so facetious in that regard as probably the gentleman imagines.

Mr. GARRETT. Is it the gentleman's purpose to ask that we may consider the bill as under the five-minute rule for amendment?

Mr. ROWE. We can not do it——

Mr. GARD. You can by unanimous consent.

Mr. ROWE. I think it would be well to do it. I believe if we get the extra hour for the general discussion we can complete the bill to-day. I want to do so.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I want to suggest that there is only one section in the bill. It is not at all complicated. Amendments may be offered to that one section.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I shall not occupy time on the bill. It has been thoroughly considered by the subcommittee that has had it in charge, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROWE] is the chairman of that subcommittee. I yield him 20 minutes of time.

Mr. ROWE. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, the seamen's act became a law on March 4, 1915, and there have been practically no amendments made to that act since it was passed.

During the last four years the world has witnessed a great upheaval, and in no department of business or government has the upheaval been so great as in the merchant marine of the world. In June, 1914, before the war broke out in Europe, the world had 49,000,000 gross tons of shipping. During the four years, or nearly five years, which have elapsed since that time, many merchant vessels have been destroyed, but because of the immense building program of the United States and Japan, and because of England's desperate effort to keep her merchant ships upon the seas, there has been no great change in the merchant tonnage of the world. The fact is that to-day it exceeds the tonnage of 1914, as according to Lloyd's, recently issued, the world had in June, 1919, 50,919,000 gross tons of merchant vessels. During this time there has been an immense increase in the merchant tonnage of the United States. When the war broke out in 1914 we had scarcely 2,000,000 gross tons of overseas shipping. We have now in excess of 8,000,000 gross tons of overseas shipping.

This has been accomplished, so far as the United States is concerned, by an immense building program, appropriated for by Congress and carried out by the Shipping Board. For instance, we increased considerably over 4,000,000 tons, to be accurate, 4,187,600 tons, in the year ending August 31, 1919.

The question came to your Merchant Marine Committee in the early part of this session, as it did last year, as to how the United States were to supply the seamen necessary to operate their vessels, now and in the future. At the time of the passage of the seamen's act about 43 per cent of the seamen on American vessels were American citizens. Of this number 65,196 were American born and 29,965 were foreign born. In the four years which have elapsed since that act went into effect there has been a great change as to the number of American citizens who are native born that have gone to the seas. We have increased from 65,196 to 97,160 the number of seamen on American ships that are native born. We have decreased in the number of naturalized citizens from 29,900 to 24,600.

It is interesting also to note that in 1914, prior to the breaking out of the war in Europe, 47 per cent of the seamen on American ships were American citizens. The following year it had dropped to 43 per cent; in 1916 it was 43 per cent; in 1917 it had dropped to 42 per cent; in 1918, to 41 per cent. Now, it has again gone back to the place it was in 1914, namely, 47 per cent.

How did we accomplish that? How were we able to find the seamen to supply the ships of the American merchant marine which in so brief a period jumped from 2,000,000 gross tons to 8,000,000 gross tons in the overseas trade? The Shipping Board found after the war broke out in Europe that we were short of officers, and they created a school, headed by a Mr. Howard, of Boston, to find officers for the merchant marine. And he started about it in a very sensible way. Being accustomed to the sea and especially to the coastwise business of the merchant marine, and being a New Englander, he realized that the only men that had been sufficiently trained for this work and that were not already in the overseas trade, were on the fishing vessels along the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, and just a few who had gone into the other lines of business and had left the merchant marine, and were living on the land. He canvassed the entire Atlantic and Pacific coasts for men who had had sufficient time at sea and who could in a brief time qualify as officers on steam vessels. These were found almost entirely on sailboats. In that way they gathered a sufficient number to make the officers on the ships operated by the merchant marine. Then there came a very urgent call for seamen, and they found these on land, and they trained these by establishing training schools, the main school at Boston, with branches all along the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, for the training of men, chiefly on board training ships, and in two or three months after they had gone there and taken their first lessons they were put on board merchant vessels as common seamen. In this way the schools established by the Shipping Board have furnished 27,000 men for our merchant ships, about 9,000 of these for the deck, about 9,000 for the stewards' department, and about the same number for the engine room. These men have made good.

Mr. ALEXANDER. By the engine rooms, the gentleman means the firing rooms?

Mr. ROWE. The firing rooms; the firemen's department.

Under the seamen's act, section 13, practically all of the able-bodied seamen must reach the position and get their certificate after three years' service at sea. I say practically all, because in the seamen's act there was a provision for a shorter cut, namely, after service on shipboard for one year they could take an examination given under the direction of the Department of Commerce and become thereby able seamen, but the facts show that but very few have come in in that way, and practically all of those came from the two training ships, one at Boston and one at New York, and they were for the most part sailors who failed to pass the officers' examination and become third mates, and were given a certificate as able seamen and allowed to go to sea.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ROWE. I do.

Mr. HICKS. There seems to be some misunderstanding or some error in the reports that I have in my possession in regard to the tonnage of American ships. In the gentleman's own testimony before the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries on the 3d day of September he mentioned that the total gross tonnage of the United States is 8,000,000 tons, and in Lloyd's Register, under date of June 30, that tonnage is given as over 10,700,000. Where is the discrepancy? They are both dealing in gross tons, as I understand, and yet here is a discrepancy of nearly 3,000,000 gross tons.

Mr. ROWE. I think the gentleman is mistaken as to my testimony. The United States tonnage is to-day something over 10,000,000 tons. There is 8,000,000 tons engaged in the overseas trade.

Mr. HICKS. Then the gentleman's figures do not include the coastwise trade?

Mr. ROWE. They do not include the coastwise trade or the trade on the Great Lakes.

Mr. HICKS. My figures of 10,700,000 tons do not include the Great Lakes trade, but do include the coastwise trade, I imagine, for that is deep-sea navigation.

Mr. ROWE. That is correct. The deep-sea tonnage is something between 10,000,000 and 11,000,000.

Mr. HICKS. I would like to ask the gentleman another question.

Mr. ROWE. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HICKS. Looking over this Lloyd's Register, as I gather it, there are only two nations which during the war have increased their seagoing tonnage at all, and they are Japan and the United States. Japan has increased her seagoing tonnage by about 617,000 tons, while America has increased its seagoing tonnage by 7,812,000 tons. Is that about correct, as the gentleman understands it?

Mr. ROWE. That is about correct.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman allow me to put in as a part of my question to him some figures that I have prepared here?

Mr. ROWE. I have no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROWE. Certainly; I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. The caption of the bill before us among other things, provides that one of its purposes is "to abolish arrest and imprisonment as a penalty for desertion, and to promote safety at sea"?

Mr. ROWE. No. The original seamen's act did that.

Mr. BLANTON. But the caption of this bill so states, and this bill has something to do with the original seamen's act?

Mr. ROWE. Yes; but this only amends section 13. It has nothing to do with imprisonment at sea.

Mr. BLANTON. That was merely a preamble to the question I was going to ask the gentleman. The purpose of having a merchant marine is, of course, to benefit our Government and to promote its business prospects, I take it?

Mr. ROWE. That is the object of it.

Mr. BLANTON. Now, may I ask the gentleman whether, should this Government at any time, in time of war or in peace time or during the time of reconstruction, see fit to send a cargo, whatever it might consist of, to a certain port, we would be interested and the gentleman's committee would be interested in seeing that that cargo was sent there expeditiously and safely? We would be, would we not?

Mr. ROWE. Certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. May I call the gentleman's attention to a circular letter which, I presume, by reason of its address has come to every Member of Congress this morning in the mail? It came to my office, and by its form of address I presume it came to every other office. It is dated "Seattle, Wash., October 2," and it is addressed "to the honorable Members of Congress of the United States, Senators and Representatives, Washington, D. C." Without reading this whole letter, I may say that it states that the longshoremen of Seattle, with the approval of the Central Labor Council of Seattle, deemed it advisable and upon their own counsel absolutely refused to handle certain supplies and armament and ammunition then held in Seattle for shipment to Russia, because they did not deem it advisable to send them to Russia. Now, may I ask the gentleman, if that state of affairs does exist in this Nation, and it should occur that this Government should see fit to send certain munitions and supplies to Russia for the protection of American interests there, whether we are at war with Russia or not, and I take it that the Government has the right to protect our rights in Russia, if we have rights there, and while I do not see the necessity of keeping soldiers there, yet if the Government says it is necessary I am not going to question the matter until I find out that the Government is wrong, and any men or combination of men attempt to thwart the action of the Government, may I ask the gentleman, should not your committee take certain steps, if steps are necessary, to see to it that when the Government deems it necessary to send munitions to Russia, no set of individuals, especially American citizens, can stop that shipment by their own act? Is not that a proper question for the gentleman's committee to take into consideration at this time?

Mr. ROWE. I think without question that the United States Congress should take up such matters.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROWE. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I think if the gentleman will examine the circular he will find that those arms are not being sent by the Government of the United States. I have read it.

Mr. CLEARY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROWE. Yes.

Mr. CLEARY. The subject matter that the gentleman is dealing with is the commerce of the United States?

Mr. ROWE. It is.

Mr. CLEARY. Therefore it is not connected with the matter that the gentleman from Texas refers to. The tonnage the gentleman from New York alludes to includes coastwise tonnage. Of course, seagoing tonnage is another thing. Of course, lots of barges are counted as American tonnage, but it is not seagoing tonnage. I wish to get that straight, that the gentleman is not talking about anything except the merchant marine and the commerce of the United States.

Mr. ROWE. That is correct.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. ROWE. Mr. Speaker, may I ask for 10 minutes more?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman 10 minutes.

Mr. HADLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROWE. Yes.

Mr. HADLEY. Has the gentleman information as to the shortage of seamen to man our merchant vessels for its completed program?

Mr. ROWE. Yes.

Mr. HADLEY. Is it the intention of the gentleman to discuss that?

Mr. ROWE. There is a great difference of opinion as to that. The labor organizations said there were ample. The shippers and the Shipping Board said they had great difficulty in finding the necessary number of seamen, and I thought the House would use its good judgment to-day, and when they realized that the American oversea business had increased from 2,000,000 tons to 8,000,000 in four years, they would appreciate the fact that it required more seamen than we have; and when they go further than that fact and realize that the Shipping Board has a plan and has in course of construction enough more ships so that by the end of next year we will have in the neighborhood of 15,000,000 tons, the Members of this House ought to realize that we must have more seamen.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROWE. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. HULINGS. Does the gentleman think that under the seamen's act, under our maritime laws, it is possible at all that we could enter into competition with the world in the merchant marine?

Mr. ROWE. I think it is possible. I think it is not only possible, but I believe we are going to do it.

Mr. HULINGS. But when you have to pay two or three times as much in this country for wages as Japan does——

Mr. ROWE. I do not care to go into the question of wages, but I will just answer the gentleman's question. England to-day is paying almost the same wages that we are. England was paying the same wages until the recent raise caused by a strike along the Atlantic coast, but now we are paying about $10 a month more to each seaman, or between $10 and $15 a month more than the English rates. The English rates are very largely followed by Norway, Italy, and France. The seamen of Japan are not yet receiving the same wages that are paid in the United States, but their wages have more than doubled, and will in a short time go higher.

Mr. HULINGS. At the same time, the cost of keeping the seamen aboard our ships, and the quarters furnished them, and all that, is twice as much as under the English rule.

Mr. ROWE. I can only say in answer to that that the merchantmen, the men who own the ships on the Atlantic and Pacific coast seaboard, say that they can compete with England.

Mr. KINKAID. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROWE. Yes.

Mr. KINKAID. Is it correct that the United States has been selling some tonnage? And if so, why?

Mr. ROWE. We have a large surplus of small ships ranging from 3,000 to 4,000 tons. We have also a large surplus of wooden vessels. The ones that have been sold so far to the foreign trade have been of the kind that we could not use in our merchant marine.

Mr. KINKAID. It is not in contemplation, then, that the United States will dispose of any ships that we can make serviceable in a complete, well-rounded-out merchant marine?

Mr. ROWE. No; it is not. There is a bill before our committee, we have had hearings upon it, and the plan of the Shipping Board is to sell only those that are surplus vessels to foreigners, and to sell to Americans all ships which can be used in our trade.

Mr. KINKAID. I have felt very much concern about this, because I feel that now is the time, if ever, for America to build up a merchant marine.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROWE. I will.

Mr. HICKS. There have been many rumors circulated in regard to the Shipping Board having under contemplation the construction of two 50,000-ton ships. The Scientific American has gone so far as to put sketches of these vessels in its paper. I never have been able to substantiate the rumor. Can the gentleman enlighten me?

Mr. ROWE. The gentleman has the right word; it is pure rumor. The Shipping Board has done nothing about it. The people who have proposed it have done nothing about it, and Congress has appropriated no money for them.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROWE. Certainly.

Mr. SNELL. There have been rumors circulated that the wooden ships which the Shipping Board has been selling are not fit for service.

Mr. ROWE. That is not entirely true; part of them are excellent ships. Of course, nearly all of them have been built under war conditions, and are good when you take that into consideration. Many of them have been sold at very good prices.

Mr. CLEARY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROWE. I will.

Mr. CLEARY. Is it not true that the Government is disposing of the smaller vessels because it is unprofitable for the Government to run that kind of a vessel?

Mr. ROWE. That is true.

Mr. CLEARY. And as far as certain ports of the country go, the vessels are properly built, but the Government has built some ships that it would not be profitable to use as seagoing vessels, but might be profitable as coastwise vessels, and so they are disposing of the vessels that would be unprofitable in whole or in part.

Mr. ROWE. That is so. We have more than we can use of the Lake type.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROWE. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. What specific amendment is there in the proposed bill that differs——

Mr. ROWE. If the gentleman will pardon me, in a few minutes I will explain the bill itself. On page 2 of the bill you will find the first 8 or 9 lines are exactly like the present law. In other words, we have made no change in the 75 per cent of the crew who must understand any order given by its officers. Your Committee on the Merchant Marine feel that that is essential to the operation of any merchant marine vessel that the orders given by the officers should at least be understood by 75 per cent of the sailors.

In 1915, after the seamen's act went into operation, vessels were required during the first year to have 40 per cent, the second year 45 per cent, the third year 50 per cent, the fourth year 55 per cent, and thereafter 65 per cent of the deck crew certified able seamen. The act has been so long in operation that at the present time if the act were enforced, which it can not be, or else we would have to take a great many ships off the sea, 55 per cent would have to be able seamen. With reference to that matter we have changed the percentage, and we have by this amendment turned back four years and begin again with 40 per cent.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ROWE. I ask for five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROWE. The committee felt that if 40 per cent able seamen was ample in 1915, it was good at this time. The Merchant Marine Committee felt that they ought not to go lower than that. Now, as a matter of fact during all this war we have been operating our ships contrary to these provisions, and we had to. Men were put on board ships in two months, some of them immediately as soon as they applied, and went to work in the operation of the vessels. But we found that splendid seamen, as good as any able seamen, could be made of some of them in six months, and very much of the testimony was to that effect. This bill, however, while originally calling for six months, has been changed by the committee to nine months. The present law requires a service of three years before a common seaman can be an able seaman. You can not get American boys to go into the merchant marine if they are to be held three years in service before they can be able seamen. The difference in wages is great, and they can not be held to do the same job over and over again at the same wage, especially if his time is largely spent in scrubbing the decks. Able seamen receive $85 and keep per month and ordinary seamen $65 per month.

The Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries claim that this is an act to bring the American boy into the merchant marine, and in subsection 1 you will see that this nine-months provision applies only to American boys, citizens of the United States. The very first words of subsection 1 show that:

(1) Citizens of the United States of 19 years of age or upward who have graduated from any of the training ships of the recruiting service of the United States Shipping Board, or from school ships approved by and conducted under rules prescribed by the Secretary of Commerce, or who have passed the final examinations given by such recruiting service, and have had nine months' service on deck at sea or on the Great Lakes on a vessel or vessels to which this section applies, including decked fishing vessels, naval vessels, Coast Guard vessels, lighthouse vessels, Coast and Geodetic Survey vessels, and vessels of the Bureau of Fisheries.

That is the meat of this bill. We found that the boys can do the work. The man who had charge of the work in the Navy appeared before our committee. He said that they trained their officers in six months, that they put them in very important places in seven months, and that they made good, and the man who testified to it is the governor of the Sailors' Snug Harbor in New York. He acted for the Navy during the time, and he said he had not believed it was possible to take a man off the farm and in seven months make an officer of him, an ensign able to do his full part in the Navy of the United States, but that they did it, and he said better men were never sent to sea.

Mr. CLEARY. Does not the gentleman think that the reason for having such long service in the past was because it required a great deal more practice and a great deal more efficiency and a great deal more time to acquire it on a sailing ship, where a man had to climb masts and set sails and do things of that kind, than are now required on steamships? I think the long period of apprenticeship was instituted at the time when commerce was principally carried on the ocean by sailing vessels.

Mr. ROWE. The gentleman is very familiar with the American merchant marine, having spent his life in it, and he can answer better than I can, but undoubtedly the operation of a sailing vessel was very much more difficult than the operation of a steam vessel.

Mr. CLEARY. I simply wanted to draw out that fact.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. ROWE. I will take two minutes more, if the gentleman will allow me.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman two minutes.

Mr. ROWE. Subsection 2 is the present existing law. It has been rewritten by our committee, but it still provides that anybody who does not care to take advantage of subsection 1 can come in under the three-year provision, or if a man wishes to try the examination given by the Secretary of Commerce he can, if he passes, come in under the one-year limit, if he has the physical qualifications and the necessary knowledge of seamanship. So we have not cut off the right, either of an American citizen or of a foreign-born man, to come under the three-year provision into our American merchant marine. [Applause.]

I yield back the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman yields back one minute.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] desire to use any of his time?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] such time as he desires.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I should like 10 minutes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I yield to the gentleman 10 minutes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill which I am not opposing, and in large measure I agree with it, and I am making this statement only in order to present my complete attitude in the matter.

I think it is absolutely essential that our Government should adopt as far as possible wise, sound, and efficient policies for the upbuilding and maintenance of our merchant marine. We have now the seamen's act, which was passed in 1915, which undertook to establish at least the basis of a policy for the upbuilding of our merchant marine. I noted the question asked by Gen. HULINGS a few moments ago of the gentleman then addressing the House [Mr. ROWE] as to whether or not it was possible for us to maintain a competitive merchant marine, under the seamen's bill and our laws, on account of the high wages which we had to pay to our seamen. I refer to the seamen's act with a great deal of pride, because it was attacked when it was passed as being so excessively restrictive and burdensome that it would destroy our merchant marine. The greatest feature of the attack on the bill was that it provided certain requirements as to language qualifications. It provided that 75 per cent of the members of the crews should be able to understand the language of the officers sufficiently to comprehend the orders of the officers. The shipowners denounced that provision, saying that under it they could not operate their ships at all because they could not employ non-English-speaking crews. One great manager of a line on the Pacific Ocean, the Pacific Mail Steamship Co., when he sold some of his large vessels, said he did it on account of the language test of the seamen's bill; that he could not compete with the Japanese on the Pacific Ocean if his crews had to be able to understand the language of the officers; that that would deprive him of the privilege of employing Chinese and Japanese labor as members of his crew. I knew, as a matter of fact, that that was a pretense, because that same man had testified before our committee that 90 per cent of his Chinese crews did understand the orders of the officers, and that, as a matter of fact, it would be a shame to our Nation to permit a policy to be continued under which our ships could be operated with crews more than 25 per cent of whom could not understand the language of the officers. The safety of life at sea demanded that at least 75 per cent of ships' crews should be able to understand orders. Then it was contended that we could not compete because of the excessive wages we paid. That is the point made here to-day by Gen. HULINGS, the gentleman from Pennsylvania. That may have been in a measure true before the enactment of the seamen's bill. But the seamen's bill equalized the wages of seamen on all ships sailing out of American ports. Briefly, I may explain how it did it.

The seamen's bill, for the first time in human history, gave to the seamen the same freedom that the laborer on land has. In that bill we said that, notwithstanding a seamen had signed articles of agreement in Liverpool or Naples binding him at a low wage for a round-trip voyage, under which he bound himself to return with the ship and under which by our treaties with foreign nations if he came to the coast of America and deserted his ship he could be arrested as a criminal and put back on board the ship, we would set him free. And we provided that in case of such desertion he could not be arrested. Under the old practice and policy of arresting deserting seamen when they quit their vessels in our ports and putting them back in charge of their officers on the vessel, it is true that seamen of other nations worked for less wages than the seamen of the United States, but under the operation of the seamen's act passed in 1915 the evidence is unanimous, without dissent, that the wages paid on American vessels are paid likewise on British vessels trading in American ports or on Swedish and Norwegian vessels for the simple reason that if a British vessel engages its crew in Liverpool at a less price than that at which that crew could be obtained in New York, when the crew gets to New York it quits the vessel, and unless the British master pays them the American wage, they will not return.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I interrupt only because by silence I do not want to seem to consent to the accuracy of that statement, and if the gentleman will permit me, I have here a statement from the Shipping Board under date of August 25, which shows that the average monthly wage expense——

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I think I shall come to what the gentleman is about to say in a moment.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Is very considerable more than that of British vessels.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. How much more?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. On a monthly wage expense on an American vessel of $5,400, the British wage scale is almost $1,600 less.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. The gentleman may be right about that particular vessel at that particular time, but witnesses also stated that was a recent raise by the American authorities and that the English always followed up the American raise. Prior to the last raise made in American wages, which was about August 1 this year, the wages were practically the same, and I have well-authenticated figures showing that for many months prior to that time wages on English and American vessels were the same. When we raise our scale the English vessel must follow after, as must also the Norwegian and the Swedish vessels.

Mr. HICKS. Has that always been the case, that the English merchant shipowner would follow in his wages the American shipowner.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Not until after we passed the seaman's act.

Mr. HICKS. Was it so before we passed the seaman's act?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. That is what I am trying to get into the heads of Members who have not studied the question. Before we passed the seaman's act, when an English vessel came to the American coast, the seaman engaged at $10 a month or $20 a month less than the wages paid ours if he deserted, would be arrested and put back on board the English vessel, but the seaman's bill abolished arrest and imprisonment for desertion on ships, with the consent of even the shipowners, who did not dare to oppose it, and after that act, which has been called the charter of liberty of the seamen, the wages of foreign vessels trading in the United States ports gradually approached and finally came up to the wages paid on American vessels, and for this reason: You can not work two freemen side by side with absolute freedom and equal attainments at different rates of wages. They will demand the same rate of wage.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, I am familiar, of course, with that provision of the seamen's act to which the gentleman referred, but would the gentleman give me the figures as to how many men have been arrested or would have been arrested if the seamen's act had not been passed?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I do not want to go extensively into that, because when we discussed another law which passed this House a short time ago I made a speech and went into it quite extensively; but, generally, the fact is simply this, that the wages of the seamen of other nations trading between our ports and their ports must gradually come up to the wages of the American seamen, and they have done it. When we raise our seamen's wages from time to time, under the influence of the rising cost of things, the wages of the seamen of other vessels than American are gradually raised, because if they are trading in the United States ports and they do not get the raise they quit their vessels and seek employment in our vessels.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. The gentleman is taking up my time on matters that are not involved in the present bill. I was induced to go into this matter because Gen. HULINGS, under the old idea that we could not compete on account of higher wages in this country, asked whether there was any chance of our merchant vessels competing with the foreign trade.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit me to interpolate a remark there? I think I am disposed to agree with the gentleman that there has been a tendency since the seamen's law was passed for wages to equalize.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. To approximate, at least.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I simply meant to suggest that I do not think the European wage has as yet reached the American standard, and I do not believe, myself, it ever will, although there has been that tendency.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Six months ago I had statistical information from Philadelphia, New York, and Boston, and at that time the wages paid on outgoing vessels of foreign nations, at least including the English and the Norwegian and one or two other nations, that had a great many ships, were the same, because they had been brought up to our wage standard by the privilege their seamen had of abandoning their vessels without arrest. The foreign ships had to pay the same wage to retain their crews. It is the unanimous testimony before our committee that the wages of seamen are determined not by the flag, but by the port in which they are hired. Consequently, if an English ship in New York has to have a seaman, it must pay New York wages, and when an English ship came into the port of New York after the passage of this act, with seamen engaged at lower wages than prevailed in New York, those seamen left the vessel and sought employment where they could get New York wages. Therefore, in order to hold their seamen the English vessels had to come to the American wage, and, therefore, under the operation of that law the wage cost of operating vessels is practically the same. Every other cost is exactly the same. The American vessel buys its material in whatever port it does at the market price, and everything, then, is equalized, wages and material for the operation of an American and English vessel. To make this plainer, if possible, let me read you from the testimony of Andrew Furuseth, president of the American Seaman's Union, before our committee on September 10, this year:

Mr. FURUSETH. But let me speak very soberly on the question, as soberly as I can. The war began in August, 1914. The seaman's act did not come into operation until November 4, 1915, in American ships. So that meant one year and about four months. Now, it did not get into operation in foreign vessels until the 1st of August, 1916. So that the war had been in operation for two years before the seaman's act came into operation on foreign vessels coming to the United States. There was not one cent's increase in the foreign seamen's wages during the war until the 1st of August.

The CHAIRMAN. What year?

Mr. FURUSETH. 1916, when our wages, the wages of the American seamen, were increased 50 per cent in the spring of 1916—in the month of March or April, I do not remember exactly the time. Now, then, the men on board foreign vessels could not quit those vessels without being arrested and put back again. The result was that the wages of those foreign seamen remained just where they were until the men were free to quit. The last crowd that was arrested for quitting a vessel was a crowd on an English vessel down at Norfolk or Newport News. I do not remember the name of it. We thought that the seamen's act was going into operation on the 1st of July, because that would give the full 15 months necessary, and the men thought they had a right to leave the vessel after July 1. Some of them left and they simply hired other men and paid the wages of the port. Then an English master arrested the men in Newport News or down in that part of the country, and took them before the court to have them put back on board the ship. The lawyer whom we hired then sent a communication to the department here, or had the court do it, I think, and a definite report came back that the law would be in full operation after August 1. They could not get the vessel to sea before August 1, so they had to pay the men off, and they paid them on August 7. You know, under ordinary circumstances, they would not have paid them off, but as it was then they had to pay them off and hire another crew at the American wages, and this particular crew was going to receive American wages. Since that time, in 1917, the wages increased to $60 a month, and they followed. You have that here in this publication—the matter that has been published by the department——

Mr. LEHLBACH. Wages paid to seamen, Committee on Commerce of the Senate?

Mr. FURUSETH. Yes; that is it. Now, that shows exactly how the wages have been following. Since that time, in 1918, the Shipping Board made the wages $75 and the foreign vessels followed it. And what is more——

Mr. ROWE. Don't you understand they have not yet followed it?

Mr. FURUSETH. On the very contrary, they pay $75 a month out of England now, and have been doing so for 18 months.

Mr. ROWE. You mean able-bodied?

Mr. FURUSETH. Yes; able-bodied.

Mr. ROWE. The others have not reached that yet?

Mr. FURUSETH. Yes; they have reached that.

Mr. ROWE. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. FURUSETH. They are doing it out of Norway; they are doing it out of Sweden; they are doing it out of Denmark * * *.

Mr. HARDY. As I understand, foreign vessels entering and leaving United States ports have had to take up every progress the American sailor has had?

Mr. FURUSETH. Absolutely. And what is more, they have to take up our progress as to the standards. When I was in Norway, they were discussing in Norway the taking up of our standard of efficiency. That had been recommended by the commission some years before. They were discussing taking up the standard of efficiency that had been made the law in America.

But there is one thing that has not been equalized, and that is the cost of the ship that flies the American flag. So long as we retain that handicap and try to use only American-built ships under the American flag, that long will our ships cost more, and we will be unable to compete.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield very briefly there?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Let me get through, and then if I have time I will yield.

Mr. HUSTED. It is in connection with what the gentleman has been talking about and it is a very short question.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Only a very short question.

Mr. HUSTED. I just wanted to ask the gentleman whether the wages of British ships that do not touch American ports, but with which American ships come in competition, are affected by the wages paid by British ships which do touch American ports?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Frankly, we can not affect that except that men engaged in the same trade are likely, even in London, to require the same wages. That would affect the wages paid by England in other trades indirectly, but not directly.

Mr. HUSTED. As a matter of fact, are wages of seamen on British ships that do not touch American ports considerably lower than the wages of seamen on British ships that do touch at American ports?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I do not know, but I know, for instance——

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I will.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I asked Mr. Furuseth that question on page 74 of the hearings.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Right at that point: I can understand very well, and always have understood, how we could maintain a uniform standard of wages on vessels entering our ports from foreign ports, but our competition must be in the world's trade. Now the English, Scandinavian, and German vessels are competing with us in the foreign trade, and what is the standard of wages of Great Britain and the Scandinavian countries as compared with wages on our vessels in other trades where we are competing with them and will have to continue to compete with them?

Mr. FURUSETH. On English vessels out of England——

Mr. ALEXANDER. Say for South America.

Mr. FURUSETH. Going to South America, to Bolivia, or to East India, they pay exactly the same wages as when they are going to New York. The wage out of England is made the American wage rate. The wage out of Norway, Sweden, Denmark, is the American wage rate, wherever their vessels are going to-day.

That is the information that he gives.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I thank the gentleman for that. I did not recall that that question had been asked, but you see how reasonable it is, for an Englishman in Liverpool employing sailors would hardly be able to employ them at one rate going to New York and another rate going to Valparaiso and gradually the effect would naturally be as stated by the witness, and all seamen going out of Liverpool would be paid the same wages. In addition to that our great purpose is not at the present time to engage in the commerce of the world which does not touch United States ports, but we want to be able to maintain our merchant marine in order to carry our cheap merchandise between ourselves and all foreign nations, and if we can make it so that the wages of the seamen on vessels plying between American ports and foreign ports are the same on the American ship as on the foreign ship, then we can compete in American commerce. Whether we shall be enabled to engage in commerce between Asia and Africa or Asia and Europe I do not know, but I do know prior to the time of the Great War between the States the American shipowners sailed upon the seas to all ports and even then America was paying better wages than the balance of the world, and I do know that the English, with a higher standard of wages than the Italians or the Frenchmen or any European nation, have sailed all the seas; and I do know, even if we had to pay a little bit more in wages than they, that our seamen are, and have always proven themselves, better seamen by virtue of the ingenuity and talent of the American people, and we can compete under the slight handicap of better wages. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. No. I desire to finish this and then, if I have time, I will yield. Now, in regard to policy. We adopted the policy set forth in the seamen's bill in 1915, and under it the percentage of American citizens taking service on ships has greatly increased. Before that act only about 8 or 9 per cent of our seamen were American citizens; now over 40 per cent are citizens of the United States.

Now, we provided a scale of skill that should apply to a deck crew. In 1915 we provided that the first year after the passage of that act 40 per cent of the deck crew should be able seamen. The next year after that 45, and the next year 50, and the next year 55, and then 60, and after that 65 per cent. Why? Because for safety of life at sea it was deemed necessary that a good percentage of the crew on the deck of a vessel on the ocean ought to be skilled seamen. A great question was raised as to how long it took to make a skilled seaman—that is, an A. B. We thrashed that question out in 1915. We determined ordinarily that it took three years on board a vessel to make a man a skilled seaman on the high seas, and that on the Lakes 18 months would do it. But we knew there were exceptionally bright characters, so we put it in that law that a man having a certificate of graduation from certain schools might upon examination be given a certificate as A. B. after one year's service on deck at sea, and on the Great Lakes—that is, where he had been educated and had gone through a school—and we also provided still further that especially bright individuals, if they had been at sea for one year, qualified physically, and stood the examination provided by the Bureau of Navigation, that they might qualify even though they had not been at such school. That was the provision of the act of 1915, but we limited the number of members of a crew, certificated as A. B.'s under the last provision, on any vessel to 25 per cent of the whole number of A. B.'s required. This was done because we believed that no vessel ought to go to sea with more than 25 per cent of its required able seamen having only one year's actual experience at sea, and no previous special training for the service.

This act now before us is intended to help build up the American merchant marine. And how? When we passed the act of 1915, we had about 2,000,000 tons of shipping to which it applied. We had only that much shipping to be supplied with crews. Now we have about 8,000,000 tons, and we expect by the end of next year to have 14,000,000 tons, and consequently the demand for able seamen under the existing conditions has increased.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have five minutes more.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. The demand has increased, and to meet that demand there have been schools organized. I want to say to you that, under the testimony before our committee, it takes one member of the deck crew for every 500 tons of shipping, and with 14,000,000 tons of shipping it will require 28,000 members of deck crews to man our expected tonnage. Sixty per cent of that would be some 16,800, which is the number of able seamen that would be required to man the 14,000,000 tons under existing law. The fact is that in this country to-day there are men holding A. B. certificates amounting to far more than 16,000, to far more than 28,000. As I remember the testimony, we have to-day over 50,000 able seamen (certificated) in the United States, but it is difficult in this abnormal time for men owning vessels at a given place to secure the necessarily equipped A. B.'s, and certainly I am willing to go back and commence over and let the law that we pass to-day fix the standard that we fixed in 1915, and say that we will begin with requiring 40 per cent of the deck crews to be A. B.'s for the first year after its passage, and then increase the percentage as we did in that act.

Now, if it will need 28,000 for the deck crews, 40 per cent of whom need to be able seamen, that will be only about 11,000 able seamen. There are over 50,000 of them in the United States, and if we pass this law our administrative officers ought to strictly enforce it. It is difficult to give a strong or compelling reason for lessening the requirements of the present law in any manner.

This bill only reduces the service qualification as to American boys. Now, for the sake of encouraging the American boys to go to sea, I am not fighting—at least, with any great degree of emphasis—the reduction of the qualification as it is made in this bill, as applied only to American citizens. The qualifications in the old law of 1915 as to foreigners still stands; but if our American boys want to go to sea and spend nine months, after graduating from one of these schools, on board a vessel, and then stand the examination, I am willing to make the experiment, although the testimony before us was that no man should really be an able seaman until he had had more than nine months' experience. Oh, I know he can scrub decks and do a great many other things on a vessel in normal times, but when the emergency comes, and he has to climb and twist around and know what to do, it is a different proposition. And a witness before us said that no period of years made the able seaman; it was the condition of the sea which he navigated; that when you came to an emergency the seamen longest on the sea was best qualified; and every seaman that came before us told us that a seaman, in order to be an able seaman, ought to have three years' service on deck. We have cut it down because there is no longer the same rigging to climb that there used to be, when every man had to be an able seaman. We do not have to have every man always an able seaman, but we do have to have them in emergency. And I am willing to make the experiment and say that we will try the American lad and give him, at 19 years of age, nine months of experience. Let him stand an examination after going through school, and if the Bureau of Navigation says he is competent and qualified physically and mentally, give him a trial.

I do not agree with the statement that these raw recruits that went to our merchant marine did fill the bill. They could not do it. We want to beware lest we go too far; and if this bill is tried and found wanting in that respect, we can put back the full requirements of the law of 1915. So I am not going to make any great kick on this bill. It does not change existing law greatly.

I have this further to say: A provision is put in here for nine months' experience on deck at sea as a qualification for an A. B. in order to encourage the young American. I somewhat doubt whether that is encouragement for a young American to go to sea. If it is, it is a discouragement for one, having been there a long time, to stay at sea.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I would like just two minutes more.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. The certificate of an A. B. is an asset. If you make it too cheap, it will not be prized. You start an American on a sea life, you give him three years' experience, and when he finds some whipper-snapper, that has not been at sea more than nine months, standing as high as he does, will it not discourage him? I believe there is grave question in this bill, but in order to forward the American merchant marine I yield my judgment to that of the rest of the committee and say we will go along; we will try it. I am for the upbuilding of an American merchant marine, so that henceforth the American flag will wave on every sea, and I am willing to try anything to make our merchant marine a great success. [Applause.]

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS].

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, it is rather hard for a layman to follow after the eloquent remarks of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY]. So I am going to say in a very few words what I think about this bill, and then I would like to turn your attention to the question of ships.

There is no doubt that it is necessary for us to pass some legislation of this kind at this time. A great many young men have had experience at sea. They do not care to stay at sea if they can not retain the present positions they occupy. We are bringing forward this afternoon a Senate bill which requires the Shipping Board to carry out the navigation laws as required on private vessels. If that is done, undoubtedly some of these young men will not be able to hold their present positions. So I believe, and I think most Members will agree with me; that this is a piece of proper legislation. It is useless for us to try to prepare young men to go to sea unless we prepare ships for them to go in. At the present time very few ships are being sold by the Shipping Board or have been sold. If these ships do not get into private hands, naturally the Government will run them. With the tremendous amount of shipbuilding that is going on to-day the Government will gradually find itself out of the business.

The private ships will take business because of their better operation and better management. When this happens, of course, the Government ships will probably stay in our harbors without any use being had of them.

There have been a number of questions asked by Members as to the authority which the Shipping Board had for selling ships. I wish to call attention to the emergency shipping act of June 15, 1917. In section 4 of that act it is provided that—

All ships constructed, purchased, or requisitioned under authority herein or heretofore or hereafter acquired by the United States shall be managed, operated, and disposed of as the President may direct.

At the present time the Shipping Board is acting under that provision, and it can, if it so desires, sell ships in any part of the world. The original shipping act also has a sale clause, as follows:

SEC. 7. That the board, upon the terms and conditions prescribed by it and approved by the President, may charter, lease, or sell to any person, a citizen of the United States, any vessel so purchased, constructed, or transferred.

Section 8 also says:

That when any vessel purchased or constructed by or transferred to the board as herein provided, and owned by the United States, becomes, in the opinion of the board, unfit for the purposes of this act, it shall be appraised and sold at public or private competitive sale, after due advertisement, free from the conditions and restrictions of this act.

That means that when they find a ship that is not useful to them they can sell it to foreign account; otherwise they must sell it to American account.

Mr. Hurley, recognizing the general sentiment of the country and, I think, the sentiment in this body that ships should be sold to American account, started—and I have no doubt that thought originated in his mind when the Committee on Appropriations recommended that he should sell ships to raise money to finish the balance of the ships—Mr. Hurley started to sell the ships. The board was then fairly well established, having offices in a number of different ports. When he left the board on July 31 he wrote me a letter, and said:

UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD,
Washington, July 31, 1919.

Hon. GEORGE W. EDMONDS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I feel I would be remiss if I failed to call to the attention of your committee the subject of an additional depreciation to be allowed on ships.

The history of ships' values shows radical and sudden fluctuations. At the present moment, and probably in the immediate future, ships can earn a profit on the basis of the Government cost. In view of past experience, however, the prospective purchaser of ships at Government cost hesitates primarily, because under the presently allowed depreciation for taxation purposes he can not reconcile a present investment at Government cost with a not distant competitive market value of ships.

The rate of depreciation now allowed has grown out of prewar practice, and in the opinion of prospective purchasers of ships, is very much less than should be allowed. These purchasers feel that at present cost the investment must be written down in the next three years to a value which will be comparable with the probable cost of ships deliverable during the last of the three years. For instance, a ship sold to-day at $210 a dead-weight ton should stand on the purchaser's books at the end of three years at not more than $127.50 a dead-weight ton, which, considering its age, would place it on competitive parity with a new ship coming out at $150 a dead-weight ton. All present indications point toward such a value. In fact, contracts can now be made for delayed deliveries at approximately this price for the same type of ship that to-day represents a Government cost of $210 a dead-weight ton.

It is rather difficult to establish just how much greater a depreciation should be allowed. I submit for your consideration a suggestion of a special annual depreciation of 10 per cent for a period of three years, over the normal 5 per cent. Such special depreciation, carrying a tax exemption for three years, might well be allowed on condition that at the expiration of the three years, or prior thereto, the fund thus created is applied to the construction of a new ship in an American shipyard. It might well be provided, moreover, that this fund should be set aside as a special depreciation fund, and deposited in a bank as such. If at the expiration of the three-year period the purchaser has not applied such untaxed special depreciation fund to the construction of a ship in an American shipyard, either as a whole or part owner, he should, of course, be required to pay to the Government the full tax which he would have been called upon to pay had this special depreciation not been allowed. It is possible that it might be wise to continue the special depreciation allowance beyond the three-year period, but in that event it might also be wise to have it less than 10 per cent for the additional years.

There is no difference of opinion as to the desirability of building up the American merchant marine, and also encouraging construction of ships in American shipyards. I feel very strongly that this suggestion of a nontaxable depreciation allowance on ships purchased from the Government is fair to both the purchaser and the Government. It would help the Government to dispose of its ships at a fair value, say, approximately at cost; would put the purchaser of a Government ship in a position where he would feel reasonably sure that such investment would not be excessively great when compared with ships constructed and delivered two or three years from this date; and at the same time, unless the money is applied to the construction of new ships, the Government will not be the loser, as the purchaser is then compelled to pay to the Government all taxes which would have been payable under normal practice, just as though the special depreciation fund had not been allowed. Such a program, it seems to me, would add a great incentive both to the construction of new ships and the participation of American shipping men in the development of the merchant marine.

Sincerely, yours,

EDWARD N. HURLEY, Chairman.

That letter was written by Mr. Hurley on July 31. Immediately following his resignation, or a short time after his resignation, Mr. John Barton Payne was appointed head of the Shipping Board. In the Philadelphia Press of September 23 Mr. Payne made the first public announcement that I know of. He said, first, that he favored private ownership; and, second, this statement is made:

FAVORS PRIVATE OWNERSHIP.

Persons close to Mr. Payne say he does not contemplate any radical change in the policies of the board, although his method of carrying those policies out will differ from Mr. Hurley's. He is reputed to believe that the Government should not engage in any form of private business, and, therefore, he will attempt to bring to an end both the business of shipbuilding and of ship operation on the part of the Government. So long as these two activities must be engaged in by the Government, Mr. Payne wishes to exercise those functions with the smallest expenditure possible.

While it may be possible to bring the business of shipbuilding to an end rapidly, and thereby enable the disbanding of the Emergency Fleet Corporation, the business of ship operation must continue until all the Government ships are sold to private interests or permanently disposed of.

Under the Payne plan of rigid economy this last promises to be a long drawn out affair. Mr. Payne is reputed to be opposed to writing off $1,000,000,000 of the cost of building our vast merchant marine. He would prefer to return to the Treasury of the United States every cent that Congress has appropriated for shipbuilding.

I presume we all agree with him if that is possible. I read further:

MUST SACRIFICE WOOD SHIPS.

Even under this scheme, Mr. Payne is ready to acknowledge that it will be impossible to obtain for the wooden ships the full cost to the Government. They must be sacrificed at a loss. But he hopes to avoid such a loss on the steel ships. Mr. Payne is said to be holding out for a quotation on the standard steel ships of $210 a ton for spot deliveries. That is a higher price than has heretofore been asked for the vessels.

Many commitments of sales were made before Mr. Payne took charge and most of these were made through the New York sales office established under the Hurley administration. Mr. Payne is said to be planning to discontinue the New York sales office entirely.

Under the suggested Payne plan, it is said, with the full cost quoted on ships offered for sale, the purchaser would be required to make a cash payment of 25 per cent, and payments of 20 per cent each year until the whole had been paid. Interest would be charged on the deferred payments. Such a marking up of the value of these ships would check the ship sales, and the Government would be compelled to continue its possession and operation. So long as the Government is compelled to continue operating such ships as it owns, Chairman Payne believes that the Government should enjoy the full return from such operation.

Again we agree with him.

Now, that was Mr. Payne's statement, made on September 23. Now the situation, gentlemen, as I see it, is this: The Shipping Board can not sell ships at the present price.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question right there?

Mr. EDMONDS. Certainly.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I just want to enforce the gentleman's suggestion. This bill has nothing to do with the policy of the sale of our ships?

Mr. EDMONDS. No. I realize that.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I think it is altogether appropriate for the gentleman to make that statement.

Mr. EDMONDS. I made that statement, that we could not man the ships unless we had the ships operating.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. This is somewhat outside of the bill. Does the gentleman think that for the interest of this country, that as to the ships that we have to sell, many of which are said to be defective, if we put them on the market would it not be wise to let them bring the highest price they would bring on the open markets of the world?

Mr. EDMONDS. Undoubtedly.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. No matter whether the purchaser was an American or a foreigner?

Mr. EDMONDS. I just want to go a little bit further in this sale of ships, because I think the House should know the condition of affairs, and I think it is of the utmost importance at the present time that some understanding should be had as to what should be done with these ships if we expect to operate them. Certainly they will not be operated by the Government at the present cost of operation when freights return to normal.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to his colleague?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Mr. HULINGS. I would like, if the gentleman cares to express an opinion to the House, to know whether he thinks it possible under the present navigation and seamen acts of this country and the cost of building ships in this country, to run an American merchant marine in competition with the world—the Japs, for instance, or the English?

Mr. EDMONDS. It is possible, providing that we are prepared to give certain aid.

Mr. HULINGS. Now you are talking.

Mr. EDMONDS. No; I am not speaking of a subsidy. What that aid will be will be a question to be decided when shipping is back to its normal operation cost and you know what is necessary.

Mr. HULINGS. Yes; but I have an idea that if a man got a ship for nothing, if it were made a gift to him, he could not run it in competition with the world.

Mr. EDMONDS. That is not so.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Mr. LAZARO. The gentleman will remember that a good while back Mr. Hurley issued a statement in which he contended that Americans, from the lessons they had learned from the steel people, could construct ships and, on account of improved terminal facilities and their ability to make more trips, could compete with foreign countries.

Mr. EDMONDS. I remember that statement of Mr. Hurley's. I remember a good many statements of Mr. Hurley's. I hope some of them will come true. On October 30 Mr. Dean, the general counsel of the Shipping Board, wrote me a letter giving me a detailed list of ship sales of the wood and steel cargo ships, stating that the Shipping Board had sold 16 wooden ships of 68,729 tons and 5 smaller ships of 17,500 tons. They had in contemplation the sale of 20 ships of 80,000 tons, which sale I do not believe has yet been completed. Of course, all the wooden ships were sold at a loss; some of them at a great loss. There were also two ships of 7,000 tons being sold to the Continental Transportation & Oil Co., which sale was completed. Those were composite ships.

Of the newly constructed steel cargo ships we had sold three—the Wisconsin Bridge, the West Catanace, and the Redondo. This was on August 30 of this year. The price of the Wisconsin Bridge was $210 a ton; of the West Catanace, $225 a ton; and of the Redondo, $210 a ton.

There was in contemplation the sale of 12 medium-sized ships, which sale had not yet been completed, and there were 2 other ships on which a man had made a proposition to trade some ships for them. The lowest price on those ships was $200 a ton, and on August 30 but 3 steel ships had really been sold and delivered. They sold a steel schooner which I do not believe has been delivered yet. They sold 2 steel tugs which have been delivered, one of which cost $76,899.47 and was sold for $48,000. The other one cost $61,750.69 and was sold for $55,000.

There were also sold seven ships that we requisitioned on the Great Lakes, and there were three of which the sale at a later date was contemplated. One of these ships sold on the Great Lakes, the Blue Hill, was built in 1893 by the Cleveland Shipbuilding Co., and cost the Government $1,250,810.27. She was sold to the Massey Steamship Co., of Cleveland, for $150,000.

The Frontenac, built in 1889, cost the Shipping Board $876,178.75. She was sold to the Davie Shipbuilding & Repairing Co. for $85,000.

The Manola, which cost the Shipping Board $1,186,941.39, was sold to the Davie Shipbuilding & Repairing Co. for $77,500. These ships were all old ships.

Then they bought from the George Hall Coal & Coke Corporation, of Ogdensburg, N. Y., three fairly good ships, the Adrian Iselin, which cost $541,066.74, the Lucius W. Robinson, which cost $501,881.99, and the A. D. Mactier, which cost $509,493.01. These are all Shipping Board figures. I am not using my own figures. These three vessels were sold back to the George Hall Coal & Transportation Co. for $200,000 apiece. The Shipping Board took those boats, enlarged them about 10 per cent, had hardly any use for them—I doubt if they ever left the Great Lakes—and sold them back at a loss on the three ships of about $900,000.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I suppose the gentleman would have the House and the country understand that these ships were bought, and some of them remodeled and taken from the Great Lakes to the high seas with a view to foreign service during the war, and when the war was over, of course, they were not of any value to that service.

Mr. EDMONDS. The Adrian Iselin was taken over by the United States Shipping Board on June 20, 1918, and returned to the George Hall Coal & Transportation Co. on June 2, 1919. During that time she was enlarged. The probabilities are that she never left the Lakes. The same is true of the other steamers bought at about the same date. That is a part of the history of these steamers on the Great Lakes. So you see that there have really been only three steel ships sold by the Shipping Board on August 30.

Now, I want to call your attention to the markets of the world. I am not going into the investigation end of it at all. I have the data on all these ships.

This morning I got a letter from Sudden & Christenson (Inc.), of New York, which I will read:

SUDDEN & CHRISTENSON (INC.),
New York, N. Y., October 7, 1919.

Hon. GEORGE W. EDMONDS, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Knowing that you are interested in the price of ship tonnage, we are inclosing one of Frank Waterhouse & Co.'s circulars, offering a British steamer which figures at the current rate of exchange about $141 per ton.

We have heard on the street that new construction can be purchased from Germany at $120 per dead-weight ton, and that this can be had by securing permission through an allied commission or through British owners, who are to be compensated for their losses by German new construction.

We are also inclosing Nauticus, of October 4, and call your attention to page 31, which we have marked, showing recent sales of new British tonnage which figures at current rate of exchange about $125 per ton.

Very truly, yours,

K. D. DAWSON, Manager.

The circular letter of Frank Waterhouse & Co. which they sent me reads as follows:

FRANK WATERHOUSE & CO., AND UNIVERSAL SHIPPING & TRADING CO.,
New York, N. Y., October 6, 1919.

GENTLEMEN:

New contract.

One 4,300-ton dead-weight steamer, with long bridge and very fine specifications, building at first-class British yard: delivery, August, 1920. Owners willing to dispose of same for £145,000 net.

If you are interested in the above steamer, please make best firm offer for cabling.

Yours, very truly,

H. H. HAMNER.

The Government of Australia has been buying ships, something like we have, for her merchants during the war. The first Australian number of the New York Evening Post makes this statement:

When it is remembered that there were years Australia had no shipbuilding ambitions at all, the true significance of these facts will be appreciated.

Let us see what they are doing in Australia. They are building there six 12,500-ton dead-weight steel ships, most of this steel brought from England. The price of those ships is £27 per ton. Allowing exchange around $4.25, that is about $115.

They are building 14 6,000-ton dead-weight ships in Australia, and the price of those ships is £26 per ton, or about $110 per ton at present rates of exchange.

They are also building six 12,800-ton dead-weight refrigerator ships, at £35 per ton, or about $150 per ton.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. I will.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Is not Australia one of the high-wages countries of the world?

Mr. EDMONDS. It is.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. About like Canada and the United States?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. If they can build ships and get out at the higher prices, why can not we do it?

Mr. EDMONDS. I have no doubt you can contract for a ship here for $150 or $160 a ton.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. In other words, we can compete with the world in building ships.

Mr. EDMONDS. I have said so before. Now, here is an advertisement of the Moore Shipbuilding Co.:

The contracts upon which we have been working for the Emergency Fleet Corporation are being rapidly completed.

We are, therefore, able to contract for the construction and early delivery of our standard 9,400 and 7,100 tons deadweight cargo steamers and 10,000 tons deadweight tank steamers.

During September we will contract to deliver one steamer in April, 1920, one in May, and two each month thereafter.

These men are prepared to do business without any question.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. If they do undertake to enter into competition and do build ships and sell them as cheaply as other ships, will we not have a condition in which we can compete with the commerce of the world?

Mr. EDMONDS. I think that will go a long way toward it. Now, I am only talking to-day in order to get the Shipping Board into a frame of mind that it will let the ships go to our merchants, so that they can bring the price down to what they will have to be three years from to-day.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. And still the gentleman is not opposed to the Government receiving the market price for the ships.

Mr. EDMONDS. I want the Government to get every cent it possibly can, but I do not think the Government should retain the ships, holding them up for impossible prices, because no man can work that price out to-day.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I do not think so either, but if they have ships for sale in the markets of the world and they get an offer of $150, they ought not to sell them for less than that.

Mr. EDMONDS. But let me read you how the merchants work it out:

Ship operators will be able to make a profit of $60 a ton of shipping per year up until 1921. But a 10 000-ton ship costing $210 a ton when purchased from the Government will represent a capital investment of $2,100,000.

During the first year the owner will be able to earn $600,000 net, of which amount the Government takes $360,000 in excess profits' taxes, leaving to the owner or purchaser a profit of but $240,000. To earn this much the owner has been compelled to pay down to the Shipping Board in cash 25 per cent of the sale value of the ship, or $525,000, leaving a balance of $1,575,000 plus interest unpaid.

During the second year under the proposed plan the owner would have to pay to the Shipping Board $315,000, plus $78,750 in interest on the purchase price of the ship, or a total of $393,750. Deducting from this second payment the net earnings from the ship during the first year, the purchaser will be compelled to put up $153,750 additional capital on his property.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. Certainly.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. These figures are perfectly logical, but it seems to me that the purchaser will make his own figures on what he can earn and what the ship is worth to-day. The proposition, it seems to me, is for the Shipping Board to offer the ships for sale at the highest offer and receive the fullest market price, and let the purchaser work out his own salvation.

Mr. EDMONDS. I think that is absolutely true.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. EDMONDS. I ask for five minutes more.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. EDMONDS. I am trying to call attention to the fact that unless the Shipping Board changes its policy, they will have these ships on their hands for years.

Now, I have a suggestion to make of the way I think this should be worked out. I am preparing a bill along these lines:

First. Cancellation of all emergency legislation.

Second. Transfer of all emergency property to Shipping Board.

Third. Instructions to Shipping Board as to disposal of ships and authorization to accept part payments.

Fourth. Instructions to Shipping Board to discontinue building ships and to cancel all contracts for shipbuilding where it is for the best interest of the Government to do so.

Fifth. Instructions to Shipping Board to return requisitioned property of all kinds in which the Government has no financial interest as rapidly as consistent.

Sixth. Instructions to Shipping Board to as rapidly as consistent with good judgment withdraw Government funds from all investment and return the money to the Treasury of the United States.

Seventh. To discontinue making any new investment of Government funds.

My idea is that the board should as rapidly as possible place itself in position to operate only under the authority given to them by the original shipping act. [Applause.]

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS].

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, let me thank Judge ALEXANDER for allowing me to proceed now in order that I may attend a hearing. In the short time yielded me I want to speak in reference to a man who has just become connected with the Shipping Board. It is with a considerable amount of pride that I refer to this man who for years has been a personal friend of mine. I refer to Capt. I. N. Hibbard, now general supervisor of sea training and recruiting service of the Shipping Board.

Capt. Hibbard began his seafaring career as a boy before the mast and ended it as a captain of a full-rigged ship. At 21 years of age he became captain and for many years thereafter navigated his full-rigged ship from Liverpool to New York and from New York around the Horn to San Francisco. After he left the sea he became engaged in shipping to the Yukon and was then made superintendent of the Pacific Coast Steamship Co.

I feel that the Shipping Board is extremely fortunate in having obtained Capt. Hibbard in its service, and I predict that as long as he is with that board, owing to his experience, his fidelity, and integrity, the service will prosper and be a very efficient branch of the Shipping Board.

Let me submit a few figures on the shipping situation, which I feel may be of interest.

World's shipping.

[From Lloyds' Register. (Gross tons.) All classes of ships.]

	June 30, 1914.	June 30, 1919.
British	21,045,000	18,607,000
German	5,459,000	3,503,000
Norwegian	2,504,000	1,857,000
French	2,319,000	2,233,000
Japanese	1,708,000	2,325,000
Italian	1,668,000	1,307,000
Dutch	1,496,000	1,591,000
Swedish	1,118,000	992,000
Russian	1,053,000	541,000
Austro-Hungarian	1,055,000	714,000
American (sea)	2,970,000	10,782,000
Total tonnage of above and of other countries		50,919,000

Losses from submarines.

	Dead-weight tons.
Neutral and allied shipping	21,400,000
Out of total previous to war of	59,465,000
Constructed during war (neutral and Allies)	14,247,000
Enemy tonnage acquired	8,795,000
United States completed in 1918	3,103,000
Incomplete tonnage in 1918	2,540,000
Total United States constructed and under construction	5,643,000

This was 50 per cent more than Great Britain built and 25 per cent more than was constructed by all the rest of the world.

In 1815 the United States had about half the tonnage of Great Britain.

In 1850 we had 3,500,000 tons, Great Britain had 4,232,000.

In 1861 we had 5,482,000 tons, Great Britain had 5,895,000.

In 1914 we had 2,970,000 tons, Great Britain had 43,054,000.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the Chair please tell me how the time stands?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts has 20 minutes and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] 33 minutes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the committee, it would be an act of supererogation at this stage to undertake an explanation of the immediate measure that is pending before the committee. The purposes of the bill have been rather fully explained by the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROWE] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] and others. As a matter of fact, I find myself somewhat in the attitude expressed by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] on this particular bill. In view of the testimony disclosed before the committee in the hearings, I do not believe that the bill is of very great importance in the result that would be accomplished under its operation. The net effect of the bill, as far as it changes existing law, as now provided in section 13 of the seamen's act, is to reduce the period of training for American citizens from 12 months to 9 months, provided they have taken a course of training in one of these training schools and stand the other examinations provided by the authorities.

Now, that is the sum total of the effect of this bill, as I understand it. The object to be accomplished, as expressed by the sponsors for the measure, is to encourage the enlistment of Americans in the sea service of the Nation, from the standpoint of necessity, gentlemen of the committee. The facts disclosed at the hearings showed that we have already certificated in the United States 54,000 able seamen. The figures show that when our merchant marine reaches the peak of its tonnage it will only require about 14,000 able seamen to fill all the positions before the mast, even when we have an operating tonnage of 14,000,000 tons.

Mr. CLEARY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. CLEARY. Of course, you have to take into consideration the fact that these young men are able to do plenty of other things as well as go on a ship, and when wages advance all around in other industries, as they are advancing, it will tempt these young men to leave these places, so that it would be better to have as many men available as possible, especially when, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROWE] explained, the shipping has expanded from 2,000,000 tons to 8,000,000 tons. You should do everything you can to make it easy to keep them.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is the only reason why I am acquiescing in the passage of this bill; for, taking as admitted what the gentleman from New York says, it will leave a margin of the difference between 14,000 and 54,000 certificated able-bodied seamen in the United States to go out to these various other positions which he says they might be tempted to follow.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. We have training schools turning out more seamen, and in the course of the next year there will be a larger number of able seamen than 54,000, and it will take more than the next year before we get the 14,000,000 tons of ships.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That may be. I make these observations for the purpose of showing that there is no real emergency for the passage of this bill. It is predicated, as has been suggested, simply upon the theory that it would offer inducements which do not now exist under the law for Americans to take up the business of able seamen as a vocation.

The thing I wanted to take some time upon was to make some comment upon the question that has arisen here as to the operation of the seamen's act as affecting the wages of American seamen, and whether or not the raising of the wages of American seamen has induced, or will induce, an approximate raise in the wages of the seamen of foreign governments. Every thoughtful man who has given any consideration to the question of our merchant marine has feared that the great difficulty with which we would be confronted would be the cost of production of our vessels and the cost of operating them, in the overhead charge, largely involving the question of seamen's wages.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The gentleman was present, I presume, during the hearings that were had on this bill?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I was.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I was going to ask the gentleman whether any interests were heard there except the Shipping Board?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes. I am expecting to quote very largely from the testimony of Mr. Andrew Furuseth, the chairman of the seamen's union, who appeared before the committee and made a very elaborate statement and gave some very illuminating evidence to the committee. He took the position, I will say to the gentleman from Alabama—and that is what I am trying to express here—that there was really no necessity for the passage of this bill from the standpoint of not having a sufficient number of able-bodied seamen under existing law to fill the vacancies in our merchant marine.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. May I ask whether the bill had his approval or met with his objection?

Mr. BANKHEAD. He was opposed to the bill as originally written, and I presume and think that he will be opposed to this bill. But this bill is in the nature of a compromise. The original bill proposed a reduction of the minimum service to 6 months. This bill puts it at 9 months. The existing law requires 12 months' service at sea for these young men whom I am talking about, who go through these schools, before they may become certified as able seamen.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The original bill provided that 20 per cent of the crew might be able seamen the first year, and 40 per cent the second year, and 50 per cent the third year, and this bill provides 40 per cent the first year, 45 per cent the second year, 50 per cent the third year, 55 per cent the fourth year, and thereafter 65 per cent of the deck crew.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The proposed bill that we are now considering carries out the provisions of existing law in that regard.

Now, on this question of wages, which was raised here by some question, the testimony shows that American seamen under the provisions of the seamen's act are now receiving $75 per month on American ships. When Mr. Furuseth was examined before the committee he stated:

Mr. FURUSETH. On the American ships we were paying $75 until the 28th of July, and now it is $85 for sailors and $90 for firemen. And the foreign vessels leaving ports of the United States are paying exactly that figure.

Mr. HARDY. As I understand, foreign vessels entering and leaving United States ports have had to take up every progress the American sailor has had?

Mr. FURUSETH. Absolutely. And what is more, they have to take up our progress as to the standards. When I was in Norway they were discussing in Norway the taking up of our standard of efficiency. That had been recommended by the commission some years before. They were discussing taking up the standard of efficiency that had been made the law in America.

Now, that is very interesting testimony, gentlemen, in view of the fact that it shows the moral and economic effect, as far as wages are concerned, of the high standards of pay set for American seamen under the operation of the seamen's act. This testimony is uncontradicted, and it shows that the foreign vessels leaving the ports of the United States are paying exactly that figure.

Mr. Furuseth's testimony shows that British seamen, by virtue of the increase in wages made to the American seamen under the American seamen's act receive exactly the same wages that American seamen are receiving, and the testimony shows that the same condition exists with reference to the seamen of Norway and Sweden. So, gentlemen, we see the beneficent effect of our seamen's act passed in 1915.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I should like five minutes more.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. BANKHEAD. A great many of its critics looked upon that act with great apprehension, but its beneficent effect is that it has not only raised the standard of safety at sea in the protection of life and property and improved the living conditions of seamen, but by the very nature of its competition and its moral effect it has raised and will undoubtedly continue to raise the wages of seamen under foreign flags to the same standard of American wages. Gentlemen, if that prediction is true, we have met and solved one of the essential features of our competition with foreign trade for our merchant marine. I trust that the optimistic statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS] will prove true, and I believe that it can be made to come true that we can produce tonnage in this country as cheaply as it can be produced anywhere in the world. If we meet that condition, then we have met and mastered, so far as these two essential propositions are concerned, every element of competition that will be necessary in order for us to continue to operate successfully these 14,000,000 tons of shipping that will be under the American flag within the next 12 or 15 months.

I was not a Member of Congress at the time the seamen's act was passed, but I have undertaken to give it a considerable amount of study, and I regard it in its operation as one of the greatest pieces of constructive statesmanship that has been passed in the last quarter of a century upon this great problem. [Applause.] It is proving in its operation the wisdom of those gentlemen who fashioned it and secured its passage through Congress and its approval by the President.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. BANKHEAD. For a brief question.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman know that under that act the seamen at any port can leave their vessel, require their wages to be paid, go off on every kind of carousing and drinking, and come back to the ship when they please, and the ship has to stay until they do see fit to come back?

Mr. BANKHEAD. No; I did not know that.

Mr. BLANTON. And that the wives and little children of the men at home frequently go without those wages when the voyage is over, whose benefits they had expected to receive.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I understand that the gentleman would stand for the repeal of the act then?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, no; but I would like to amend it in certain particulars. I think in some respects it is a great law.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think the trouble is that the gentleman has a basic misunderstanding of the provisions of the seaman's act, and that the things he complains of are not possible.

Mr. BLANTON. I have had such complaints made.

Mr. CASEY. Is not the logical conclusion to be arrived at that the gentleman from Texas is complaining because American seamen have been made freemen under the seaman's act?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I would rather have the gentleman from Texas answer that question himself.

Here is another thing that has been done: When the seamen's act was passed there was not a single native American certified and actually serving as an able seaman before the mast on the Pacific coast. Under the operations of that law it was testified before our committee the other day that, whereas formerly there was not a single one, this year on the Pacific coast alone the United States had 1,251 of its citizens as able seamen. There has been approximately the same increase on the Lakes and a larger increase on the Atlantic coast.

So that, gentlemen, I say, when we come to contemplate the real development of our merchant marine, the wisdom and the expediency and the prudence and sound judgment of the seamens' act continues to manifest itself and to grow in power and usefulness as the years progress. [Applause.]

Mr. TINCHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will be glad to.

Mr. TINCHER. Purely for information, I want to ask the gentleman if he understands why it is that the freight rates on fresh meats, for instance, have been increased from 60 cents, the prewar basis, to $4.50?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I can not give the gentleman that information. That is a matter my friends who are here in control of Congress ought to adopt a policy on. That suggests another thing. The question was raised as to whether or not the Shipping Board was going to be allowed indefinitely the discretion of selling our ships. I say that is a question of policy that ought to be determined by the Congress of the United States and not by the Shipping Board. I am looking forward anxiously in the committee for the presentation of some concrete bill on the part of our friends in control of Congress fixing the policy for the disposition of our vessels, which is the greatest problem before that committee and before Congress in reference to the merchant marine. I was glad to hear the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS] say that he was framing and expecting to introduce shortly a bill suggesting a concrete policy.

The question of rates is a matter very important, and one that I think our committee and the Congress ought to give great consideration to, because I can readily see how it affects the country of the gentleman from Kansas and every other section.

Mr. TINCHER. I did not ask the question as the member of any party, but to get the information.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I state candidly to the gentleman that I do not know the reason for that change. If the gentleman would take it up with the Shipping Board I think he could get some sort of an explanation, but whether it would be satisfactory or not I do not know.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I want to inquire whether these rates are on a parity with rates charged in other countries—whether they are competitive rates.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Not competitive; shipping rates can not be made stable, because they depend on the emergency, on the voyage, and other things of that character. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, while the seamen's act has many wise and salutary provisions, yet I can not agree with the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] that it is altogether perfect and wholesome.

Under such act section 4530 requires one-half of wages earned upon demand to be paid to every seaman at each and every port where any cargo is loaded or delivered. At these various ports temptations innumerable beset such seamen, and this provision and others of the act makes it possible, and even acts as an incentive, for the men to draw their money, go ashore, drink, gamble, and carouse until wages upon which wives and little children at home were confidently depending had been wastefully exhausted.

You will note from the following provision of section 4596, to wit—

> Second. For neglecting or refusing without reasonable cause to join his vessel or to proceed to sea in his vessel, or for absence without leave at any time within 24 hours of the vessel's sailing from any port, either at the commencement or during the progress of the voyage, or for absence at any time without leave and without sufficient reason from his vessel and from his duty, not amounting to desertion, by forfeiture from his wages of not more than two days' pay or sufficient to defray any expenses which shall have been properly incurred in hiring a substitute.

that for a failure to proceed with his vessel to sea on time only a slight punishment of forfeiting two days' pay is imposed. Under subdivision 13 of section 4611 vessels can not depart from a port unless a specified per cent of the deck crew are rated as able seamen and unless 75 per cent of such crew are able to understand the orders of the officers. By reason of the above provisions, should a majority of the crew, after collecting their wages upon arriving at an intermediate port, yield to the temptation of going on a spree, and after the initial intoxication should decide to prolong the spree, it would be an impossibility for the master to procure qualified men to take their places and he would be compelled to delay embarkation on schedule time and to await the pleasure of the crew as to when they would leave the port, and, while the ship might suffer tremendous damages, the men would suffer a nominal punishment of merely forfeiting two days' wages. I know of just such a case, where the crew went on a spree at an intermediate port of small significance and delayed the ship's leaving for weeks, causing the owners a loss of thousands of dollars resulting from a failure to deliver certain cargoes on time.

But I desire to use my time in discussing another subject.

I take it, Mr. Speaker, that every thinking man in this Congress has realized, especially within the last few weeks, that the transportation of our country, both by land and by sea, has ceased to be merely a private commercial enterprise in which only the corporation owners and the employed workmen are interested. But by reason of the general public's vital interest in the same there should be taken by Congress definite and proper steps to safeguard and protect the interests of the public.

I realize, especially in regard to railroad transportation, that the time has come when at this session of Congress definite action should be taken to make railroad strikes impossible in the future, such as is provided for by the Cummins bill. We must do this regardless of Mr. Gompers's threats. If it is necessary to take definite action in regard to railroad transportation to prevent strikes, why should it not likewise be necessary to take definite and decided action with regard to the transportation by sea? The general public is vitally interested in both.

Is there a man in this Congress who is not yet awake to the fact that cities like New York and Boston, Philadelphia and Baltimore, Chicago and San Francisco are absolutely dependent upon transportation by land and sea for the most of their daily existence? These cities do not carry more food supply than to last a few days, and we know by starving out through concerted strikes such big cities as I have mentioned there is within the hands of the labor organizations now in existence controlling the transportation on railroads and by sea a power now strong enough, if not controlled by proper laws, to force the Government into any kind of servile submission with regard to any kind of unreasonable demands they may make. Next to the organization of the four great railroad brotherhoods the seamen's organization to-day stands in strength, because on their action depends the transportation by sea of the food supply of the world.

I take it that the time has come when every thinking man in this Congress realizes that there must be taken vital, definite action in regard to every public service in which the people generally are interested, such that no union other than the union of the United States Government itself can hereafter tie up and control such transportation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. BLANTON. I thank the distinguished gentleman from Missouri for the additional time. When through interrogation this morning I called attention to the soviet pronunciamento signed at Seattle, Wash., October 2, 1919, by James A. Duncan, secretary of the Central Labor Union of Seattle, a copy of which each Member of Congress received in this morning's mail, some colleague intimated that it had no reference to the Government of the United States. Let me again call your attention to the fact that this soviet propaganda is addressed to "Honorable Members of Congress of the United States, Senators and Representatives, Washington, D. C.," and arrogantly advised us that the longshoremen of Seattle, with the approval of the Central Labor Council, positively refused to handle the 45 carloads of war material, embracing 7,000 cases of rifles, destined for Russia. And it is arrogantly stated by these American Bolsheviks that the advocates of the covenant of the league of nations pursue a policy toward Russia such as would tend to prove a most shameful insincerity upon their part, and that no red or other terror could be worse than operations conducted through American and allied support.

While I understand that this Duncan is not the one formerly at the head of the American Federation of Labor, nevertheless he uses the following letterhead, showing affiliation with the American Federation of Labor, to wit:

> Central Labor Council of Seattle and vicinity, affiliated with American Federation of Labor, organized May 1, 1905.

Personally, I do not know whether it has been necessary for the United States Government to maintain troops and armaments in Russia or not, because I do not know anything about the situation there. But I do know that the President of the United States, as the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, has authority to protect American interests anywhere in the world without a declaration of war, and, since our Government has seen fit to keep an armed force in Russia, I am not going to question same until I know that such act was unwarranted.

And I want to say right here that whenever the Government of the United States, whether Democrat or Republican in power, orders munitions, or under lawful regulations authorizes munitions to be sent to Russia, no men or combination of men outside of Congress, the lawful representatives of the people, have any right to interpose their private judgment and refuse to obey the orders of this Government.

This country is still under war regulations, for peace has not yet been proclaimed. These munitions could not be sent to Russia by any concern without the express order and permit of this Government. These men, therefore, know that this shipment of munitions, if made, is made under Government permit and order, else would not be made, and therefore when they purposely hinder and place obstacles in the way of such shipment they are obstructing the mandates of this Government itself.

But what respect have these men for the Government of the United States, or any Government, when they offer soviet rule in Russia as superior to conditions offered by our Government? This whole document reeks with soviet preachments and attempt to promote and incite mutiny against lawful order. In five-eighths of an inch heavy black-faced type this inclosed circular is headed: "Murder!"

That is a characteristic soviet heading for all red propaganda. But let me call your attention to the following excerpts from this circular:

Do you know that in Soviet Russia during the last 18 months 10,000 schools have been established?

Do you know that 15 regiments of French troops, operating near Odessa some weeks ago, mutinied and compelled their officers to return them to France?

Do you know that the crews of three French battleships mutinied while operating in the Black Sea about four months ago, on the grounds that they would have no hand in reestablishing an imperialistic Czarist despotism?

Do you know that our own troops, protecting the Murmansk Railway, became disgusted with the whole affair and almost mutinous because of the fact that they had been conscripted for the purpose of defeating the Kaiser and not for the purpose of reestablishing another military despotism equally as bad under a Russian Czar, and our Government was compelled to bring them home?

Do you know that for us to countenance the destruction of the Soviet Republic would be a direct violation of that clause in the peace treaty and the league of nations referring to the rights of labor?

Do you know that men of humane inclinations have bombarded Wilson with questions asking the reasons for his carrying on an undeclared war with troops conscripted to fight Kaiserism against the helpless Russians, etc.?

Do you know that we should bombard Congress with protests, sign thousands of petitions, hold mass meetings in every church, in every city, town, and village in this Nation, in every public hall, and let the lawmakers of this country and all others in position of authority know our exact position on the question of murder?

Do you know that 5,000,000 British trade-unionists are taking a referendum vote on the question of a national strike to force the British Government to cease blockading Russia, the only result of which is to starve thousands of innocent people to death?

Mr. Speaker, the time has come when we must stop this Bolshevik doctrine and propaganda. Soviet Russia must not be preached with impunity in this beloved Republic of ours. Congress must take definite, drastic action.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD by placing therein these documents to which I refer.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CLEARY].

Mr. CLEARY. Mr. Speaker, it is only because I am a member of the delegation from New York City that I wish to add a word on this subject, because in our great port we are continually observing the necessity for plenty of men to engage in all of the commercial activities that have made our city so great. We all know there that the reason for New York's great business industries and her great population is her seagoing commerce. It is because she is situated at the gateway of the country, the gateway of the West, of the South, of the East, and of the North. It is necessary to have sufficient men to man the vessels that come in there and bring their great wealth and business to this country. The land values of New York City are immense, so much so that the city and State together pay something like one-tenth of the taxes of the whole country. All this is because of our foreign and domestic commerce. As I understand the provisions of the bill, it seeks to secure, to make more easy, the education of men to go into the seagoing business. In the past we have not had a sufficient number of Americans to man our vessels. We have had chiefly foreigners. I have had lots of experience in my own business, and while it is not a seagoing business, it is a river and sound business, and I know that the majority of our captains are Norwegian and Swede and other foreigners, because the young American boys, as we all know, particularly nowadays when we have so much first-class commercial education, prefer to engage in other pursuits. They prefer to be clerks or bookkeepers, or to be connected with business houses, so that it is difficult to get the American young men to engage in the seagoing business. As I understand the purpose of the bill and the purpose of the committee it is to make it easier to get American sailors. Of course we all know that years ago when the ships were nearly all sailing vessels it required skillful men to handle them, and it took years of practice, and at that time we were very jealous of the employment of our own people, and we made it more difficult for others, and it made it harder for people to come in and overcrowd, but nowadays the great question comes up of getting a sufficient number of men. We would like to get Americans as much as we can. These gentlemen have been spending their time trying to devise ways and means to accomplish that, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] has said that even though it is not in accord with his own views, he is willing to risk something, because he knows the necessity of accomplishing that purpose.

I am very interested in the passage of this bill and any other bill that will make it easier to man the vessels of America in that way and keep up this great commerce of ours.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. EVANS].

TRANSPORTATION PROBLEMS.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. Mr. Speaker, an effort is being made to obtain a law restraining any railroad from charging more for a shorter haul than for the longer haul, the shorter haul being included in the longer, over the same line and in the same direction. This statement is too simple to be understood, but it means that Congress is asked to enact a law that will prevent a railroad from charging, say, 55 cents per hundred for hauling cement from Kansas to Boise, Idaho, when the rate over the same line to the coast, 500 miles farther, is but 40 cents per hundred. Sixteen thousand tons of cement used in the Arrow Rock Dam, in Idaho, was hauled from Kansas, and it cost this Government $48,000 more to haul the cement to Idaho than it would have cost to haul it 500 miles farther to the coast. A law is needed because the railroads wish to have the right, under the rulings of the Interstate Commerce Commission, to do just such things.

The railroads say that they must meet "water competition" with an equivalent rate to coast cities in order to get freight that would otherwise be carried by water. The whole trouble is that it discriminates to destroy water traffic. These examples of discrimination against sections and States can be shown to have occurred numberless times. Impossible to state what this has cost Nevada, but more than a million dollars per year for 50 years, and it still continues, costing our producers more to ship wool to the greatest wool market, Boston, than from points 500 miles farther west.

A tariff on magnesite, tungsten, and other minerals would not be needed in our State only for this enormous drain of money which if it could have been saved and expended upon our struggling industries, would have doubled and again doubled our decreasing population.

The iniquity and injustice of this practice against a whole State must stop. Nevada demands an even break. All the protection this whole country needs is for our Government to protect its citizens, their lives and property, everywhere on earth. We hear much of freedom of the sea, while England dominated the great oceans any man could sail his tub to any port. England, upon small islands without great natural resources, but an indomitable spirit, excelled with free trade. The question of ships, railroads, and transportation is particularly a national problem, and one not to be compromised on any such narrow basis as benefits to single individuals, single industries, single States, or even single sections of the United States, but a problem to be settled with justice on the basis of national welfare. It is not a problem of rates between cities, but is much more. It is not a problem of railroad transportation alone, but of transportation in general, whether over highway, railroad, or steamship line; and the House committee is approaching the subject with hearings designed to bring out all the facts and to show just what step should be taken to insure justice both to the transportation industry and to the Nation which it serves.

This solution would seem to grant to each transportation industry—railroad and steamship line—a fair field in which to develop; a field in which the railroad and steamship line could compete in healthy rivalry ultimately specializing on that profitable work for which each had proven itself the better fitted.

We may encourage shipping and all other national interests by less of governmental paternalism and exactions. Give States equal opportunities. The time has come to stop the ever-increasing growth of bureaus and centralization of too much power at Washington over States which could more efficiently and economically act for themselves. The Union will be more strongly cemented by granting each State the care of its local and peculiar needs. Do not discourage your citizen with too much governmental instruction and interference, but encourage him to work out his own salvation.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, there are a few minutes remaining on this side, and I simply want to make a few remarks in reference to wages or what the elements are that will enter into the development of a merchant marine. Manifestly we can not maintain an American merchant marine successfully in foreign trade unless we can compete with foreign nations. We must build ships at the same relative cost as foreign nations, whether they be operated under Government or private ownership. Those ships must be equipped economically and operated efficiently. Efficiency in the operation of a ship is a prime factor, as it is in the operation of a factory or any other industry. There is a popular notion that almost anybody can operate a ship. That is a very great mistake. With our American skill, our American initiative, we may overcome some of the obstacles which confront us. For instance, the cost of construction and operation, if the difference is not too great, if we can throw into this equation the element of greater efficiency. Hence the effort to encourage American boys to go to sea, not that they may become ordinary seamen or able seamen, but that they may have the incentive to become officers and masters of the ships, is of prime importance as a factor and in order that we may develop our merchant marine. I have never been in entire accord with the view that the seamen's act would solve the question of wages in all the trade areas of the world. I can very well understand how under the act as it exists we may maintain relatively the same wage scale in trade between European ports and our own country, but we should not overlook the fact that if we would compete with foreign nations for the Far Eastern trade and for the South American and South African trade we must do so by a wage scale relatively the same and with the cost of construction and operation of ships relatively the same.

But the one purpose that should animate this Congress and the people of the United States and all interests affected is this, that whatever the cost we should have a great American merchant marine as a vehicle to carry and extend our foreign commerce and as a necessary auxiliary to our Navy for the national defense. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I yield back whatever time may be remaining.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for 14 minutes.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words upon the action of the committee and the unity that has been maintained in the committee not only this year but for several years while the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] was chairman of the committee. When the original seamen's act was reported the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] took a great deal of interest in its preparation, and I was the minority member upon the conference committee, together with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY], and we came to an agreement very readily in the passage of the seamen's act. Each of us took an interested part in it and there was no opposition on the floor of the House from either the Republican or Democratic side of the House, and our action was commented upon by the Hon. JAMES R. MANN, the leader on the Republican side of the House, he giving great credit to the fact we had agreed so well in the committee in whatever was brought out in the way of legislation, especially in reference to this seamen's act, which had been threatened for a long time but could not seem to get to a place where it could be reported out and favorably acted upon on the floor of the House. Our committee came out unitedly on that proposition. The legislation that we have reported out from the committee to-day has been reported out with the unanimous action of the committee, without any dissent, and I am sure it is something of which the House of Representatives may well be proud, that the committee does business for the sake of the people of the United States and not for the sake of advancing the interest of any one faction. I know so far as my service on the committee is concerned—and I have had a service now of more than 21 years on the committee—there has been no serious objection to legislation proposed except on rare occasions during the time that the gentlemen on the other side of the House had control of the legislation. I did make objection to some features of the first shipping act; I did not vote for the first shipping act as reported, but otherwise every thought that came to my mind was as to the question of how the country at large would be affected by the course that I determined to pursue; and when it was determined that our country should enter the late war I supported with true spirit of American manhood and true loyalty all the actions of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and we were not divided on party lines.

And I am gratified to relate that since I have been advanced to the chairmanship of the committee I find the same spirit prevailing in the disposition of the party on the other side of the aisle; that they do not raise partisan questions upon matters of legislation that have a broad purpose in view; and I think we are to be congratulated that we can thus far agree, and I hope that this spirit of unity will continue to exist and that we may work harmoniously together for the greatest good of all. I may add that this year I, as chairman of the committee, adopted a different practice from what we had before experienced, in that I appointed several subcommittees to take up the legislation before the committee. I have not myself been upon a single one of the subcommittees, but I appointed them, giving the Democrats liberal representation on the committees, but have not myself taken any part in indicating the action of those subcommittees. The reports of these subcommittees have been the free action of these subcommittees, and they have brought out their reports, and we have considered them fully in the committee when reported. I suppose some of you may think it rather peculiar I did not dictate them, because I am somewhat inclined to dictate sometimes when I feel compelled to do so. But I have gotten along harmoniously with the committee this year, and I want to compliment my associates on both sides of the aisle upon their loyalty of action this year, and I am pleased to refer to their loyalty of action last year. When we had the radio question under consideration last year in the committee, and in January, 1918, after we had faithfully discussed the radio question from beginning to the end and had drawn out all we could out of it—we have drawn a little more this year, but we drew all we could last year—and when we came to consider that bill in executive session, upon the motion of a Democrat every member of the committee approved the laying of the bill on the table, and the committee decided unanimously not to take up the question of Government ownership of radio.

I do not know how the committee feels this year, because we have not yet acted upon the proposition; but I hope we shall be able to agree upon the disposition of the bill if there comes a time when we shall come to a decision upon and report it for the consideration of the House. At any rate, I want the House of Representatives to understand how the committee have acted heretofore, and also that this committee is not like many committees of the House. We have no appropriation, and therefore we do not have any money to spend, and so far we have not spent any money. The witnesses who have come here have come at their own expense; and the only money that we have expended is what has been expended for the expenses of the hearings. No other money has been expended by the committee. We have tried to be economical, tried to get along without the expenditure of money; and I am well satisfied with the record thus far made by the committee, and I hope it will be maintained to its end. This amendment that has been brought in to-day and is being considered is one that had long consideration. It is one that I am sure will be, if adopted by the House—and I certainly hope that it may be—to the advantage of an American merchant marine. We have considered a great many questions and have not arrived at a conclusion on all of them. At the same time the committee are considering everything that they believe will be of advantage to the American merchant marine, and we hope in the meeting that comes a week from to-day we shall be able to bring out some other legislation for your consideration that will meet your views as fairly and as fully as we hope your views will be in accord with us in reporting out this bill and enacting the same into law. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a reading of the bill.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks on this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks on this bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. Before proceeding to the question of the passage of the bill is it not necessary that it should be engrossed?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is correct.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time; was read the third time.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not know whether it would have any effect on the validity of the passage of the bill that the House has just passed or not, but I have no recollection whatever of the bill having been read by sections for amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill is being considered in the House under the Calendar Wednesday rule. It is not required that it be read for amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That answers my parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill was read in full, the Chair will state, before the consideration of it.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

REGULATIONS FOR VESSELS OF SHIPPING BOARD.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I call up for consideration the bill S. 633.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts calls up the bill S. 633, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 633) extending the provision for the regulation of steam vessels to vessels owned or operated by the United States Shipping Board, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all steam vessels owned or operated by the United States Shipping Board, or any corporation organized or controlled by it, shall be subject to all the provisions of title 52 of the Revised Statutes of the United States for the regulation of steam vessels and acts amendatory thereof or supplemental thereto.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Page 1, line 6, after the word "States" insert "passed at the first session of the Forty-third Congress."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I do not care to occupy an hour's time on the proposition.

The bill came from the United States Senate, and it referred to title 52 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. Not being a lawyer, it puzzled me to know what title 52 was. I took the trouble to find out what it was, and proposed the amendment that is now in the bill. Would the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] like any time on the bill?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I was just going to suggest that I was not at the meeting of the committee when this bill was considered and reported out, and my attention was called to the amendment the first time last night when I looked over the bill and the report. I question the propriety of the suggested amendment. The bill provides:

That all steam vessels owned or operated by the United States Shipping Board, or any corporation organized or controlled by it, shall be subject to all the provisions of title 52 of the Revised Statutes of the United States for the regulation of steam vessels and acts amendatory thereof or supplemental thereto.

Now, title 52 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, second edition, 1878, relates to transportation of passengers and merchandise and the inspection of vessels. And I think that is a sufficient description. And if we undertake to limit it by the amendment suggested by the committee, we may make an error, because title 52 of the Revised Statutes of the United States includes all the acts relating to that subject from the beginning. It is a revision of all the acts relating to the subject from the early days. Hence I think it is quite well enough to leave it in its present form. If we amend it, it will have to go back to the Senate, and, in my opinion, it is unnecessary to do that.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. It is not objectionable to me if the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER], being a lawyer of long standing, reaches that conclusion. But if my memory serves me, I sent the secretary of the committee to confer with the gentleman before I put the amendment in the bill.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The clerk of the committee came to me and wanted to know what title 52 meant. I got him the Revised Statutes of the United States and called his attention to title 52, but I did not suggest any amendment. It never occurred to me that an amendment was necessary.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. He reported back to me that the gentleman approved the amendment, and the committee voted the amendment into the bill. I thought he had conferred with the gentleman.

Mr. ALEXANDER. He was in error about that.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. It can be cured by striking out the amendment.

Mr. ALEXANDER. By just not agreeing to it, and then passing the bill in the present form.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. That will be perfectly satisfactory to me. I am not a lawyer, but I must say when I saw "title 52" I was a little bit puzzled. I do not think any lawyer would have been, but I was, and I took the trouble to look it up. I thought it needed explanation. I can see from what the gentleman from Missouri states that I was wrong, I stand corrected, and I move to strike it out.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I thoroughly agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts that this bill should pass.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Missouri seek recognition in his own right? The time is an hour.

Mr. ALEXANDER. There has been a question whether or not the vessels belonging to the Shipping Board would come under our steamboat-inspection law. The Shipping Board, however, has conceded, in the interest of good administration, that they would come under our inspection laws, and they have been inspected by the Steamboat-Inspection Service. You will understand that service is under the Department of Commerce, and this bill is simply to clear up that question and make it clear that all vessels owned and operated by the Shipping Board shall come under the provisions of our general laws as to the inspection of vessels. I think the bill ought to pass.

I have nothing further to say, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the committee amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was read the third time.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the mere stating of the third reading carry with it the engrossment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not necessary to engross a Senate bill. It is engrossed in the Senate.

Mr. BLANTON. The House does not afterwards engross it?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No.

The question is on the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SCOTT] has a couple of bills which were in the charge of his subcommittee, and I yield to him.

CHANGE OF NAMES OF VESSELS.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I call up House bill 3620.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan calls up House bill 3620, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3620) to authorize the Commissioner of Navigation to change the names of vessels.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This bill is upon the Union Calendar. The House automatically resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that that motion is not in order on Calendar Wednesday. The House automatically resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 3620. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] will please take the chair.

Thereupon the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 3620, with Mr. ROGERS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 3620, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioner of Navigation shall, under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce, be empowered to change the names of vessels of the United States on application of the owner or owners of such vessels when in his judgment there shall be sufficient cause for so doing.

SEC. 2. That the Commissioner of Navigation, with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce, shall establish such rules and regulations and procure such evidence as to age, condition, where built, and pecuniary liability of the vessels as he may deem necessary to prevent injury to public or private interests; and when permission is granted by the Commissioner of Navigation, he shall cause the order for the change of name to be published at least in four issues in some daily or weekly paper at the place of documentation, and the cost of procuring evidence and advertising the change of name to be paid by the person or persons desiring such change of name.

SEC. 3. That for the privilege of securing such changes of name the following fees shall be paid by the owners of vessels to collectors of customs, to be deposited in the Treasury of such collectors as navigation fees: For vessels 99 gross tons and under, $10; for vessels 100 gross tons and up to and including 499 gross tons, $25; for vessels 500 gross tons and up to and including 999 gross tons, $50; for vessels 1,000 gross tons and up to and including 4,999 gross tons, $75; for vessels 5,000 gross tons and over, $100.

SEC. 4. That sections 1 and 2 of the act of March 2, 1881, entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to change the name of vessels under certain circumstances," and section 5 of the act of July 5, 1884, entitled "An act to constitute a Bureau of Navigation in the Treasury Department," are hereby repealed.

SEC. 5. That this act shall take effect 30 days after its passage.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SCOTT] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, for a great many years Congress at each session has been obliged to occupy considerable time in the consideration of applications on the part of owners of ships to change the names of their vessels. Under the present law the only way that the name of a vessel can be changed is by introducing a special bill in Congress on the subject.

It is apparent to everyone that such procedure, although it has been in use for a great many years, is little short of silly. I do not know why Congress heretofore has not expedited such matters as are provided in this bill. Heretofore when a special bill of this character had been referred to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, it was sent down to the Department of Commerce and their advice was requested.

The committee has made a thorough canvass of the bills covering a number of years, and we have not been able to find a single instance where the recommendation of the department has not been accepted and acted upon.

This measure was presented at the last Congress, but in view of the more pressing work then pending it was impossible to call it up. We submitted the bill to the department, and I am sure you will be interested, if you have not already read the report, in hearing the letter from the department, which in a large measure confirms what I have already stated to the committee. I read:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE.
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, September 27, 1919.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN SCOTT: I have received your letter of the 23d instant inclosing copy of H. R. 3620, a bill to authorize the Commissioner of Navigation to change the names of vessels, with a request for expression of my views on the bill.

This bill was prepared in this department on February 18, 1919, at the request of the chairman of your committee at the time.

The department expects that as the Shipping Board sells their vessels to private parties there will be a considerable demand for changes of names. These vessels will not be paid for in full in cash and the Shipping Board will retain mortgages against them, which, under the present law, would prevent the changes in names and necessitate the introduction of special bills.

This will be obviated by H. R. 3620, which permits the change of name even in the case of mortgaged vessels by the Commissioner of Navigation of this department, provided the interests of all concerned are properly protected.

The courts have repeatedly held in rendering opinions on cases involving the changes of names of vessels that such changes should be discouraged as far as possible. Provision has been made in section 3 of the act, therefore, for the payment of fees sufficient to accomplish this purpose to a considerable extent. This also will result in some revenue to the Government.

The department is much in favor of this bill.

Respectfully,
E. F. SWEET,
Assistant Secretary of Commerce.

HON. FRANK D. SCOTT,
Chairman Subcommittee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

I have no desire to further occupy the time of this committee in discussing the bill, unless some one wishes to ask me a question in regard to some phase of the bill which I may have overlooked.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCOTT. Gladly.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I will interrupt the gentleman to say that what the gentleman has said not only meets my entire approval but, like himself, I have often wondered why such a general statute had not been passed long before this, because it has seemed to me silly, almost, to require a procedure before a committee of the House in session, an investigation, a report on a bill, and then to wait the delay and the difficulty of getting it up to effect a change which by the administrative department of the Government could be as efficiently made as by legislative enactment; so that I think this bill ought to have been passed many years ago.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SCOTT. I will be glad to.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Under existing law—

The Commissioner of Navigation shall, under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce, be empowered to change the names of vessels of the United States under such restrictions as may have been or shall be prescribed by act of Congress.

Hence, when it was desired to change the names of vessels in the past it has been the custom and it has been necessary to introduce a special bill for that purpose. Where the vessel was not mortgaged this was the provision of the law:

The Secretary of Commerce be, and hereby is, authorized to permit the owner or owners of any vessel duly enrolled and found seaworthy and free from debt to change the name of the same, when, in his opinion, there shall be sufficient cause for so doing. The Secretary of Commerce shall establish such rules and regulations and procure such evidence as to the age, condition, where built, and pecuniary liability of the vessel as he may deem necessary to prevent injury to public or private interests; and when permission is granted by the Secretary, he shall cause the order for the change of name to be published at least in four issues in some daily or weekly paper at the place of register; and the cost of procuring evidence and advertising the change of name to be paid by the person or persons desiring such change of name.

In order to avoid the trouble and annoyance of introducing these special bills to accomplish this purpose, for many years I have called the matter to the attention of the Department of Commerce and insisted that some bill should be framed, so that the Department of Commerce might change the names of vessels without coming to Congress and securing the change of names by special legislation.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. I notice there are different fees for the changing of the names of vessels, and that when the tonnage is greater the fee is larger. What is the object? It does not cost more to change the name of a 5,000-ton vessel than it does of a 100-ton vessel.

Mr. SCOTT. Not at all.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Then what is the object? Is it for the Government to make money?

Mr. SCOTT. No; the object is this: The Department of Commerce, like many other departments of the Government, is run for the benefit of the citizens of the United States. It is not a money-making proposition. The really perfect way of running a Government public utility is to exact from the public only a charge which will pay the running expenses of that particular public utility. That would be the perfect way to do it.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Does this create a new department?

Mr. SCOTT. No.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Will it require extra clerks?

Mr. SCOTT. I assume that it will require one or two, or a very small additional force.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Probably it is to pay those expenses.

Mr. SCOTT. Exactly.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Most of the fees will be paid by large vessels.

Mr. SCOTT. The sum is not large in any event. The largest amount is $100. A shipowner could better afford to pay $100 for getting the name of a large ship changed than some poor fellow who possibly had a small fishing smack of 100 tons could afford to pay $10.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. That is very true, but it seems to me the fee ought to be the same in either case. When a mortgage is recorded, it makes no difference whether it is for $1,000,000 or for $1,000, it takes the same number of words, and the recording fee is the same.

Mr. SCOTT. The gentleman mentions the subject of recording mortgages——

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. I am alluding to the law in my own State.

Mr. SCOTT. If I recall correctly, there is a specific charge for recording mortgages in the State of Pennsylvania, but in a number of States they make a charge for the recording of the mortgage, based on the amount of money involved in the transaction. I may say to the gentlemen that this is a taxation feature, however, rather than a recording fee.

Mr. CLEARY. Mr. Chairman, may I suggest something which may throw a little light on this?

Mr. SCOTT. Certainly.

Mr. CLEARY. In the harbor of New York, where there are thousands of vessels of all kinds passing to and fro, my concern owns about 100 vessels. We have some boats worth about $5,000, and we have some worth $25,000. Now, the $5,000 boat will earn a very small amount in comparison to the $25,000 boat, and we can as easily pay $100 in one case as to pay $10 in the other case. That is one of the reasons.

Now, as to the reasons for changing the names: We have often bought boats of other lines. Our line is Cleary Bros. There is another line called the McWilliams Line, and another the Blue Line. They have their boats named for themselves, McWilliams No. 1, McWilliams No. 20, and so on. If we should buy some of these boats we would not want to advertise the McWilliams Line, so we would change the name to something else. It would be necessary to change it. That is one of the reasons for changing names. And there is a good reason for the difference in the fee. One craft has so much greater earning power than another that it is just as hard to tax one $10 as it is to tax another $100.

Mr. SCOTT. I am indebted to the gentleman for his suggestion.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCOTT. Gladly.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I do not desire to throw any discord into the harmony of the Committee on the Merchant Marine or this committee. But I would like to ask if the subcommittee considered the question of advisability where a change of name is authorized of requiring that fact and the date of the change to be recorded on the ship's papers, so that any man dealing with a particular ship should have notice of what names that ship had been under heretofore, and so be in a better position to look up liens, mortgages, incumbrances, and so forth.

Mr. SCOTT. That is a pertinent question, and I am indebted to the gentleman from Maine for asking it. At the present time under rules and regulations of the Department of Commerce the fact of a change of name is carried, and I assume that, exercising the same judgment they have exercised heretofore, they will formulate rules and regulations for carrying out the provisions of the bill, which will result in the protection of the interests of the public at large.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I think that is material and should be covered by rules and regulations, and I am glad to know that the committee has it in mind.

Mr. SCOTT. I assume the Department of Commerce will so regulate the affairs by rules and regulations that that provision will be amply secured, and I wish to supplement that statement by saying that Congress in the bill provides that when permission is granted by the Commissioner of Navigation—> he shall cause the order of a change of names to be published in some daily paper at the place of documentation.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. That takes care of anybody at the place of documentation, but it might not meet the situation where a vessel was a thousand miles away and some one who wanted to make a loan on her, furnishing supplies, and so forth, but I think the gentleman has covered the question fully that was in my mind. If the Commissioner of Navigation requires this thing to be done, the situation is fully met.

Mr. SCOTT. I may say this to the gentleman, that in the publication of the vessel's register the names under which the ship has previously been known are put in brackets. I do not know how long they do that, but I assume a sufficient length of time to make secure that no possible advantage can be taken of the change of name. When it goes along a sufficient length of time, so that the ship becomes known by the name she is carrying, I assume they will eliminate the brackets indicating her previous names.

Mr. Chairman, I now yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER].

Mr ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY].

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, it is important that these measures dealing with our merchant marine be passed. Of still greater importance, however, is proper provision for training the men who are to have the places of leadership in our Navy and merchant marine.

The greatest navy in the world, the biggest merchant marine that ever dotted the seas, would be useless unless there were trained men to man and command the ships.

One of the sinister signs in the situation as to naval affairs is the account in the newspapers of the day that two midshipmen in attendance at the United States Naval Academy, at Annapolis, have recently attempted to commit suicide because of unbearable conditions there.

I hold in my hand a copy of the Washington Times of to-day. Here is the opening statement:

> ANNAPOLIS, MD., October 8.
>
> Well-authenticated reports state that another midshipman of the fourth class has taken poison. His name is reported to be Weatherstein, but his first name and home could not be ascertained.
>
> This makes the second case of its sort in the last three days. P. H. Seltzer, of Lebanon, Pa., on Sunday drank a mixture of ink and iodine and stabbed himself twice over the heart.
> Weatherstein, it is said, drank an ounce vial of iodine. He is said to have walked from his room in Bancroft Hall to the sick bay after taking the poison. Here he became violently ill, and was taken to the naval hospital, according to reports.

Mr. Chairman, an hour before I noticed that article I received a letter written by a midshipman at the Naval Academy. He gave a statement of the cruel and heartless hazing to which he had been subjected. His letter, disconnected and broken, gave evidence of the mental strain and torture under which he suffered.

Only a few months ago that boy was filled with intense pride and enthusiasm over successfully passing the entrance examination for Annapolis. He had planned for years to enter upon a naval career, and all his dreams seemed realized. He was supremely confident of his ability to meet any test which might come—physical, mental, or moral.

Now his one desire seems to be to get away forever from Annapolis and everything connected with it. There has been a revulsion of feeling, which, to my mind, could only come through the suffering of intolerable indignities.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that it is highly important that Congress know the truth as to conditions at this training school from which must come those who will direct the naval affairs of America.

If the experience of other Members of this body has been similar to mine, the situation is serious. I have a vacancy now at the Naval Academy because of the resignation of the lad I had named. He, too, started out with the enthusiastic determination to spend his life in the Nation's service on the high seas. In six months his enthusiasm had given way to dislike; his fervor to complete disgust.

I confess that I am not prepared to say whether the fault lies altogether with the boys or with the institution. In view of this published statement that two lads chose to die by their own hand rather than endure the ills they suffered in the academy, it seems to me that Congress should have the exact facts upon which to base a decision.

I have just introduced a resolution of inquiry, directing the Secretary of the Navy to give the House a report as to the truth of these publications; the practices indulged in in the "hazing" at the academy, and the number of midshipmen who have resigned during the past year, and the reasons for such resignations.

I have been informed that a son of the Secretary of the Navy himself is one of those who have resigned within the past year, and it may be possible that he suffered from the "hazing" which is reported to be carried to barbarous extremes at the Naval Academy. In any case, the Secretary of the Navy will be able to furnish us the information upon which we may base action.

Every Member of Congress is interested in the national institution, where those who shall carry out our naval and merchant marine policies are educated and trained, and I hope that if abuses are found to exist they will be remedied by the Secretary and Congress at the earliest moment possible.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I will yield the gentleman some of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Missouri that he has yet no time in his control.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will inquire at this time whether any member of the committee is opposed to the bill?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Is it not necessary that they should be? We are entitled to two hours' debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that on Calendar Wednesday the rule is that one hour shall be controlled by those favoring the measure and one hour by those opposing the measure, if there be any opposition.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I do not know of any opposition. The gentleman from Michigan has yielded 30 minutes to me. I just wanted to take a moment at this time to call the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY] to the fact that the Washington Post this morning said that one of the midshipmen had become insane and three had attempted suicide.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. That is true. I was also calling attention to my own experience with midshipmen that I have appointed.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Are there not many cases where the boys are incompetent to keep up with their classes on account of very severe lessons, and is not that the reason for these resignations?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I take it for granted that the passing of the examination, a stringent physical and mental test, is proof as to the ability of the boys who enter West Point and Annapolis.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. That is often the case. I have known of many instances where boys have been admitted and within a year or two afterwards found the course too severe for them.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. That may be true in some cases, but I am sure that in many cases it is not true. Inability to keep up with lessons is not the reason for all these resignations.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS].

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, personally I can not see any reason why this bill should not pass. As I understand the matter, it is required, where a man wants to change the name of a ship upon which there is a mortgage, that there shall be an act of Congress passed to complete the transfer of the name. Bills that came before our committee went onto the Private Calendar, and in some cases for one or two years the Private Calendar was not taken up, and the bills lay there; and, of course, the man could not complete the transfer of the ship from one owner to another. If we are to have a large merchant marine, we must arrange in some way or other to have the ships handled as quickly as possible and with as little restriction as possible. Therefore, I think this is a piece of very wise legislation. The cost of the transfer, of course, should be borne by the owner, and I can not see why there should be any objection to different prices for different-sized ships.

To change the subject a little bit, I picked up this morning the New York Evening Post's first Australian number, and was very much surprised to see that our shipbuilding was a matter of comment in the legislature of Australia. They have been building ships over there for their merchants. They made contracts for wooden ships because they could not get steel ships, and, as with us, they canceled the contracts. However, they feel that they did very much better than we did in this country. The article states that contracts were canceled for certain wooden ships, the Government paying the contractors about $25 a ton; and it goes on to state that in Australia it is reported that the American Government has canceled its contracts for 385 wooden vessels in about the same stage of construction at an average cost of about $65 a ton for compensation.

The Australian Government therefore felt that it got out of its liabilities fairly well. Further along the article says:

> The 14 wooden vessels ordered in America have been disappointing. They were all late in delivery, and those that have arrived have not served as a recommendation for American shipbuilding. The position in relation to these vessels is best set out in the following statement in Parliament by the minister in charge of shipping (Mr. A. Poynton). Mr. Poynton said that four vessels—the Gethana, Culburra, Challamba, and Coolcha—have been delivered by the Sloan Shipyard Corporation, at Seattle, U. S. A. Of 10 similar vessels for which a contract had been placed with the Patterson-McDonald Shipbuilding Co., three—the Bellata, Bundarra, and the Bethanga—had been delivered, and the Birriwa and Berringa were expected to be delivered at the end of July and early in September, respectively.
> "With regard to the remaining vessels," Mr. Poynton explained, "an alteration in the motive power was decided upon and arrangements made for the substitution of Diesel engines in place of the steam engines originally provided for. Particulars of these motor ships are: Benowa, delivered July 15; Baninda, delivery expected about middle of August; Balcatta, launching expected beginning of August, ready for delivery end of September; Boobyalla, delivery indefinite; and Borrika, delivery indefinite. It will be observed that the date of delivery for the last two is indefinite in consequence of several strikes which have taken place at the shipbuilding yards, but the latest information I have is that deliveries should be one month between each, so that if the Balcatta is delivered at the end of September the Boobyalla will be handed over at the end of October and the Borrika at the end of November. It is impossible to say with any degree of certainty that these expectations will be realized."

He was interrogated very much like we do here by Mr. Fleming.

> Mr. FLEMING. Have wooden ships proved satisfactory?
> Mr. POYNTON. I am sorry to say that wooden vessels built in America have not turned out satisfactorily. That is not our fault.
>
> Mr. MAHONY. What about your supervisors?
>
> Mr. POYNTON. One yard was taken over by the American Government and apparently they could not supervise it. We have had legal opinion with regard to getting redress on some things.
>
> Mr. MAHONY. Have you not an officer there supervising in the interest of the Commonwealth?
>
> Mr. POYNTON. Of course, we have. I do not know what he is doing. These ships were built months ago, and it is all very well to be wise after the event. At the time the contract was made the country rang with cheers for the prime minister for having the courage to do something for its interest at the time.
>
> Apparently after this experience the Government has decided to stick to steel ships and either build them in Australia or order them in Great Britain.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. I do.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I want to ask the gentleman if, in connection with the article he is reading, there were any figures as to the cost of Australian wooden ships or whether the gentleman has any information on that subject?

Mr. EDMONDS. I think I can give the information in regard to wooden ships in just a second. It was $130 a dead-weight ton for vessels 250 feet long, five-masted auxiliary schooners with Diesel-Bolinder engine developing about 240 horsepower.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. That is interesting taken in connection with the——

Mr. EDMONDS. Of course, these were built during the war, the gentleman understands.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I say it is interesting, taken in connection with the cost of our wooden ships, which I understand were figured out at $215 per dead-weight ton.

Mr. EDMONDS. I think that is about right.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. I will.

Mr. SCOTT. Is the gentleman discussing ships built by the Emergency Fleet Corporation for us on the Atlantic?

Mr. EDMONDS. Oh, no; these ships were built by permission, I assume, of the Emergency Fleet Corporation for the Australian Government, to be used by the merchants of Australia, because they were so short of shipping during the war. The contracts were placed here; and, as the gentleman notices, our shipbuilders unfortunately did not seem to take enough care in building the ships properly. If we expect to get the trade of the world, we must expect to cater to that trade, and if we do not we are certainly going to lose it. As the situation now stands, Australia has started to build ships herself. She has 6 steel vessels (5,500 tons), 14 steel vessels (6,000 tons), and she has 50,000 tons of 12,500-ton vessel building in Autralia and 60,000 tons contracted for in Great Britain. The chances we have to get the Australian trade through the poor workmanship of the people in Seattle has been lost to us.

Mr. SCOTT. If the gentleman will yield to me, as far as the wooden ships which were constructed in Seattle are concerned, they were in large measure built in steel-ship yards; that is, in yards which were primarily for the construction of steel ships. Now, as far as wooden ships were concerned built on the Atlantic, I may best illustrate the character of the ship by calling attention to conditions at the Boston yard. They were contracted for by a couple of lawyers; and, I may say to the gentleman, further, that the people who are building wooden ships knew no more about building wooden ships than about the moon, and they were constructed out of unseasoned timber—in other words, green timber—and after they were completed and they were put in the water, why, they leaked like a sieve; so I think it is an unfortunate situation, and the House and the country should not infer that wooden ships can not be built, because until very recently that is the only character of ship that was on the ocean or Great Lakes.

Mr. EDMONDS. I would like to show the gentleman the advertisement of the Patterson-MacDonald Shipbuilding Co., with a picture of the ship Benowa, built for the Commonwealth Government of Australia. This is a sample of the advertisement. Four sister motor ships of the Benowa are nearing completion. They were not engaged in building our ships and had to go out and get these outside orders.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Who is the author of the article from which the gentleman has been reading?

Mr. EDMONDS. I was reading from the New York Post, first Australian number, published in New York, September 27, 1919.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. I do not like the general statement emphasizing the fact that not a wooden ship was built on time. In the only wooden-ship yard in my district, at Cornwalis, all the ships were built on time; in fact, they were delivered before the dates specified in the contracts. I think it is fair to make this statement in view of what the gentleman publishes.

Mr. EDMONDS. That may be true.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. The writer said the wooden boats were not delivered on time.

Mr. EDMONDS. That may be true in regard to the ships being built for the Emergency Fleet Corporation. Of course, the yard in the gentleman's district was not building ships for the Australian Government.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. That statement said that all the wooden ships that were built in our country were not built on time.

Mr. EDMONDS. I am quoting Mr. Boynton, a member of Parliament of Australia.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. He alluded to ships in our country also?

Mr. EDMONDS. He alluded to ships that were built on account of the Australian Government in our country.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. For Australia?

Mr. EDMONDS. For Australia. I am very sorry, indeed, to see this article in the paper. It seems to me if we expect to get a large trade in shipbuilding in this country our shipbuilders ought to take care of this matter. They can do it, and there is no reason why we should be subject to this criticism in far-off Australia.

Mr. SCOTT. The gentleman's remarks are very interesting. Will he indulge me to say that I recently saw a statement in Lloyd's comparing the actual cost of production of ships in this country with those in Great Britain. Following the whole proposition to its last analysis, taking up the identical essentials necessary to the production of a vessel, and the rough estimate of the increased cost in the United States was somewhere in the neighborhood of 20 per cent, that it actually cost in this country to-day for labor and material 20 per cent more to produce a ship than it does in Great Britain.

Mr. EDMONDS. Of course, I am not an expert shipbuilder, and I hesitate to express any opinion on that subject. But I would like to say to the gentleman that it is my impression that, considering the fact that we can get cheaper steel than the British Government can, we ought to be able to fairly well compete in the building of ships of the same style and character.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back seven minutes. The gentleman from Michigan has 20 minutes remaining.

Mr. SCOTT. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP].

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, as I came in the Hall I heard the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY] make certain observations relative to the Naval Academy and heard him reading an extract from a paper, stating that two of the cadets had attempted suicide. After reading the article, Mr. KELLY commented on hazing at the academy, and his remarks created in my mind the impression that he thought hazing was responsible for the two midshipmen attempting suicide.

It was my pleasure last summer to be a member of the congressional board that visited Annapolis during the commencement, and I met the officers in charge and the civilian faculty, and I never met anywhere a finer body of men. I also had the privilege of meeting a great many of the midshipmen. They were happy and proud to be midshipmen, and in my opinion they are as fine a class of boys as you will find anywhere. My only child is a midshipman, having been appointed by Senator HOKE SMITH, of Georgia, and I know from him, as well as from the officers, that no hazing of an injurious character at all is permitted at the academy. Under an act of Congress hazing is absolutely prohibited, and the superintendent and officers endeavor to enforce the law. Now, of course, the boys have little rules and regulations; one of them, for instance, being that members of the fourth class can not walk down a certain walk, that they can not cut corners, and that they can not go out of certain doors. The plebes are treated just like freshmen at any college are treated by upper classmen; but there is nothing done there that would reflect on the honor or character of a boy or in anywise injuriously affect him.

Now, in answer to the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WATSON] that a lot of midshipmen fall out because they could not keep up, that is absolutely the fact. They are not resigning or leaving because they do not like the academy, as Mr. KELLY intimated, but because of failure to meet the requirements to remain. Pardon me for referring to a matter personal with me, but I mention it because I know the facts. My son has just finished his first year and is now a youngster. When he entered last year there were 995 boys in his class. That class in one year is brought down to 770. If a boy in any one month fails to make 2.5 in any study—4 being the maximum mark of grading—unless the academic board especially permits him to remain in the academy, he is dropped out.

Now, I know nothing in the world about the cases of these two young men, but I do feel this, that if the character of hazing they get over there caused them to attempt to commit suicide these boys did not have grit and stamina enough to make good naval officers. I know Admiral Scales, the superintendent of the academy, and his faculty have not the slightest objection to any investigation being made of their acts and doings, and I know them well enough to know that they would court such an investigation as proposed by Mr. KELLY. As I stated, I am not authorized to speak for them, but after the observation of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY] I felt, in justice to the academy and to the faculty, that I should make these few scattering remarks. [Applause.]

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. I will.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. I visited Annapolis two years ago, and asked one of the officers what percentage of the midshipmen were graduated. I am not positive, but I think he said two-thirds were dropped during the four years because they were not able to pass the examinations. That may be too large a percentage, but I know I was surprised that such a large percentage failed.

Mr. CRISP. I will say to the gentleman that a great number of them drop out. I can not say what the percentage is. I do happen to know that last year's class, which is now the third class, when it entered had 995 members, and in the last report I received from the board as to my son's work the class had fallen to 770 members.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. I will.

Mr. BANKHEAD. As I recall from the newspaper account, there was no indication that the attempt of these young men to commit suicide was superinduced by the action of the superintendent or anyone else in the academy.

Mr. CRISP. Admiral Scales stated, according to the paper, that hazing had nothing whatever to do with the attempt of these two young men to commit suicide.

I yield back the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Michigan, and I thank him.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back four minutes.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], or such time as he may desire to use.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the subject that we have been discussing just now causes to rise in my mind a query of considerable importance as to why it is that so many of the cadets in both the academies fail to make the final examinations. We are certainly making constant improvement in our facilities of education. There never has been a time when we have spent so much money in order to supply the equipment, and there never has been a time when we have required a higher grade of training for teachers than to-day. In the selection of my candidates for the two academies I have always left it to competitive examination, in order that I might get the best trained, so that there would be no failure in the examination. I have not succeeded. The last two appointees that I recommended upon that sort of examination failed. No; I should not say the last two. The last one failed, and the preceding one dropped out for a reason that I want to explain. And, to be honest with you, that is why I asked for the five minutes, for I have no complaint upon the importance of a high standard of scholarship for the academies. In the onset I wish to say that, as a schoolman myself, I fully realize the advantage, if not the necessity, of rigid discipline, and therefore I would be the last man on the floor of this House to question the wisdom of the rigid discipline which is being exercised at these academies. If I could say so without being regarded as hypercritical, I would without hesitation declare that some of the rulings, especially at West Point, are without good sense. I say that as one knowing the need of discipline in higher education.

A recent appointee of mine at West Point was notified by his father, and the day after that notification he was notified by the officers of the hospital, that his mother was lying at the point of death, and he was asked to come home. He made his application for leave to go home to the authorities of the academy. He laid the matter in telegrams before them. He was told that if he should go home he would have to resign. The boy had the choice of resignation or remaining and disrespecting the call of father and also the call of the officer of the hospital in Cincinnati. He did exactly what you would have done and what I would have done. He resigned and went to his mother. She died.

He came to talk to me about this immediately upon the death of his mother, which occurred in about 10 days, and I felt so outraged over the fact that I took it up immediately with the superintendent, and asked him if it were not possible to reinstate the boy so that he could go right on with his work without losing the year. The officer who wrote me declined to do it. He said he would lose the year, and that if he wanted to enter again he would have to reenter anew, although they would not require him to take another examination for entry.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. FESS. I wrote to the superintendent and said that I appreciated fully, as I thought, the necessity of rigid regulations, and I certainly appreciated the interruption of a few days in the middle of the year in a course of higher education such as was being given in the institution; but I thought that under the circumstances this boy ought not to be compelled to lose a year, and I should insist that his statement regarding the break of but two or three weeks was not sufficient to deny his reentrance and being placed where he was when he was compelled to resign. I had a letter in answer which was extremely curt, giving me to understand that that was their regulation, and that I could accept it if I wanted to or not, but that the boy would not be reinstated, and if he wanted to reenter he would have to come in under the regulation which put him off to the end of the year. The boy, of course, did not go, as I, nor you, would not have gone.

Now, I speak as a friend of the academies. I wish that distinctly understood. I have not had any sympathy with a good deal of criticism that has been offered against them. But I think this is a case that is simply outrageous, and I feel quite keenly about the matter. Whether there is an explanation that is rational or not, I confess it was not rational to me as a schoolman.

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield to my friend.

Mr. ALMON. The gentleman is no doubt familiar with this educational institution and its regulations. I was wondering what control Congress has over its regulations pertaining to matters such as the gentleman has referred to, if any.

Mr. FESS. I think Congress has given the academy almost carte blanche authority to make their own regulations as to courses of study and discipline, and I am rather of opinion that we will have to do that; that we can not here, from the floor, direct the regulations of the academy. We should have men of sound common sense in whom we can safely confide. But what shall we say of men who will make regulations such as operated upon this young man and then curtly reply to a man who demands that that injury be remedied without working an injustice to the person who is totally without fault? I do not think there is a Member in this House who would criticize the young man, or who would have said that boy should have remained in the academy, because he was called to resign or be absent from the mother when she was on her deathbed. It seems to me that it was not only a perfect outrage, but a case of inhuman brutality that must not be allowed to become the rule in any Government institution.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield to my friend.

Mr. CRISP. I am in thorough accord with the gentleman in that case, and I rise to ask if there are any rules or regulations forbidding the granting of leave by the superintendent in such cases?

Mr. FESS. No. That is wholly within the discretion of the superintendent, as it ought to be.

Mr. CRISP. That is, in his judgment?

Mr. FESS. Yes; and it was his judgment or the judgment of the officer acting that if you granted the leave it would so interrupt the work that the boy could not fit in again when he came back, and therefore he refused to allow him the leave of absence.

Mr. CRISP. He could have granted the leave?

Mr. FESS. Most certainly. No authority save his own will would prevent granting the leave of absence.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I would state to the gentleman from Ohio that I had a splendid young man from Sierra Blanca, Tex., now in the district of the gentleman from El Paso [Mr. HUDSPETH], who stood the preliminary examination, and of 27 boys, high-school graduates, in that district he stood the highest examination in the competitive contest, but on the final examination he failed only in algebra, and in that only by a very small margin.

Later on I was given to understand that there would be another examination that year, and at my suggestion the young man came to Washington and entered a preparatory school—Dowd's Academy. His parents are not rich, and this was done at great sacrifice on the boy's part and on the part of his parents. After he entered Dowd's Academy the commandant at Annapolis ruled that the young man would have to wait until the next year to take the examination; that he could not take the one coming the next month, because he would not be allowed to take two examinations in the same year. I thought that was a very harsh ruling to make under the circumstances, for the young man would be over age the next year, and he was thus prevented from entering Annapolis after going to quite an expense in making preparation.

Mr. FESS. I will say to my friend from Texas along that line that I have had no disposition to find fault with the authorities on a matter of the rigidity of examinations, or upon the matter of their rigidity in discipline in keeping up their ranking. What I draw the line on is a case like that of the illness of a cadet's mother, where the rules, within the discretion of the officers, would not allow that boy to go to the deathbed of his mother without resigning and losing his opportunity. I think that is little short of criminal. When I called the attention of the officer to it by letter I received a curt reply, evidently written by some understrapper.

I am no better, and we on this floor are no better, than people outside. Our position here entitles us to no consideration further than to perform our public duty, and I do not ask for any reply as a Congressman that I would not ask as a citizen at home in private life; but it was evidently some understrapper, who felt his authority, who gave me to understand that no amount of experience that I had had as a college officer for 25 years would equip me to say that they were in the wrong. That is why I did not like it. The reply was couched in language usually employed by an irresponsible who was exercising temporary authority and who evidently wanted it known that he was giving final orders. I know no way to reach such cases of boorishness, but, to say the least, Congress should exercise superior or commanding authority when such palpable and brutal injustice is permitted in a Government institution whose life depends upon the will of this body. We have a great academy at West Point as at Annapolis, but such conduct sheds no credit upon them and should not be tolerated a moment longer than it can be corrected.

Mr. HUDSPETH. The gentleman has stated that he did not think Congress had anything to do with the making of these rules; but we could pass a resolution of condemnation of such an act as that, could we not?

Mr. FESS. I think so; and, if necessary to prevent its occurrence, I should vote for it.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I think it ought to be done.

Mr. WALTERS. Will the gentleman state his experience as an educator, as to the possibility of a student regaining the ground that he might have lost during his brief absence from the academy?

Mr. FESS. Why, certainly. A student of any rank who was absent for two or three weeks in a college year could with ease, as my friend, our colleague, Mr. FAIRFIELD, who is an experienced educator, will admit, catch up with his class and get back in his rank, whether it be in mathematics, languages, or what not. It has been done every year and in every standard college in America. It was simply, in my judgment, a chimerical indiscretion on the part of some understrapper, who assumed to tell me that this boy, in order to go home to the deathbed of his mother, would have to resign and lose not only the year but his opportunity to be in the academy. For I fully agreed with him when he related to me at my home the details, after having written me about that matter, that I would not fault him in the least for deciding not to return. I have called attention to this incident because of what was just said by other Members about the academies, not as a critic, but as a friend of these institutions.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Michigan has one minute remaining.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, unless further time is desired, I will ask for the reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read section 1.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking a member of the committee a question.

There has been a good deal of comment in the papers in regard to the disposition of two of the great ocean grayhounds—the Imperator and the Vaterland, the last named of which did such splendid service under the American flag as a transport. Some of the newspaper accounts state that the Imperator, which was never in the hands of the Allies and always at anchor at Cuxhaven, is now to be allotted to the American Government and that we are also going to retain the Vaterland. I have been unable to substantiate these rumors or to find out the truth of the matter, and I would like very much to ask some of these gentlemen of the Merchant Marine Committee what is the status of these two great ships. I specify no one to whom I would direct my remarks.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I will ask the gentleman if he has inquired of the Shipping Board?

Mr. HICKS. I have, and they do not seem to know.

Mr. ALEXANDER. If they do not know, I am sure nobody else does.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I supposed they were under the direction of the Shipping Board.

Mr. SCOTT. If I can be considered as within the category of the gentleman's inquiry——

Mr. HICKS. The gentleman is eminently qualified.

Mr. SCOTT. I thank the gentleman. I recently saw in a newspaper a statement that the Imperator and the Vaterland had both been assigned to the United States.

I have never seen any contradiction, although previously it was said that the Imperator had been assigned to Great Britain. This last statement, which purported to outline the facts, said that the Imperator had been taken over by the Fleet Corporation and they had refused to turn her over to the British Government.

Mr. HICKS. That is all the information I have seen on the same line, but it does not really give us anything definite, because newspaper accounts are many times imaginative articles.

Mr. SCOTT. The disposition of these ships has no particular bearing on this bill now before the committee.

Mr. HICKS. I am fully aware, Mr. Chairman, that my question does not refer to the bill, but I am operating under a poetic license and striking the ball outside of the strict location of the diamond.

Mr. SCOTT. I am not criticizing the gentleman's inquiry; I was only saying that we are not changing the names of these ships.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. I would like to know through what agency the ships were apportioned to Great Britain. Is there any reason why Great Britain should claim the right to allot the ships?

Mr. HICKS. That was a mystery to me, what claim Great Britain could have to the Imperator. She was never under the British flag.

Mr. SCOTT. If the gentleman will permit me to reply to the gentleman from Indiana, after the war was over a general commission was appointed and allotment was made. It was determined that the United States was entitled to all enemy ships that were interned in the United States at the time of the war. That rule prevailed as to the other allies. At the close of the war the enemy ships that were not in the possession of the Allies during the war became the subject of controversy as to their disposition. I think the peace conference decided that their disposition should be brought about by a commission appointed, and these ships were allotted pro rata to the Allies in proportion to their respective losses by submarine attack.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That for the privilege of securing such changes of name the following fees shall be paid by the owners of vessels to collectors of customs, to be deposited in the Treasury of such collectors as navigation fees: For vessels 99 gross tons and under, $10; for vessels 100 gross tons and up to and including 499 gross tons, $25; for vessels 500 gross tons and up to and including 999 gross tons, $50; for vessels 1,000 gross tons and up to and including 4,999 gross tons, $75; for vessels 5,000 tons and over, $100.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, in line 11 the word "of" ought to be "by." I move to strike out the word "of" and insert the word "by."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 11, after the word "Treasury," strike out the word "of" and insert the word "by."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk completed the reading of the bill.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose, and Mr. WALSH having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. ROGERS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 3620) to authorize the Commissioner of Navigation to change the names of vessels, and directed him to report the same back with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendment to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SCOTT, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I have a bill which I have overlooked and I would like to call up and have read. It is on the Private Calendar, H. R. 6857.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, did I understand the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] to say that the bill to which he refers is on the Private Calendar?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. ROGERS. My understanding of the rule is that bills on the Private Calendar can not be called up on Calendar Wednesday.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts is correct. Bills on the Private Calendar can not be called up on Calendar Wednesday.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 43 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, October 9, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. GOOD, from the Select Committee on Budget, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 9783) to provide a national budget system and an independent audit of Government accounts, and for other purposes, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 362), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, committees were discharged from the consideration of the following bills, which were referred as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8433) granting a pension to Odelon Valcour; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, October 9, 1919.

Rev. J. J. Muir, D. D., of the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

O God, our help in ages past, our present help in every hour of need, we turn to Thee this morning, thanking Thee for opportunity and for all the privileges of life, and ask Thy guidance in meeting the confusions and unrest of these times. Help these Thy servants in every circumstance of responsibility. Grant Thy grace, we beseech of Thee, in the sick room at the White House, and to Thy servant the President reveal Thyself as a helper and healer. Accept of us and glorify Thyself in and through the Nation. Through Christ our God. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. SMOOT and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. NEWBERRY. I desire to announce the absence of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS], who are engaged in a committee hearing.

Mr. GERRY. The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] are absent on account of illness in their families. The senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GAY], and the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] are detained from the Senate on official business. The junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY], and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] are absent on public business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-seven Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 633) extending the provisions for the regulation of steam vessels to vessels owned or operated by the United States Shipping Board, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 3620. An act to authorize the Commissioner of Navigation to change the names of vessels;

H. R. 8986. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Paris-Hugo Bridge Co. to construct a bridge and approaches thereto across Red River, near Arthur City, Lamar County, Tex.; and

H. R. 9692. An act to amend section 13 of an act entitled "An act to promote the welfare of American seamen in the merchant marine of the United States; to abolish arrest and imprisonment as a penalty for desertion; and to secure the abrogation of treaty provisions in relation thereof; and to promote safety at sea," approved March 4, 1915.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

S. 9. An act to encourage the reclamation of certain arid lands in the State of Nevada, and for other purposes;

S. 253. An act for the payment of claims for loss of private property on account of the loss of firearms and ammunition taken by the United States troops during the labor strikes in the State of Colorado in 1914;

S. 2100. An act authorizing the Union Pacific Railway Co. or its successors to convey for public-road purposes certain parts of its right of way; and

H. R. 7478. An act to amend sections 5200 and 5202 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by acts of June 22, 1906, and September 24, 1918.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

H. R. 3620. An act to authorize the Commissioner of Navigation to change the names of vessels;

H. R. 8986. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Paris-Hugo Bridge Co. to construct a bridge and approaches thereto across Red River, near Arthur City, Lamar County, Tex.; and

H. R. 9692. An act to amend section 13 of an act entitled "An act to promote the welfare of American seamen in the merchant marine of the United States; to abolish arrest and imprisonment as a penalty for desertion; and to secure the abrogation of treaty provisions in relation thereof; and to promote safety at sea," approved March 4, 1915.

PROMOTION OF FOREIGN COMMERCE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a response on the part of the governor of the Federal Reserve Board to Senate resolution 203. It will be inserted in the RECORD. It is brief.

The communication is as follows:

FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD,
OFFICE OF THE GOVERNOR,
Washington, October 7, 1919.

SIR: Referring to your letter of the 6th instant inclosing a copy of Senate resolution 203, you are advised that neither the Federal Reserve Board nor the Federal reserve banks receive any appropriations from Congress. All the Federal reserve banks at the present time are earning large profits far in excess of operating expenses and dividend requirements (dividends being limited by law to 6 per cent, cumulative), and the expenses of the Federal Reserve Board and its staff are defrayed out of the proceeds of assessments levied semiannually upon the Federal reserve banks in proportion to their capital stock and surplus, as authorized by a paragraph in section 10 of the Federal reserve act.

The Federal Reserve Board is not charged with any duty relating to the promotion and development of foreign commerce, although the Federal reserve banks are authorized under section 14, with the consent or upon the order and direction of the Federal Reserve Board and under regulations to be prescribed by the board, to open and maintain accounts in foreign countries, appoint correspondents, and establish agencies in such countries. Under this authority the board has authorized the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, acting for itself and other Federal reserve banks, to establish agency relations with the Bank of England and the Bank of France.

Under the provisions of section 25 of the Federal reserve act the board has also authorized a large national bank to establish branches in several foreign countries, and has authorized national banks having a capital of not less than $1,000,000 to purchase stock in corporations or banks principally engaged in foreign banking after these corporations have made an agreement with the board as to the character of the business to be transacted, the manner in which the business is to be conducted, and as to reports and examinations. A number of these foreign banking corporations have been organized with national banks as stockholders, and they have branches or offices in nearly all parts of the world.

The Federal Reserve Board itself, however, has incurred no expense in matters connected with the promotion and development of foreign commerce, nor has it any employees engaged in such work.

Respectfully, yours,

W. P. G. HARDING,
Governor.

HON. GEORGE A. SANDERSON,
Secretary United States Senate.

SHIPMENT OF WHEAT.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, on yesterday the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] had printed in the RECORD a letter from Mr. J. H. Young, an officer of the United States Railroad Administration, with reference to the exportation of wheat. Mr. Young gives the excuse that for the want of ships wheat is not being exported. I take it that the Senate is anxious to have the facts, and I wish to say that I am in a position to give them the facts because I have taken the matter up with the Secretary of Agriculture. For the information of the Senator from Oklahoma, as well as other Senators, I ask to have read a letter which I have just received from the Secretary of Agriculture.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, October 2, 1919.

HON. A. J. GRONNA,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR GRONNA: I have your letter of September 27, in which you make inquiry regarding embargoes upon cereals and their products, live stock and the products of live stock, and other necessary food products. Matters of this sort are now handled by the War Trade Section of the State Department, which took over the functions of the War Trade Board at the close of the past fiscal year. The bureau of exports of that section informs me that, with the exception of wheat and wheat flour, any and all food products may be exported freely, without individual export license, to any country in the world except European Russia. Questions relating to the exportation or importation of wheat and wheat flour are dealt with by the United States Wheat Director, whose offices are located at 42 Broadway, New York City. I am inclosing herewith for your information a copy of a letter from the Bureau of Exports, together with two bulletins which have a bearing on your inquiry.

Very truly, yours,

D. F. HOUSTON, Secretary.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I simply want to add that Mr. Julius Barnes, Director of the Grain Corporation, is responsible for the embargo. There has been and there is now an embargo on wheat and wheat flour, and that is the reason why wheat is not being exported. The letter which was printed in the RECORD on yesterday does not give the correct information. As a further proof of that, Mr. President, I offer——

Mr. POMERENE. May I ask the Senator a question in that connection?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes, sir.

Mr. POMERENE. What is the reason for this embargo?

Mr. GRONNA. I have telegraphed Mr. Barnes and asked him why it is necessary to have this embargo at the present time, but up to this moment I have not received a reply.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Dakota permit an inquiry?

Mr. GRONNA. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I have been advised by a number of gentlemen who have given attention to this matter that one of the reasons why the shipments of foodstuffs during the past month or so have been as small as they have been—although they have been very great—was because of the lack of credit in Europe, the lack of means upon the part of European Governments with which to pay for the foodstuffs. From all that I can learn, including statements made by Mr. Hoover and others who are familiar with European conditions, the fact is that the European nations do not have sufficient funds with which to make the purchases in this country which their necessities require.

Mr. GRONNA. I will say to the Senator from Utah that that is not the reason with reference to wheat and wheat flour. If the Senator will read the letters which I have asked to have printed in the RECORD in connection with my remarks, he will find that to be the fact.

Mr. President, if I may be permitted to add another word, I wish to say that under our tariff law there is a duty of 10 cents per bushel on wheat between the United States and Canada. It seems, however, that these people are a law unto themselves and make their own laws. I am advised by the Secretary of Agriculture—I have his letter here, but it is rather a lengthy one, and I shall not ask to have it printed in the RECORD—that there is no duty on wheat. The law has never been repealed, so far as I know; it is on the statute books of the United States; Canada refused to accept the reciprocity treaty by an overwhelming vote, as Senators know; and why this law has been set aside I do not know. At any rate, it has been held, and is held to-day, that there is no duty on wheat between the United States and Canada.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I understood the Senator from North Dakota to say that it is held to-day that there is no duty on wheat?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. May I ask him by whom it is so held?

Mr. GRONNA. It must be by Mr. Barnes, the wheat director, for wheat is being shipped into this country free of duty.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course, the Senator from North Dakota knows that Mr. Barnes can not give a judicial opinion which would bind anybody.

Mr. GRONNA. The holding must be by the Treasury Department.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If there is any doubt about the legality of the action, why has the matter not been carried into court? The courts have the final say about whether there is or is not a duty upon a product coming into the United States. Has the matter ever been determined by the customs court or has it ever been appealed from that court to the Court of Appeals? What is the status of it?

Mr. GRONNA. The status of it is this: It has been held—I suppose by the Treasury Department—that there is no duty on wheat. Of course, no one has had the time to take the matter to the courts, I will say to the Senator from Mississippi. It is a matter with which the people of the United States have not been familiar; it is a new matter.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course, there is no authority in any part of the Executive to set aside a law; the Senator from North Dakota knows that as well as I. If the law be that there is no duty upon wheat from Canada at this moment, of course, there is none. By the way, that is the law. If the law be that there is a duty upon wheat, of course, there is one. Now, what I am trying to get at is for the Senator to be more specific and to tell the country just who has held that there is no duty on wheat, and what is his ground of objection to the legality of that decision if it be a decision.

Mr. GRONNA. I have the letter of the Secretary of Agriculture, and I will ask that it may be read. That will give the Senator from Mississippi the information.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish the Senator would have that letter read, because the Senator is making a very grave charge. He is making a charge that the Executive of this country is suspending and setting aside laws. It was for that crime that James the Second had to abdicate the throne of England and that Charles the First lost his throne and his head.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator from North Dakota is making the statement that there is no duty on wheat, upon information furnished him by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well; let the letter of the Secretary of Agriculture be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read, as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, September 27, 1919.

Hon. A. J. GRONNA,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR GRONNA: Your letter of September 22, inclosing correspondence with Senator WALSH relative to changes in tariff regulations on seed oats and wheat has been received. I find that there is no tariff at this time on wheat imported from Canada, and that the tariff on oats is 6 cents per bushel of 32 pounds. As the usual rate of seeding for oats in Montana and western North Dakota is around 2 to 2½ bushels per acre, the additional cost per acre due to the tariff would not be more than from 12 cents to 15 cents.

The estimated average area sown to oats in Montana during the past three years is 680,000 acres. Of this, probably 400,000 to 450,000 acres is on dry farms in the area seriously affected by drought this year, and the seed for probably all of this will have to come from sources outside of that area next spring. Of the 400,000 to 450,000 acres of dry-land oats, perhaps 300,000 are in Great Northern territory, which would be most likely to draw on the prairie Provinces of Canada for its seed supply.

The Bureau of Crop Estimates' report for 1918 shows that 650,000 acres of oats were sown in the territory north of the Missouri River and east to and including Rolette and Benson Counties. Some seed oats will have to be shipped into this section next spring, though the crop is much better than in any part of Montana. The poorest crops, not only of oats but of other grains, are in Bottineau, Rolette, Pierce, and McHenry Counties. In Burke, Divide, Williams, Mountrail, and Ward Counties considerable quantities of fair to good oats have been harvested, so that demand for seed from outside sources is unlikely. The counties farther east have direct connection with Canada by both the Great Northern and Soo lines, and could readily obtain a part of their seed supply from that section if desired.

The oat crop, as well as all other crops, is much poorer in southwestern North Dakota than in the northwestern part of the State. In the counties west of the Missouri River and in the adjoining counties of McLean, Burleigh, and Emmons, 420,000 acres were sown in 1918. A large part of the seed oats for this section will have to come from outside sources next spring, but only Emmons, Burleigh, and McLean Counties can be supplied on direct shipment from Canada. Presumably the Northern Pacific and Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul territory in both North Dakota and Montana is much more likely to draw on eastern than on Canadian sources for its seed grain.

The growing season in Minnesota was very wet with a resulting rank growth and considerable lodging and disease, so that it is doubtful if seed oats of good quality could be obtained there. Probably the best sources are the northeastern counties of North Dakota and southeastern South Dakota, where sufficient corn is grown to keep down wild oats.

In response to a telegram sent to Mr. George H. Clark, Canadian seed commissioner, the Bureau of Plant Industry has received the following message:

Oat crop, Alberta, Saskatchewan, this year harvested early; excellent condition. Believe could spare up to 2,000,000 bushels Canadian standard No. 1 and No. 2 seed Alberta white oats, consisting of Banner and Abundance varieties, which mature together. This quality oats commands premium, uncleaned condition about 15 cents for No. 1 and 10 cents for No. 2 over Canadian No. 2 Canada Western. Cost of cleaning and wastage in cleaning amounts additional to 8 cents per bushel, Canadian Government elevators. Suggest you communicate directly with United Grain Growers, Cooperative, Winnipeg.

Judging from Mr. Clark's telegram and our own knowledge of the supply of seed oats in Montana and North Dakota, there seems to be no doubt that there will be enough seed oats in Alberta and Saskatchewan for all possible demands, and it is likely that the people of northern Montana and northwestern North Dakota will desire to fill a large part of their needs from these Provinces.

Very truly, yours,

D. F. HOUSTON, Secretary.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, as I understand that letter, the Secretary of Agriculture says that he "finds there is no duty upon wheat and that there is a duty of 6 cents upon oats."

Of course, he must find that from the law, and so I do not quite understand the charge being made now by the Senator from North Dakota against the executive department. A moment ago I understood from the Senator that he contended that there was a duty on Canadian wheat and that it was being suspended by the executive department. If the Secretary of Agriculture be correct in saying that "he finds no such law," then the Senator from North Dakota must be incorrect in some way.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota made no charge whatever against the executive department. The Senator from North Dakota stated that the Director of the Grain Corporation, Mr. Julius Barnes, was, in his judgment, responsible for the condition referred to; that he had placed an embargo—which he has a legal right to do—not only upon wheat but upon wheat flour. I do not charge that is any violation of law, but I do not believe that it is fair to set aside the law; and the Senator from Mississippi knows as well as I do, because he helped to make the law, that to-day there is a duty of 10 cents a bushel on wheat, unless the Canadian Government has seen fit to approve the reciprocity treaty or to approve our tariff act of 1913 and agree that there shall be no duty on wheat or on wheat flour.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The embargo question is a separate and independent question, and is subject to a different course of analysis in determining as to whether or not it ought to have been laid. Frankly I do not see why any embargo should be laid upon the exportation of wheat, and had I the authority I certainly would not have laid any; but that is a different question.

I understood the Senator in his opening remarks to say he did not understand who had "suspended the law." Now, the Senator tells me that he made no charge that anybody had suspended it.

Mr. GRONNA. If the Senator will yield to me, I seem to be very unfortunate in making myself understood. I offered a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture to show that there was an embargo on wheat.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I heard that letter read.

Mr. GRONNA. I did that because the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] on yesterday had printed in the RECORD a letter from Mr. Young giving the reasons why wheat was not being exported and stating that it was due to the lack of ships.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that.

Mr. GRONNA. I am glad the Senator understands that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But the point I am arriving at is this: I understand the Senator now either to have withdrawn the charge or to have informed me that I misheard him—I do not know which; but I understood that in his first remarks he was making inquiry as to some executive officer who had "suspended a law" which he says is in existence and valid to-day and which is being violated. The Senator is mistaken, then, when he withdraws the charge in his last remark and says that he made no charge against anybody of suspending the law, or else he was mistaken in his charge.

Mr. GRONNA. The only difference is that I did not say, "I do not make any charge against anybody"; I said I made no charge against the executive department. I do make the charge against Julius Barnes, the Director of the Wheat Corporation, that he is acting contrary to the spirit of the law.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But, Mr. President, if an article bearing by law a duty is admitted into the United States duty free it must be through the operation of the Treasury Department, which is a part of the executive, so that, of course, the Senator is making a charge against the customs service, which is a part of the Treasury Department.

Mr. GRONNA. I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD a letter of Mr. Vance C. McCormick, chairman of the War Trade Board, one from Mr. F. S. Dickson, of the Bureau of Exports, and export license No. RAC–77.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WAR TRADE BOARD,
Washington, June 30, 1919.

REGULATIONS GOVERNING THE EXPORTATION AND IMPORTATION OF WHEAT AND WHEAT FLOUR.

The War Trade Board announce, effective July 1, 1919, that all control over the exportation and importation of wheat and wheat flour heretofore vested in the War Trade Board under Title VII of the espionage act and section 11 of the trading-with-the-enemy act, respectively, will, in accordance with the proclamation issued by the President on June 24, 1919, under section 6 of the so-called "wheat guaranty act," approved March 4, 1919, be transferred to and vested in the United States Wheat Director. All outstanding unused export or import licenses issued by the War Trade Board for wheat or wheat flour will be revoked effective July 1, 1919, and collectors of customs have been advised that said licenses are of no further force or effect.

The War Trade Board announce further that wheat and wheat flour will be removed, effective July 1, 1919, from the export conservation list and from the list of restricted imports of the War Trade Board.

All inquiries regarding the exportation or importation of wheat and wheat flour should be addressed to the United States Wheat Director, 42 Broadway, New York City.

VANCE C. MCCORMICK, Chairman.

SEPTEMBER 30, 1919.

The honorable the SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Referring to your telephone request for information regarding any embargoes which may be in force in the export of food products, I wish to advise you that, with the exception of wheat and wheat flour, any and all food products may be exported freely, without individual export license, to any country in the world save European Russia. I inclose a copy of War Trade Board ruling 833, issued to-day, covering shipments under special export license RAC–77.

I also inclose a copy of War Trade Board ruling 797, dated June 30, 1919, which announces that on and after July 1, 1919, all control over the exportation and importation of wheat and wheat flour heretofore vested in the War Trade Board will, in accordance with the proclamation issued by the President, of June 24, 1919, under section VI of the so-called "wheat guaranty act," approved March 4, 1919, be transferred to and vested in the United States Wheat Director.

Very truly, yours,

BUREAU OF EXPORTS,
By F. S. DICKSON.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WAR TRADE BOARD SECTION,
September 30, 1919.

Special Export License No. RAC–77, extended to cover the shipment to the Republic of Austria, Bulgaria, Turkey, and Hungary of all commodities except war materials.

The War Trade Board Section of the Department of State announces that Special Export License RAC–77, W. T. B. R. 831, has been extended and reissued, effective October 1, 1919. Special Export License RAC–77 as amended will authorize the exportation by freight or express, without individual licenses to the countries hereinbelow mentioned, of all commodities whatsoever, except (1) certain commodities as listed below when destined to Hungary, the Republic of Austria, Bulgaria, or Turkey; (2) arms, ammunition, and explosives consigned to China; (3) wheat and wheat flour, the control over the exportation of which has been vested in the Wheat Director (see W. T. B. R. 797, issued June 30, 1919):

(a) Any country in the Western Hemisphere.
(b) Any country in Africa.
(c) Any country in Asia or Oceania.
(d) Any country in Europe except Russia.

An individual export license must be obtained before any of the commodities hereinafter mentioned may be exported to Hungary, the Republic of Austria, Bulgaria, or Turkey. The importation into the above-named countries of the following commodities will be restricted, and individual export licenses will be granted only in exceptional cases:

Aircraft of all kinds, including aeroplanes, airships, balloons and their component parts, together with accessories and articles suitable for use in connection with aircraft.

Apparatus which can be used for the storage or projection of compressed or liquefied gases, flame acids, or other destructive agents capable of use in warlike operations, and their component parts.

Armor plates.

Armored motor cars.

Arms of all kinds, including arms for sporting purposes, and their component parts.

Barbed wire and implements for fixing and cutting same.

Camp equipment.

Camp equipment, articles of, and their component parts.

Clothing and equipment of a distinctively military character.

Electrical appliances adapted for use in the war and their component parts.

Explosives especially prepared for use in war.

Field glasses.

Gases for war purposes.

Guns and machine guns.

Gun mountings, limbers, and military wagons of all descriptions.

Harness or horse equipment of a military character.

Implements and apparatus designed exclusively for the manufacture of munitions of war, or for the manufacture or repair of arms or of war materials, for use on land or sea.

Mines, submarines, and their component parts.

Projectiles, charges, cartridges, and grenades of all kinds and their component parts.

Range finders and their component parts.

Searchlights and their component parts.

Submarine sound-signaling apparatus and materials for wireless telegraphs.

Torpedoes.

Warships, including boats and their component parts of such a nature that they can only be used on a vessel of war.

The exportation to the Republic of Austria, Hungary, Bulgaria, and Turkey of the following articles, viz, barbed wire and implements for fixing and cutting the same, articles of camp equipment and their component parts, clothing and equipment of a distinctly military character, electrical appliances for use in war and their component parts, military wagons of all descriptions, and harness or horse equipment of a military character, is forbidden only on account of the military use to which such articles can be put. If exporters have information showing that the articles are destined for civil purposes, the same should be submitted with their applications for export licenses.

Exporters who desire to make shipments under Special Export License RAC–77 need only present their shipper's export declarations (Customs Cat. 7525), in duplicate (see W. T. B. R. 828, issued Aug. 21, 1919), to the collectors of customs at the ports of exit for indorsement to permit the shipments to proceed.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I think there is some little confusion with reference to the 10 per cent duty upon wheat. Let me read the section of the act of October 3, 1913, with reference to wheat. It is as follows:

Wheat, wheat flour, semolina, and other wheat products, not specially provided for in this section—

The section is the free list—

Provided, That wheat shall be subject to a duty of 10 cents per bushel, that wheat flour shall be subject to a duty of 45 cents per barrel of 196 pounds, and semolina and other products of wheat, not specially provided for in this section, 10 per cent ad valorem, when imported directly or indirectly from a country, dependency, or other subdivision of government which imposes a duty on wheat or wheat flour or semolina imported from the United States.

I presume that the decision referred to by the Senator from North Dakota was a construction of that section of the tariff act of 1913.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, my object in interrupting the Senator was to get this thing in specific and definite shape. As the Senator from North Carolina has just shown, no law has been suspended, no law has been violated, and no part of the executive branch of the Government has rendered itself subject to the enormous impeachment that was laid against the Stuarts for doing what was charged by the Senator from North Dakota.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I ask to have inserted in the RECORD a list of 104 organizations in California which have indorsed the ratification of the treaty and the league of nations since July 1. It will be remembered that I have already introduced a number of reports of that sort from various States, particularly from California.

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I also ask to have published in the RECORD a letter from Nelson G. Welburn, vice chairman of the American Legion at Alameda, Calif., also indorsing the league of nations.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, before this request is granted I should like to say that the Senator from Nebraska nearly every day rises and puts into the RECORD telegrams or petitions or letters from people who are in favor of the league of nations. I have a great number of letters and telegrams and petitions and communications from people who are against the league of nations. They have not been put into the RECORD. It never occurred to me that it was a very accurate test of the wishes of the American people to see a rivalry between Senators as to who could introduce the most telegrams or letters or petitions for or against a proposition.

I just wanted to interpolate, before granting the unanimous-consent request of the Senator from Nebraska—and I am not going to object to it—the statement that I do not accept as having any force or weight this effort which the Senator from Nebraska is making to prove by a mass of telegrams that he is introducing that there are more people on that side of the question than there are on the other side. It is no test at all.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I sympathize with what the Senator says. I have received, I suppose, thousands of letters and telegrams that I have not presented to the Senate nor introduced in the RECORD in any way. What I have just presented, except the one letter, is a mere list of 104 organizations which have adopted resolutions. I do not present the resolutions themselves, but merely a list of 104 organizations in California that have adopted resolutions since July 1. That is to supplement others that I have previously introduced.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMERICAN LEGION, CALIFORNIA BRANCH,
ALAMEDA POST, No. 9,
Alameda, Calif., October 4, 1919.

Hon. GILBERT M. HITCHCOCK,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I beg to hand you herewith a copy of the letter as sent the Hon. HIRAM W. JOHNSON this day. In passing, and as a Progressive, I may say to you that the people of California are for the league of nations without amendments or reservations. They emphatically resent the nefarious attempt to convert this important question into a political issue.

Senator JOHNSON'S visit to California, sir, has helped and not injured the league of nations. To the nonpartisan element of this State his speeches have not been here an impartial and unprejudiced analysis, but more of an indictment of President Wilson.

Yours, for the success of the league, I have the honor to remain,

Most sincerely, yours, NELSON G. WELBURN,
Vice Chairman.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I also ask to have printed in the RECORD a vote taken by the Los Angeles Times during the last several weeks on the subject of the league of nations, showing 10,941 for the league as against 997 against the league. I want to say that these polls taken by the Los Angeles Times are among very representative organizations and bodies. For instance, in the case of the board of directors of the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce, 15 Republicans and 2 Democrats, with 3 absent, the vote was 17 for the league and none against it. The Los Angeles Ministerial Union was unanimous, 156 votes for the league. The Los Angeles Board of Education voted 7 for the league and none against it; and so on through a list of some 50 or 60 organizations, the total vote being 10,941 for the league, as I have stated, and less than 1,000 against it. I ask to have the list printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"HERE IS THE PROOF OF IT.

"Following are straw votes collected by the Times during the past few days on the question, 'Do you favor the league of nations as outlined and defended by President Wilson and opposed by Senator Johnson?' Every available gathering of persons consenting to vote on the subject is included in this list, whether the result favored the position taken by the Times or not. In some cases certain of those voting favored the league with reservations. Where such reservations are of a minor nature, these are counted for the league; where not, against it. In all cases the number of voters making reservation is noted. Most of the church vote was taken at the prayer meetings held Wednesday evening, which accounts for the small vote cast. All are of Los Angeles unless otherwise stated.

"The pastors of more than a dozen large churches in this city, who have not yet put the league of nations to a vote before their congregations, express the opinion that the membership of their churches are almost unanimously in favor of it."

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Nebraska if he will not introduce into the RECORD also the vote taken by the Omaha Bee. It will be more easily available for him than for me.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator puts me in a very embarrassing position by such a request. I think possibly it would come with better grace from the Senator from Illinois, and I do not want to violate the advice just given by the Senator who has criticized my introduction. I will content myself with what I have already presented.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, I ask that a statement by Sir Robert Borden, and another by a Canadian correspondent, be printed in the RECORD as evidence that the Canadian view of the position of Canada in the league differs from that of Senators who have held that Canada had a voice, but no vote.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"CANADA'S STATUS AS A NATION WITHIN THE BRITISH EMPIRE TOLD BY PREMIER—SIR ROBERT BORDEN EXPLAINS DIPLOMATIC POSITION ACHIEVED BY DOMINION AT THE PEACE CONFERENCE—TELLS OF ITS RELATION AS A SELF-GOVERNING BRITANNIC COUNTRY TO THE TREATY.

"In the Canadian section of the Sun of Tuesday last a special parliamentary correspondent in Ottawa gave some highly interesting particulars regarding certain official correspondence arising out of the Dominion's presence at the peace conference and involving the right of her Parliament to discuss and approve of the peace treaty—the position being taken that in the event of a 'show of hands' by the people of Canada they would undoubtedly be a solid unit for the position taken by Sir Robert Borden, namely, that in matters of peace or war which affect the Dominion the decision must rest not with the King or with the British Cabinet but with the Parliament of Canada.

"The character of the representation secured by Canada at the peace conference, her position as a signatory to the treaties, and her status as a member of the league of nations are matters which—owing to the incomplete development of the relations of the various British dominions to the motherland—Americans, and, indeed, many Canadians, only imperfectly understand. The following statement of the Canadian premier, therefore, just made to the Parliament of Canada, touching upon the entire question, is of the utmost international importance:

[By the Right Hon. Sir Robert Laird Borden, G. C. M. G., P. C.]

"The status of the dominions at the peace conference was the subject of long and earnest discussion. Various methods, which it is not necessary to explain, were suggested. In the end I proposed that there should be a distinctive representation for each dominion similar to that accorded to the smaller allied powers, and, in addition, that the British Empire representation of five delegates should be selected from day to day from a panel made up of representatives of the United Kingdom and the Dominions. The proposal was adopted by the imperial war cabinet.

"Early in December preliminary conversations on the making of peace took place in London between representatives of the British Empire, of France, and of Italy, and the proposal which I had already put forward was accepted in principle. The preliminary peace conference began at Paris on January 12, 1919, and the question of procedure, including that of representation, was immediately taken up by the representatives of the principal allied and associated powers, afterwards commonly known as the council of ten. At first strong objection was made to the proposed representation of the British Dominions. Subsequently there was a full discussion in the British Empire delegation at which a firm protest was made against any recession from the proposal adopted in London. In the end that proposal was accepted.

"CANADA'S REPRESENTATION.

"The adoption of the panel system gave to the Dominions a peculiarly effective position. At plenary sessions there were sometimes three Canadian plenipotentiary delegates, two as representatives of Canada and one as representative of the empire. Moreover, throughout the proceedings of the conference the Dominion delegates, as members of the British Empire delegation, were thoroughly in touch with all the proceedings of the conference and had access to all the papers recording its proceedings.

"This enabled them to watch and check those proceedings effectively in the interest of their respective dominions and placed them in a position of decided advantage. Dominion ministers were nominated to and acted for the British Empire on the principal allied commissions appointed by the conference from time to time to consider and report upon special aspects of the conditions of peace.

"On several occasions I was charged with the duty of attending as one of the British Empire representatives on the council of five. Mr. Lloyd-George called upon me to put forward before the council of four the British Empire case in respect of the clauses on economic questions, on the international control of ports, waterways, and railways, and on submarine cables. During the last month of my stay in Paris I acted regularly as chairman of the British Empire delegations in the absence of the prime minister of the United Kingdom, whose duties as a member of the council of four constantly prevented his attendance.

"A STEP FORWARD.

"It is desirable to note an important development in constitutional practice respecting the signature of the various treaties concluded at the conference. Hitherto it has been the practice to insert an article or reservation providing for the adhesion of the dominions. In view of the new position that had been secured, and of the part played by Dominion representatives at the peace table, we thought this method inappropriate and undesirable in connection with the peace treaty. Accordingly I proposed that the assent of the King as high contracting party to the various treaties should, in respect of the dominions, be signified by the signature of the Dominion plenipotentiaries, and that the preamble and other formal parts of the treaties should be drafted accordingly. This proposal was adopted in the form of a memorandum by all the Dominion prime ministers at a meeting which I summoned and was put forward by me on their behalf to the British Empire delegation, by whom it was accepted. The proposal was subsequently adopted by the conference and the various treaties have been drawn up accordingly, so that the dominions appear therein as signatories and their concurrence in the treaties is thus given in the same manner as that of other nations.

"This important constitutional development involved the issuance by the King, as high contracting party, of full powers to the various Dominion plenipotentiary delegates. In order that such powers issued to the Canadian plenipotentiaries might be based upon formal action of the Canadian Government, an order in council was passed on April 10, 1919, granting the necessary authority. Accordingly I addressed a communication to the prime minister of the United Kingdom requesting that necessary and appropriate steps should be taken to establish the connection between this order in council and the issuance of the full powers by his Majesty, so that it might formally appear of record that they were issued on the responsibility of the Government of Canada.

"CANADA AND THE LEAGUE.

"The new and definite status of the dominions at the peace conference is further manifested in the constitution of the league of nations. Since they had enjoyed the same status at the peace conference as that of minor powers, we took the ground that the dominions should be similarly accepted in the future international relationship contemplated by the league. The league of nations' commission, while inclined to accept this in principle, did not at the outset accept all its implications, as was apparent in the first draft of the covenant. This document, however, was professedly tentative. The dominions' case was pressed, and in the final form as amended and incorporated in the treaty of peace with Germany the status of the dominions as to membership and representation in the assembly and council was fully recognized.

"They are to become members as signatories of the treaty, and the terms of the document make no distinction between them and other signatory members. An official statement as to the true intent and meaning of the provisions of the covenant in that regard was secured by me and is of record in the archives of the peace conference.

"A similar question arose in respect of the constitution of the International Labor Organization. Corresponding to the council of the league, there is a labor governing body consisting of delegates nominated by a limited number of Governments. The original form of the labor convention did not adequately recognize the status of the dominions, and at the plenary session of April 11, 1919, when a resolution was proposed that the peace conference approve of the draft convention, I moved that the resolution be amended by adding a provision which authorized the drafting committee to make such amendments as were necessary to have the convention conform to the league of nations in the character of its membership and in the method of adherence. As a result the labor convention was finally amended so that the dominions were placed on the same footing as other members of the International Labor Organization, becoming eligible like others to nominate their Government delegates to the governing body.

"The recognition and status accorded to the British dominions at the peace conference were not won without constant effort and firm insistence. In all these efforts the dominions had the strong and unwavering support of the British prime minister and his colleagues. The constitutional structure of the British Empire is imperfectly understood by other nations, even by a Nation so closely allied in kinship, in language, and in the character of its institutions as the United States of America. Such lack of comprehension need excite no surprise, because the association between the mother country and the great self-governing dominions has been for years in a condition of development, and that development is not yet complete.

"FUTURE RELATIONS.

"The future relationship of the nations of the Empire must be determined in accordance with the will of the mother country and of each dominion in a constitutional conference to be summoned in the not distant future. Undoubtedly it will be based upon equality of nationhood. Each nation must preserve unimpaired its absolute autonomy, but it must likewise have its voice as to those external relations which involve the issue of peace or of war. So that the Britanic Commonwealth is in itself a community or league of nations which may serve as an exemplar to that world-wide league of nations which was founded on the 28th of last June.

"On behalf of my country I stood firmly upon this solid ground: That in this, the greatest of all wars, in which the world's liberty, the world's justice—in short, the world's future destiny—were at stake, Canada had led the democracies of both the American Continents. Her resolve had given inspiration, her sacrifices had been conspicuous, her effort was unabated to the end. The same indomitable spirit which made her capable of that effort and sacrifice made her equally incapable of accepting at the peace conference, in the league of nations or elsewhere, a status inferior to that accorded to nations less advanced in their development, less amply endowed in wealth, resources, and population, no more complete in their sovereignty, and far less conspicuous in their sacrifice."

"TELLS HOW CANADA WON EQUAL STATUS—OFFICIAL CORRESPONDENCE SHOWS STRONG FIGHT AGAINST OLD COLONIAL IDEA—VICTORY FOR BORDEN—THE CHAMPIONS OF AUTONOMY FOUND OPPOSITION FROM OLD-LINE DIPLOMATS.

"OTTAWA, September 29.

"Official correspondence tabled in Parliament this week relative to the status of Canada among the nations has aroused a great deal of interest throughout the country. Arising out of the Dominion's presence at the peace conference and the right of her Parliament to discuss and approve of the peace treaty, the correspondence affords an illuminating insight into the silent struggle between the old Downing Street doctrine of centralization and colonialism and the new claim of the Dominions to the status and responsibilities of nationhood.

"Incidentally the correspondence discloses the tremendous difficulties which Sir Robert Borden fought and overcame in achieving for Canada the status of a nation, as well as in replacing the old diplomacy with the new democracy that demands parliamentary approval before decision by the King.

"From October 27, 1918, when Lloyd-George cabled to Sir Robert Borden urging the importance of his attendance at the prospective London conferences, throughout a series of dispatches down to a few days ago, the Canadian prime minister steadfastly maintained the right of the Dominion to be represented at the peace conference and of its Parliament to discuss and approve the treaty, using language in pressing his claims which must have shocked the susceptibilities of the dilettanti diplomatists of the colonial office. Thus, in October, 1918, replying to a message from Lloyd-George, he said:

"'Certainly a very unfortunate impression would be created, and possibly a dangerous feeling may be aroused, if these difficulties (the obstacles against Canada being represented at the peace conference) are not overcome by some solution which will meet the national spirit of the Canadian people. We discussed the subject to-day in council, and I found among my own colleagues a striking insistence which doubtless is indicative of the general opinion existent in this country. In a word, they feel that the new conditions must be met by new precedents.'

"OLD DIPLOMACY FIGHTS ON.

"This question, with all that it meant to Canada in respect of her progress and development as a nation, as well as in respect to her voice and part in the making or avoiding of future wars, was a constant topic until the days when, following the signing at Versailles by the two Canadian plenipotentiaries, the Empire statesmen began returning to their homes. The old diplomacy and the old doctrine of centralization, defeated in so far as acknowledgment of the Dominion's right to have a voice in and to sign the treaty were concerned, were not prepared to give up the fight.

"And so a series of cables, dated in July and August of this year, and written by Lord Milner, secretary of state for the colonies, took the ground that the overseas ministers, having participated with those of Britain in the peace negotiations and having signed the preliminaries of the peace treaty, the King 'would have the same constitutional justification,' in ratifying the treaty 'in respect of the dominions as he has in respect of the United Kingdom.'

"In other words, one of the most salient figures in the old diplomatic and imperial centralization school argued that a group of overseas and United Kingdom ministers meeting and deliberating in secret might make whatever treaties affecting peace and war they chose, and these needed ratification only by his Majesty the King, and not by the Parliaments of the self-governing peoples of the Empire. The fact that these ministers might be completely out of touch or harmony with public feeling in their countries would not matter, according to this Milner idea.

"SIR ROBERT BORDEN'S STAND.

"Sir Robert Borden, intensely nationalist and an uncompromising champion of Canadian autonomy, vigorously challenged this view, declaring, in a message dated July 29, 1919, that 'there is considerable doubt whether, under modern constitutional practices, the King should ratify without first obtaining the approval of Parliament.' He especially differed from the view that the signature of the dominion's ministers to the peace treaty was equivalent to advice to ratify, asking the pertinent question: 'Do you regard this as holding good in the case of the signature of the United Kingdom plenipotentiaries?'

"There were afterwards messages from Lord Milner showing indirectly that his view was unchanged, one of them saying that 'severe pressure being put upon us from Paris' made it impossible that ratification could be held back after September 17. To this Sir Robert Borden replied, on August 4, that Parliament was called for September 1, adding: 'I can not emphasize too strongly the unfortunate results which would certainly ensue from ratification before the Canadian Parliament has had an opportunity of considering the treaty.'

"Happily there were delays on the part of the other powers, and the British Empire was among the first to ratify the treaty, thus avoiding what might have been an awkward situation. A similar difficulty, however, may arise at any time. In that event there is no question that the people of Canada would undoubtedly be a solid unit for the position taken by Sir Robert Borden, namely, that in matters of peace or war which affect this country the decision must rest, not with the King or with the British cabinet, but with the Parliament of Canada."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, a few days ago I introduced into the RECORD a memorial addressed to my colleague [Mr. EDGE] and myself asking us to oppose the league of nations in its present form. That memorial was signed by the chief justice of the supreme court, the justices of all of the three higher courts, the court of errors and appeals, the supreme court, and the circuit court, and by several thousand prominent citizens of the State of New Jersey, manufacturers, bankers, lawyers, all engaged in active pursuits in New Jersey. I now have, supplementary to that, several hundred names added to that memorial, which I ask may be filed with the memorial presented by me a few days ago.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I ask permission to have inserted in the RECORD a resolution to the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Pittsburgh, Pa., relating to labor representation in the pending labor conference.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PITTSBURGH, PA., September 30, 1919.

To the BOARD OF DIRECTORS,
Chamber of Commerce of Pittsburgh.

GENTLEMEN: To your committee on manufacturing and mining has been submitted a communication received from Dr. Vernon W. Peck, addressed to Mr. William M. Furey, vice president, calling attention to the general situation of the country, the personnel of the conference to be held in Washington in October, and the necessity for some protection of the interests of labor in general and the great mass of American people.

Your committee has given this subject very serious thought, and now begs to submit for your consideration and action the following, namely:

"Whereas the President has called a conference to be held at Washington on October 6 'for the purpose of discussing the labor situation in the country and the possibility of formulating plans for the development of a new relationship between capital and labor,' and as this call states that 'there will be 22 representatives of the general public and an equivalent number of representatives of various bodies of organized employees'; and

"Whereas it is well known that the number of employees in this country who are not organized greatly exceed those who belong to labor organizations, it seems to us unfair and unwise that labor representatives should be confined to those who are connected with such organizations; and

"Whereas we feel that the great body of workmen who are not affiliated with organized labor, who faithfully served the Nation in its time of need, should be recognized in such a gathering as is contemplated in the President's call. Such men are in a position to consider the problems of the employer from the standpoint of the actual worker rather than that of the organizer who is not engaged in actual labor:

"We therefore respectfully and earnestly protest against the constitution of this conference so far as labor is concerned, inasmuch as it does not fairly represent the labor of the United States.

"The importance of this is emphasized by our experience in this district during and since the late World War. No large industrial district in the Nation has such an enviable record of large production, freedom from strikes, and industrial unrest as the Pittsburgh district. This is to a large extent, we believe, due to the fact that perhaps in no similar district approaching it in size is there so small a proportion of workers identified with labor organizations. Notwithstanding this, in no similar district were the workmen better paid, better treated, or more prosperous.

"There is a very large number of intelligent, industrious, conservative, and patriotic workmen all over the country who are capable of considering the questions which will come before such a conference in a broad, unselfish, and statesmanlike spirit, and who by their experience can materially aid in settling the questions that now confront us.

"We suggest that if a definite number of delegates were allotted to certain districts or trades to represent the workmen affiliated with each other in these trades or in the manufacture of special products, but not included in any of the accredited labor unions or federations, an equitable selection could be made by a popular vote taken in each company or plant during working hours, the final representatives being selected by these electors from among their own number."

Respectfully submitted.

THE COMMITTEE ON MANUFACTURING AND MINING.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, a few days ago the League to Enforce Peace, which is merely a branch of the English league which was organized in 1911 or 1912, sent out this telegram:

Crisis at hand will determine whether America joins league of nations or forsakes allies and negotiates separate peace with Germany. Vote for any reservations may require resubmission and endanger treaty. Will you join 99 others in giving $1,000 each to League to Enforce Peace, William H. Taft, President, for immediate use in arousing the country to demand prompt ratification in form that will not send treaty back for further negotiations and delay world pacification? Matter very urgent.

GEORGE W. WICKERSHAM,
CLEVELAND H. DODGE,
OSCAR S. STRAUS,
VANCE MCCORMICK,
HERBERT S. HOUSTON,
Finance Committee, League to Enforce Peace.

Mr. President, at the time that was sent out I stated publicly that this money would be used for the purpose of misleading and misrepresenting and corrupting public opinion; corrupting it by using money to deceive the people as to facts concerning this league. Since that time I have had ample proof of the fact that that is the way in which they have been utilizing this fund.

I have in my hand an editorial from the St. Paul Dispatch of October 1, which is known to be an advocate of the league. It says:

MUST HAVE MONEY TO BURN.

The war chest of the League to Enforce Peace must be full to overflowing when its Washington bureau feels justified in dipping into its funds to the extent of prepaying long-wire messages to the leading newspapers of the country utilizing Senate debates for propaganda purposes. Last night, for example, the bureau forwarded to the Pioneer Press, prepaid, a judiciously selected excerpt from the debate between Senators HITCHCOCK and FALL—a thousand-word narrative skillfully arranged to lay emphasis upon the defense of President Wilson by the administration mouthpiece in the Senate and the arraignment of that body for its delay in disposing of the Versailles treaty.

This rather clever piece of propaganda was not used by the Pioneer Press to replace the story from its own Washington bureau, which carried the Senate debate unemasculated and uncolored by treatment. We have no quarrel with the League to Enforce Peace. On the contrary, we find much with which to sympathize in its campaign to create sentiment for the treaty—with interpretative reservations, of course—and to secure the least possible delay in disposing of it. But that is not inconsistent with declining its propaganda and with wondering what must be the extent and source of its financial resources that permit an expenditure so generous. The league must literally have money to burn.

Mr. President, I have seen the arranged debates, or some of them, which have been sent out by the League to Enforce Peace to the press of the country, uncalled for by the press, and paid for by the league, and no Senator reviewing those debates would contend for a moment that the man who arranged them did so with an honest intention of conveying to the country the true facts in regard to what is taking place here.

I have not the slightest objection, Mr. President, to these men who can command their millions sending out their propaganda if they send it in accordance with any rule of decent observance of an honest intention to convey the real facts to the American people. But I here upon the floor of the Senate take the opportunity of saying that this propaganda is tainted by a premeditated, deliberate dishonesty, and a clear purpose to mislead the American people. The men who are sending out these arranged and manipulated reports of debates intend to deceive the people of this country. I have had many letters, some from other publishers, complaining of the method which the league has employed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, it would be quite interesting, though insignificant, to determine who is furnishing the money for propaganda upon both sides of this question. It is to be presumed that those who are furnishing the money for propaganda in favor of the league of nations are Americans. I suspect maybe that if a full investigation were made it would be found that those who are furnishing the money for the antagonistic propaganda are a great many of them not Americans.

As to whether or not some newspapers have published reports of debates in the Senate that did not contain the full debate, I am not prepared to say, but very frequently that does happen upon every great public question. A Republican paper in an ordinary tariff debate publishes that part of the debate which suits the Republican Party, and a Democratic paper publishes that part of it that suits the Democratic Party, and I suppose that course is being pursued now on both sides in connection with this new alignment of Senate forces, which is not partisan, but which is at least pro and anti. I suspect that if the Senator were to look with equal microscopic attention at the reports that have gone to the papers which represent his side of this controversy he might find that they were, if not unfair, at least not full, too. I do not doubt that now and then any advocate of any cause is unfair, and that any opponent of any cause is also unfair, but this labored attempt to show that there is an immense amount of money behind the league of nations and that there is no money behind this almost universal propaganda against it is weak and must fall by the board.

Whence the money comes I neither know nor care. I do, however, admit that any American citizen has a right to contribute to the distribution of literature in favor of any cause that he advocates or against any cause that he opposes.

It would be quite interesting to know where the traveling expenses and railroad bills and hotel bills and printing bills of various gentlemen who have been opposing the league of nations have come from. I do not know and do not care. If the argument which is sent through the mails is sound and correct and appeals to the reason of the American people, it does not make much difference to me how it happened to get there; and if the man who is making a speech has his expenses paid by Tom, Dick, or Harry, I do not care much for that either, provided he is expressing his honest opinion and is not bought; and I do not believe that charge could be made against either side.

The Senator must remember that "people in glass houses ought not to throw stones." I expect that some of that part of the American public which is in favor of the league of nations is giving its time, its tongue, its energy, and its money to that cause, and that some of those, whether native or hyphenated, who are opposed to it, are giving their time, their tongue, and their money to oppose it. If there is any charge of corruption of any sort to be made by the Senator, the matter ought to be investigated by Congress, and he ought to introduce a resolution to investigate it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I did not complain that these men were sending out their literature. I simply stated that upon the statement of the paper, an advocate of the league, and upon other facts, they were manipulating the record here which they were sending out. I have seen some of the material in addition, which has been sent to me, which, I say, has been so arranged as to convey a false view. I have no objection at all to their sending out the full debate of the able Senator from Mississippi or any other Senator who is advocating the league, or any part of it—not in the least.

The Senator says that those who live in glass houses should not throw stones. I presume he had reference to the fact that the Senator from Idaho has been out over the country speaking against the league, and that, perhaps, somebody was paying his expenses.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not mean that personally; but there have been a thousand of you out talking.

Mr. BORAH. I beg to say that the Senator from Idaho has, with trivial exceptions—which I will be glad to furnish those interested—borne his own expenses. I wish I had more time and more money to spend in that way. I say again that it is not because men are out speaking for or against the league or because literature is sent out that I object. I object to a studied effort to misrepresent the issue. I know that resolutions have been introduced here purporting to come from an organization which was never adopted in the form in which it was presented here.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That ought to be exposed.

Mr. BORAH. I have exposed it once. I read the resolution here, and I read the statement of those who adopted it, which said that the resolution which they adopted was a condemnation of this league; that the resolution was sent to them by the League to Enforce Peace, and that was rejected; that they adopted another, which was a condemnation of the league, but it was sent here as an indorsement of the league.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I also received communications saying that certain resolutions coming from the Pacific slope, signed as coming from certain societies, and so forth, had never come from the societies and the societies had never held any meetings. I did not know whether the statements made to me were true or not; they came for the most part from people whom I did not know. It may be true that various resolutions against the league have come here signed by a certain society when there was no society meeting held. That merely makes it important that Senators should be careful to see that what they furnish to the Senate as food for thought shall be something which they themselves believe to be thoroughly authentic; that is all.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, this discussion brings up a practice which some of the States have established which I think could be advantageously adopted by the Senate of the United States. Some of the States have a publicity pamphlet in which the proponents may set forth the claims which they think justify their attitude and in which the opponents, by properly authorized representation, may set forth what they think justifies the contrary view.

If we had a publicity pamphlet, where those in favor of the league could make their statements, with the opposing views in the same pamphlet, it could be economically distributed throughout the country, and in that way the citizens would have an authoritative view on both sides, instead of these partisan or partial views, each one sending out a view of his own, or permitting individuals who may have an interest, either patriotic or otherwise, to undertake to send out statements which are false on either side.

I take this occasion to call the attention of the Senate to the advantages that would flow upon the establishment of a publicity pamphlet, where questions of this character might be economically sent out to the country, with an authorized statement of the opposing views.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. BECKHAM presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Richmond, Ky., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Jones bill, providing for the marking of cost and retail prices of all articles for sale, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. PHELAN presented petitions of sundry citizens of San Francisco, Oakland, Berkeley, and Piedmont, all in the State of California, praying for the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. KENDRICK. I present a resolution adopted by 63 members of Local Union No. 1807, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, of Graybull, Wyo., regarding the proposed league of nations, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"We, the undersigned citizens of Greybull, Wyo., realizing the responsibilities of our citizenship regarding the great question embodied in the proposed league of nations;

"That peace might be established for all time, and now being considered by the Senate of the United States;

"We feel we would be derelict in our duty if we did not express our disapproval of the report of the Foreign Relations Committee on this great question;

"While we believe a few reservations might be desirable and meet with the approval of the American people, we can not but feel that 4 reservations and 40 amendments, as proposed by your committee, would so macerate that great document as to make it null and void; and

"We recognize in the American Federation of Labor the most effective organization opposed to Bolshevism in this country to-day, and we therefore especially protest against the proposed amendment by Senator FALL, of New Mexico, to eliminate the labor section from the league covenant. This amendment would be a repudiation of the recognized loyalty of organized labor during the war and could only have the effect of driving all labor into radicalism.

"Resolution carried, 63 members.

"[SEAL.] "UNITED BROTHERHOOD OF CARPENTERS AND JOINERS OF AMERICA,

"L. L. BISSELL, President.

"W. M. RADLER, Recording Secretary."

Mr. CAPPER presented a memorial of Local Lodge No. 87, Brotherhood of Railway Carmen, of Horton, Kans., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Cummins bill, providing for private ownership and control of railroads, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Dickinson County, Kans., praying for the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PAGE presented a petition of Local Division No. 1, Ancient Order of Hibernians, of Rutland, Vt., praying for the independence of Ireland, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. McNARY:

A bill (S. 3191) to provide for the national welfare by assuring an adequate supply of sugar for the people of the United States for the year ending December 31, 1920, conserving the supply of sugar, and controlling the distribution thereof; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

By Mr. KEYES:

A bill (S. 3192) for the relief of the legal representatives of George W. Soule; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. SHIELDS:

A bill (S. 3193) to authorize the Tennessee Bridge Co., a corporation chartered under the laws of the State of Tennessee, to construct a bridge across the Tennessee River near Loudon, Tenn.; to the Committee on Commerce.

A bill (S. 3194) granting an increase of pension to Erastus A. Kelly; and

A bill (S. 3195) granting a pension to John Gentry (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CALDER:

A bill (S. 3196) fixing the compensation of United States customs inspectors; and

A bill (S. 3197) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the lading or unlading of vessels at night, the preliminary entry of vessels, and for other purposes," approved February 13, 1911; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. JONES of Washington:

A bill (S. 3198) granting an increase of pension to William S. Davidson (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. HARDING:

A bill (S. 3199) granting an increase of pension to Edward E. Gould; and

A bill (S. 3200) granting an increase of pension to William F. Slack; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CALDER:

A bill (S. 3201) fixing the salary of the district attorney for the eastern district of New York; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A bill (S. 3202) granting leave of absence to officers of the United States Coast Guard, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

AMENDMENT TO FIRST DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. JONES of Washington submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $17,000,000 to carry out the provisions of the act approved March 12, 1914, relative to the location, construction, and operation of railroads in the Territory of Alaska, as amended, including expenses incident to conducting hearings and examining estimates for appropriations in Alaska, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the first deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

INCREASED PAY OF POSTAL EMPLOYEES.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res.

151) to provide additional compensation for employees of the Postal Service, and making an appropriation therefor.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which had been reported from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads with an amendment to strike out all after the resolving clause and insert a substitute.

The Secretary proceeded to read the substitute.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment. Shall I do it now or at the end of the reading of the entire amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment had better be read first.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the amendment of the committee, which is as follows:

That because of the unusual conditions which now exist, the compensation provided for in the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920," approved February 28, 1919, the following classes of employees shall be increased as follows for such fiscal year:

(a) Postmasters at offices of the third class, assistant postmasters, and clerks, including special clerks, finance clerks, bookkeepers, and other employees of offices of the first and second class, letter carriers in the City Delivery Service, carriers in the village delivery service, employees in Government-owned automobile service, supervisory officials, railway postal clerks, including substitutes, and the assistant agent and clerks at the postal stamp agency, Dayton, Ohio, who receive compensation at the rate per annum of—

(1) $1,000, to be increased $240.
(2) $1,100 or $1,200, to be increased $200.
(3) $1,300, $1,400, $1,500, or $1,600, to be increased $150.
(4) Not less than $1,700 nor more than $2,500, to be increased $100.

(b) Printers, mechanics, and skilled laborers who receive compensation at the rate per annum of—

(1) $1,150, to be increased $150.
(2) $1,265, to be increased $135.
(3) $1,380, to be increased $70.

(c) Watchmen, messengers, and laborers who receive compensation at the rate per annum of—

(1) $1,035, to be increased $205.

(d) Clerks at division headquarters of post-office inspectors who receive compensation at the rate per annum of—

(1) $1,035, to be increased $205.
(2) $1,150, to be increased $150.
(3) $1,380, to be increased $70.
(4) $1,540, to be increased $110
(5) $1,700, to be increased $40.
(6) $1,980, to be increased $20.

(e) Superintendents, requisition fillers, packers, and laborers who receive compensation at the rate per annum of—

(1) $1,150, to be increased $150.
(2) $1,540, to be increased $110.

(f) Rural letter carriers on daily routes and rural letter carriers on two triweekly routes whose routes are—

(1) Eleven miles or less in length, to be increased $75.
(2) Over 11 miles and under 20 miles in length, to be increased $100.
(3) Over 20 miles and under 24 miles in length, to be increased $150.
(4) Twenty-four miles or over in length, to be increased $200.

(g) Rural letter carriers on triweekly routes of—

(1) Eleven miles or less in length, to be increased $37.50.
(2) Over 11 miles and under 20 miles in length, to be increased $50.
(3) Over 20 miles and under 24 miles in length, to be increased $75.
(4) Over 24 miles in length, to be increased $100.

(h) Messengers at postal-stamp agency, Dayton, Ohio, who receive compensation at the rate per annum of—

(1) $840, to be increased $160.

(i) Postmasters at offices of the fourth class to be increased by an amount equal to 10 per cent of their present compensation.

(j) Substitute, temporary, and auxiliary clerks at first and second class post offices, and substitute, temporary, and auxiliary letter carriers in the City Delivery Service shall receive during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, in lieu of their present compensation, a compensation of 60 cents per hour for each hour of service performed.

SEC. 2. That increases in compensation herein provided shall, as to officers, employees, and substitute, temporary, and auxiliary employees in the Postal Service at the time of the passage of this act, be effective as of July 1, 1919, or as of the date since that when such officers or employees entered the Postal Service; but none of the increases provided herein shall be applicable to officers and employees who have received an increase in their compensation of more than $300 per annum during the current fiscal year.

SEC. 3 That no post office shall be advanced to the next higher class as a result of the increases in compensation of postmasters herein provided.

SEC. 4. That in order to provide for the increased compensation herein authorized, so much as is necessary is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to supplement the amounts appropriated for the various classes of employees herein mentioned, in the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920," approved February 28, 1919.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, on yesterday I took the liberty to read a telegram from the postmaster of the city of Cleveland bearing on the conditions in that post office. I have similar telegrams from the postmasters of Cincinnati, Columbus, Toledo, Dayton, Youngstown, Akron, Canton, Springfield, Portsmouth, Zanesville, and a number of other of the smaller cities of Ohio which tell substantially the same story. It is a physical impossibility for the postmasters, clerks, and carriers to keep up the post-office system with that degree of efficiency which we all desire and which the public deserves unless some attention is given to the welfare of these employees. The resignations alone from these several offices are sufficient to cripple the service. I am not going to take the time to read these telegrams, but I am going to give some of the information which I have had my clerk tabulate.

In Akron there were 26 resignations from the clerical force during the last year and 112 carriers. In Canton 5 regular clerks and 6 regular carriers resigned. In Cincinnati 40 regular clerks, 11 substitute clerks, 5 regular carriers, and 3 substitute carriers resigned. In Cleveland 54 regular clerks, 425 temporary clerks, 59 regular carriers, and 481 temporary carriers resigned. In Columbus 28 regular clerks, 5 substitute clerks, 31 temporary clerks, 5 regular carriers, 11 substitute carriers, and 3 temporary carriers resigned. In Dayton there were 90 resignations out of 230 employees; in Portsmouth 12 resignations out of a total of 32 employees; in Springfield resignations of 12 regular employees and numerous temporary employees; in Toledo resignations of 40 regular employees, 24 substitutes, 121 temporaries, or 60 per cent of the total employees; in Youngstown resignations of 20 regular clerks and 13 regular carriers; in Zanesville 2 resignations, others too long in service to accept other employment. The total resignations in these offices are 122 regular clerks, 16 substitute clerks, 456 temporary clerks, 69 regular carriers, 14 substitute carriers, and 484 temporary carriers, and nearly all of them because of the insufficient pay of these servants of the public.

I have before me an editorial in the Cleveland Press as to conditions as they exist in that city. I want to read just two or three short paragraphs from the editorial, because it confirms the information which I have just given to the Senate:

Scores of bags bursting with mail lie unopened for days at a time in the Cleveland post office. This condition is common throughout the country. Newspapers traveling between Cincinnati and Cleveland, for instance, arrive from 5 to 10 days late.

Another paragraph:

Low wages and the difficulty of getting ahead have caused many experienced postal workers to seek other work and are keeping men from entering the post-office service.

At the civil service—

And I call this matter especially to the attention of Senators who are interested—

At the civil-service post-office examinations in Cleveland a fortnight ago there were 28 applicants. Twelve hundred took the examination in November, 1916.

That tells the story. The compensation is not sufficient to get live, wide-awake capable men into the service. The marvel to me is that there have not been more resignations. If I may state a little experience that I had in my own city just a few months ago, I met one of our carriers at the foot of the elevator shaft in the building in which I have my office. He had an enormous pack of mail and I was curious enough to ask him how many pounds he had. He then had 95 pounds that he was carrying in his pack, and he said that sometimes he had even more. That is burden enough to kill a man, but the postmaster is compelled to weigh down the carriers because he can not get additional carriers who are needed for the good of the service.

In practically every branch of the public service and every branch of private service in which the Government has been either directly or indirectly interested there have been enormous increases in pay. Strikes have been threatened in order to force these increases. The mail carriers and clerks have not struck, and they ought not under any circumstances to strike. But, on the other hand, the Congress of the United States ought to be liberal enough with this class of employees so that they would not be tempted to strike. There are two sides to that proposition and two duties, one on the part of the employees and another on the part of Congress.

Now, what shall these increases be? And I shall take only a moment further. I sent out a number of telegrams to these different postmasters asking their suggestions as to what the increases should be, and I got very frank replies. Some of them made their estimate on a percentage basis, and those who thus expressed themselves said that the increase should be from 30 to 35 per cent. Others of these postmasters made suggestions as to increases in lump sums, and they vary from $150 to $300 and over, none of them below $150.

As I understand the joint resolution, the Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads has dealt somewhat more liberally with the employees than did the House. I am glad of that. I will very frankly say that in certain particulars if I had been framing the bill, knowing the situation as I do in Ohio, I would have added somewhat to the increases which are proposed by the committee; but I shall accept the committee's judgment in that behalf because I understand in their judgment, all things considered, it is the best that can be done.

Every man, woman, and child in the country is interested in maintaining the efficiency of this service. We can not get live, alert men unless we give them a living wage. I hope there will be little or no opposition to the proposed increase.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, in support of the views of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] and of the bill reported by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, I ask leave to print as a portion of my remarks a carefully prepared statement from the post-office clerks of the State of Washington presented to the joint commission on postal salaries by Mr. J. H. Mitcham, of Spokane, Wash., a postal clerk himself, which makes a comparison that is enlightening in the consideration of this question, between the increases in the cost of living and the increases which have been made in the salaries of the postal employees.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Memorandum respectfully submitted by the post-office clerks of the State of Washington by J. H. Mitcham, of Spokane.

To the JOINT COMMISSION ON POSTAL SALARIES:

The purpose of this report is to show what the existing working conditions are at the present time in the first and second class post offices of the State of Washington, and also to show what the increase in the cost of living has been in this State from 1913 to 1919, and the amount of increase the clerks have received during the same time.

The principal characteristic of the following is to establish a higher permanent salary classification for the employees so that they can reasonably meet the increase in the cost of living. We also believe that a higher rate should be paid to all permanent employees. The continual shifting of temporary employees is the chief obstacle to efficient office help and a detriment to the service.

Under the present system, employees have to serve for some time as temporary clerks or substitute clerks before they are appointed as regular clerks. The salaries paid to these temporary employees are not sufficient to support them; and, consequently, in many offices of the State we have a complete turnover of substitute help every 45 days. Experience has convinced us that these clerks should be paid a higher salary, as the result will be of benefit to the department. The department would receive the benefit of experienced employees, while the employees' interest in the work would be stimulated, and the added responsibility would increase self-respect. There would be more cooperation between different divisions and branches of the service which is sadly lacking at present.

"Wages have increased 107 per cent in four years, since March, 1915," according to a statement compiled by the New York State industrial commission. "Business chronicle of the Pacific Northwest, June 14, 1919."

The average wage increase of post-office clerks have been but 15.4 per cent during the same time.

In regard to the existing condition existing in the State of Washington, we wish to submit the following for your information, from Seattle and Spokane:

SEATTLE.

Number of regular clerks, July 1, 1918	253
Number of regular clerks, July 1, 1919	285
Overtime clerks, July 1, 1918, to June 30, 1919, inclusive:
Terminal station ---hours---	10,155
Main office ---do---	18,603
Stations ---do---	2,252
Total ---do---	31,010
Amount paid	$13,896.66
Equal to practically 13 men for 1 year at $1,000.
Amount paid in addition to above:
Temporary substitute clerks, July 1, 1918, to June 30, 1919, inclusive	80,963.70
Regular substitute clerks, July 1, 1918, to June 30, 1919, inclusive	20,491.10
Total	101,454.80
Equal to 101 clerks at $1,000 per annum.

SPOKANE.

Number of regular clerks, July 1, 1918	92
Number of regular clerks, July 1, 1919	93
Overtime regular clerks, July 1, 1918, to June 30, 1919, approximately ---hours---	5,133
Amount paid	$2,294.43
Equal to 2 men for 1 year at $1,000.
Temporary substitute clerks, July 1, 1918, to June 30, 1919 ---hours---	9,726
Amount	$3,890.40

Taking these figures as a basis, it will be seen that if a higher permanent classification salary is paid all concerned would be benefited thereby and would serve to bring them into more harmonious relations with each other.

From the evidence submitted to us in reference to the increase of the cost of living in the State of Washington, we conclude as follows:

(a) A glance at the following statistics will show that there has been an approximate increase of 102 per cent from January, 1913, to July, 1919, for all commodities:

Wholesale prices.

[Issued by U. S. Department of Labor.]

	1913	1914	1915	1916	1917	1918	1919
Farm products	100	101	102	108	147	205	220
Food	100	102	106	114	150	188	204
Clothes	100	99	96	110	161	209	231
Fuel and light	100	99	86	102	170	169	181
Metal products	100	92	83	126	183	173	172
Building material	100	98	94	99	106	136	160
Chemicals and drugs	100	101	106	140	144	216	179
House furnishings	100	103	101	105	128	188	233
Miscellaneous	100	98	98	107	137	178	206
All commodities	100	100	98	110	150	185	202

(b) According to the latest and most authentic advices and report that were recently received at this office from the Department of Labor, of Washington, D. C., and from the University of Washington, who have made a very thorough investigation of the increase of the cost of living, the State of Washington will show that since the year 1913 the cost of foodstuffs has advanced 100 per cent. During the past year alone food increased 14 per cent. Since December, 1915, there has been an average increase of 120 per cent in the cost of wearing apparel.

(c) We desire to call your attention to the subject of night work in post offices. This affects the clerks rather than the carriers. In the divisions where mail is distributed, and to a lesser extent in other departments, clerks are required to begin and finish their hours of duty at all hours of the day and night. Approximately two-thirds of the workers in the mailing and city distribution sections begin their hours of duty from 2 p. m. to 3.30 p. m., finishing work from 10.30 p. m. to midnight. There is also a small number required to work from midnight to 8.30 a. m.

These workers are compelled to work largely by artificial light, causing eyestrain and the early necessity of wearing glasses. Moreover, the unnatural hours cause them to become easy prey to sickness and disease. These hours also thrust the responsibilities of family life upon the wife; children are deprived of the care and guidance which a father could give, for the father sees them only when they are asleep, or on Sundays, if he has that day free from his work. So, many children fail to develop into good citizens through lack of training which only a father can give. Heads of families find that these hours cause additional expense of light, heat, and fuel, owing to the necessity of preparing meals for the postal worker separately from the rest of the family.

We would recommend that all the employees of the Postal Service who are required to work between the hours of 6 p. m. and 6 a. m. be given a time differential by which 45 minutes shall be credited as an hour for all work performed between 6 p. m. and 6 a. m.

(d) House rent in the city of Seattle is now beyond the limits of the possible. There are practically no houses to rent, and the rent has increased to such an extent as to make it a matter of public concern.

In Spokane house rents have increased 30 per cent from July 1, 1918, to July 1, 1919, and have increased 20 per cent from July 1, 1919, to the present time, making a total increase of 50 per cent from July 1, 1918, to September 15, 1919.

We have pointed out to you briefly the materials that have soared higher, and we ask you to give us a higher permanent salary classification that will enable us to live as American citizens and bring up our children under American standards of living. The fact is that $2,500 a year will not permit an employee to save any money under the present cost of living. The University of Washington has scaled the matter down as fine as it can be done, and it allows $2,004.79 as the minimum amount to support a family of five. The Government demands of its employees a certain standard of living. Can the Government afford to demand of its employees those things when it does not provide sufficient wages to pay the cost?

We therefore earnestly urge the fixing of a higher classification: such an award will bear the fruit of tranquil and efficient service and of industrial peace for all concerned.

Respectfully submitted by the post-office clerks of the State of Washington, through J. H. Mitcham, of Spokane, Wash.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I believe that the merit of the amendment of the Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads to the joint resolution as passed by the House consists in a recognition of a greater need for an increase of the low classes of employees than those of the higher classes, a nicer discrimination, a more special gradation of the proposed increases with a consequent better adaptation to the respective needs of the different classes of the employees. For that reason I am glad to support the measure, and I am particularly glad to take this opportunity to express my compliments and my gratitude to the postal employees as a class for the manner in which they have conducted themselves and their organization during the critical times the country has been through in the last year or more.

I say this particularly in view of the contrast that has appeared between the patriotic attitude of the postal employees as compared with the unpatriotic and dangerous attitude that has been taken by many other classes of employees as is shown by the epidemic of strikes from which the country has been and now is suffering. Those strikes were for the deliberate purpose of cutting off production, embarrassing production, and creating suffering, and have not been confined to peace times. Many of them were precipitated when the country was facing the crisis of a great war, in which its independence was at stake and of which those who are responsible for the the cessation of essential industries caused by strikes seemed to be perfectly indifferent to the outcome of the war and to the consequences upon the Nation. During all that time the postal employees made no complaint; they redoubled their efforts under disadvantageous circumstances, inadequate force, and inadequate facilities, and they are deserving of the good will and favorable consideration of Congress and the country.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I have conferred with the men employed in the Post Office Department on many occasions and have directly heard the story of their difficult position in trying to live and support their families on the wages that have been granted by the Government. I am much pleased to see here to-day that there is no serious opposition to the joint resolution presented by the committee, which in a measure meets their demands.

I have been of the opinion since my knowledge of Washington became more intimate, that the public servants are, I may say, not adequately compensated; that in no branch of the Government service are they adequately compensated, and that was before the pressure of the high cost of living made it almost a necessity for the Government as a measure of relief to give increased pay in the form of temporary bonuses to the public servants.

Holding that position, I am very glad to support the joint resolution.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, it is my purpose to support the joint resolution. From my understanding of conditions I have thought that this class of employees and the third and fourth class postmasters are the poorest paid of any officials and employees in the Government service. I understand, however, that an increase of $100 was allowed to these employees on July 1 and that the old bonus of $200 allowed last year is continued into this year. This joint resolution will make an additional increase of whatever the percentage is.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. KIRBY. Yes.

Mr. KING. For information, I desire to ask, am I to understand that those who are to be the beneficiaries under this joint resolution will receive $150, or whatever amount is granted under this bill, and, in addition to that and their regular salaries, receive $100 and $200 more?

Mr. KIRBY. I understand that in addition to their regular salary they received an increase of $100 on the 1st of July; that the old bonus of $200 of last year is still continued on their salaries; and that they also receive this additional increase over all that amount.

Mr. KING. That will be $450 more.

Mr. KIRBY. I do not know what the aggregate is.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will yield, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee whether the understanding of the Senator from Arkansas is correct, that those who are to be the beneficiaries of this joint resolution get, first, the compensation which is allowed them by law; second, a $200 bonus; third, the $100 increase provided in some law heretofore passed and which became operative on the 1st of July of this year; and then the amount provided in this bill, which is not less than $150; so that would be, in addition to their salaries, $450 plus to every person in the Postal Service?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah is confused with reference to what the employees now get in the Postal Service.

Mr. KIRBY. The Senator from Utah does not state their compensation as I myself understand it to be.

Mr. TOWNSEND. No. I shall be very glad to answer the Senator's question, if he will put it to me.

Mr. KIRBY. I understand that on July 1 an increase of $100 was granted to these employees; I understand, further, that the sum of $200, the bonus of last year, is still continued, which would be $300, in addition to whatever percentage is allowed by this bill.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is correct, except that not all of these employees received the $100 increase, because that was allowed only in connection with regular promotions; that was a part of their salary.

Mr. KIRBY. That was my understanding.

Now, Mr. President, to discuss this matter a little further——

Mr. POMERENE. Those promotions, as I understand, depended upon the length of service as well as upon the record of efficiency of the employees.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The promotions have embraced only a portion of the employees; there never has been any law providing that all clerks who have even served the same length of time should be promoted; those promoted have averaged from 60 to 75 per cent of the number of employees, the selection to be made by the department for efficiency. Those promotions were suspended for one year. This year they have been restored, but still the employees are lacking one year's promotion. We are taking the compensation which they are now receiving under the existing law and increasing it by the amount fixed in the joint resolution, provided that during the year no employee has received an increase in excess of $300.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, to discuss this matter a little further, I desire to say that when the shopmen's strike was pending I received a letter on the subject from a bank cashier who lived in a substantial town in my State. He said, "I went down to discuss this strike with a car repairer at the junction here; I discovered that he had quit work when he was receiving $3,600 a year—$300 a month." I thought that must be a mistake; but that is what the bank cashier wrote me. He further said, "No man in our bank has ever received more than $2,000 a year salary whether he be president, cashier, or occupied any other position. We live in the same town in which this other man lives, and the same high cost of living overshadows us as it does the other man." Therefore the writer of the letter did not seem to have much sympathy for a strike under those conditions.

Now, let us go a little further. The soldier has come back from service overseas, where he went to serve his country, daily risking his life that we here might live in safety. He got but $30 a month and his board. We have raised the salaries of all Government employees—first $120; last year, after the war was over, we made the increase $240 a year, and now it is proposed as to postal employees that they shall have this additional increase. I am not saying that it is wrong, but when the soldiers come to us and say that they ought to have five or six months' extra pay, amounting in all to about $150, shall we say "No." Where is there any justice in that, under the conditions as they now exist, when the man who risked his life for his country got but $30 a month and has come home broke? We gave him but $60, and shall we say, "That is the end of it with you"? Then the profiteer who had done well at home while the soldier was fighting for us all charged him about $46 for a $19 suit and left him another ground-floor start in life.

There ought to be some equality in the treatment of Government employees and of those who served the Government in its time of need. I am going to support this bill, for probably it is necessary that what it proposes should be done. I do not think there are more resignations from the Postal Service, however, in any of the cities than there have been from other business of like kind; and probably such resignations are due to the shortage of labor and the consequent increased demand for workmen. I do not think these employees will be getting more than they are worth when this increase is granted to them; but when the time comes, I think the other proposition which I have stated in regard to the soldiers ought to be remembered.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, at the proper time I shall ask for the consideration of an amendment consisting of the insertion of the word "only," after the word "year," on line 2 of page 3 of the joint resolution.

I have no doubt the committee has considered this joint resolution very carefully, and of course that involves the consideration of the reasons for the proposed increase in salaries. They have, after mature deliberation, proposed an amendment which increases the annual expenditures of the Government by something near $40,000,000. They know more than I do about the situation and the need for some readjustment of salaries and compensation of post-office employees; but I do not think that the members of the committee can be more observant than I of the general conditions applicable to this and all similar measures which we can not ignore and which will persist regardless of remedial legislation of this sort.

This is one of a series of progressive measures designed to enable the beneficiaries to overtake the high cost of living. It is a governmental experiment paralleling private experiments of similar character begun even before the war and still in operation. The theory is that when the high cost of living rises an increase in compensation will cure the difficulty by equalizing income and outgo. The fact is that these increases are not even palliatives of the evil. Their only effect is to accelerate further increases in all commodity prices. That has been recognized by organizations which on several occasions have demanded higher wages and received them. It has been conceded by the representatives of the railroad brotherhoods as being no palliative whatever but only as justifying—perhaps I should say as inevitably causing—a corresponding rise in the price of all commodities, and particularly those which are necessary to existence.

This $40,000,000, for all the good that it will do those who receive it, might just as well be taken to a crematory and thrown into the fire. This $40,000,000, Mr. President, will pass through the hands of those who receive the fund from the Government into the hands of those who supply them with their daily requirements, and consequently it will be succeeded by other bills of similar character, designed for the same purpose, and which will be enacted only to have the same result. The spectacle of the kitten chasing its own tail can be understood. The kitten is exercising and enjoying itself, interfering with nobody but amusing all. The spectacle of the American Congress taking that interesting object lesson, however, as a precedent for legislation, at the cost of millions of dollars to the taxpayers of the United States, is deplorable. When the kitten catches its tail Uncle Sam will seize the little end of the difficulty and hold it about as long.

If the salaries of these officials were doubled they would get some immediate relief, because they would have for a few days a fair start of old High Cost of Living, but as soon as he sat up and discovered the existence of this fund, just so soon would he take to his feet and win the race as easily as ever.

We learn nothing, Mr. President, in matters of this kind, particularly where money is involved. The Government pays it; we have plenty of it; so what is the difference? These employees need relief, that I concede, but I assert that the only possible governmental remedy for the trouble—and that is an expensive one—is that which Great Britain adopted long ago and which it is still pursuing. I refer, of course, to the purchase by the Government of large quantities of the necessary commodities and furnishing them to Government employees at rates within the amount of their compensation, charging the loss to general national account. It costs very much less than this sort of thing, because the Government, as a wholesale purchaser, can in some degree dictate its own prices, which will be less than those which the individual is charged; and, as a consequence, where there is a loss to the public it is minimized, while on the other hand the employee does get something substantial. Here nobody benefits except the supply man. The employee finds, within a fortnight or so after his increase has been granted, that the balance between what he gets and what he pays out is just what it was before.

Fundamentally it does not make any difference what a man's wages are; the question is, What can he exchange them for? It goes without saying that if a man can get more of the commodities of life for $5 than he can get for $15 his $5 wage is much more beneficial than his $15 wage and is a good deal more satisfactory.

I have discussed what I have assumed and believe to be the reason for enormously advancing prices not only in the United States but the world over. I do not believe that the causes which have been assigned on several occasions by some of us for this unsatisfactory condition can be successfully challenged, and I am very sure that legislation by the American Congress, except in so far as actual profiteering is concerned and can be detected, will not only prove disappointing, but will increase that public complaint which assumes that if we will only do so we can legislate anything into existence or out of existence; that we possess here a magic power, a sort of representative necromancy, through the manipulation of which all the ills of men can be cured and all those which are threatened can be prevented.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. DIAL. The Senator understands, of course, in addition to what he has already stated, that this bill also relates back to the 1st of July?

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, yes. We do not pass any special appropriation bills now but that we arrange them as the old darky arranged his coon trap, so as to catch them "a-comin' and a-gwine." Of course, it is retroactive. That has been the attitude of labor in nearly all of the demands which it has made for increased wages in the past. It has its retroactive character, established by the Government during the war, but crystallized into a precedent, so that whatever change we make will in all probability be carried back sufficiently far in the past to satisfy temporarily the demands of those whose wants are the subject of consideration.

I know that men and women are quitting the service for more lucrative employment. They will quit just the same, whether we pass this joint resolution or not. Just so long as the humbler forms of labor receive extraordinary compensation measured in dollars and cents, just so long will the salaried employee drop his job, whether it be a public or a private one, and take in exchange for it something which though harder carries increased compensation. That is human nature. School-teachers are leaving their schools in droves in different parts of the country. They are obeying the same lure, supplemented by the need for a larger income. If Senators think they can stop this exodus from the public service by the enactment of this measure, I am satisfied that they will be disappointed.

In one of the recent Sunday supplements I read a little incident of a humorous character which well illustrates the situation. It related to an engineer of accomplishments who applied for employment in response to an advertisement. The would-be employer said, "We are not employing engineers. We want workmen." He said, "I know it. I can not afford to work for you as an engineer, the pay is too small, but I want my $10 a day as an ordinary laborer, and I am applying in that capacity."

It is all very well, even in the religious world, for men to preach Christ, and Him crucified, at $10 a week, when times are normal; but $10 a day in private employment somewhere, no matter what the labor, is a good deal more attractive now, and I do not wonder that ministers of the gospel are said to be also following the general current and postponing salvation—which is now the only thing in the country said to be free—for a more propitious occasion, while taking advantage of the interesting conditions of the present time and getting enough to clothe the wife and feed the children.

When these additions are made, the amount of compensation which these employees will be receiving is very much less than the lowest prevailing standard of wages for the humblest and hardest labor. It is an unnatural condition, and the only way in which we can meet it and keep these employees is to pay the employee more than he will get by working elsewhere. But when you do that you will have another bond issue, and a heavy one.

So, Mr. President, I assert that however well intended this joint resolution may be, and however apparent the necessity for it, it will not accomplish the purpose intended, and as a consequence we shall either have to repeal it or, what is most improbable, stop this mad legislative effort to overtake the constantly increasing prices of everything in the world by legislating constantly increasing amounts of compensation.

The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY] complains of the Government's treatment of its soldiers. His argument presupposes that the life and career of a soldier is a matter of compensation. I am not surprised that that view obtains, in view of the pension history of the country, in view of the bids we are always making for the political power of the returned soldier when organized, for we placate his vote at the public expense whenever the opportunity offers. But, Mr. President, the job of a soldier is one which imposes upon him the temporary exercise of the highest obligation of a citizen. Of course, he is poorly paid. Frequently he is poorly protected. Theoretically the Government furnishes him every thing that he needs. But the returning soldier, Mr. President, after his discharge has no difficulty in securing employment in this country if he will take it, and most of them gladly do so. I have heard of instances where jobs were offered and refused for the assigned reason that not jobs but easy positions were desired. I have heard of others that have been refused because their acceptance would remove the soldier from the excitements of city life and carry him into the country. But with aliens leaving the United States by the thousand every week, with strikes and lockouts the order of the day, with industries hungering for production and appreciating the need thereof, the soldier will do very much better and is doing very much better by going to work, either in his old occupation or in some better one, than by insisting upon bonuses from the Treasury of the United States, which can be paid only with revenues sadly needed for public administration.

Six months' pay, Mr. President, at $30 a month, is $180 per soldier. Multiply that by 4,000,000, and it totals three-quarters of a billion dollars. It must come from the pockets of the taxpayers, now sorely needed by a Government facing the certainty of a huge deficiency at the end of the fiscal year.

I do not know whether other Senators have my experience—I think they do—but I am getting scores of letters every week from taxpayers, men and women upon whose shoulders has been laid the greatest burden of personal taxation ever known in American history, and equally the greatest ever known anywhere else. They are naturally becoming restive. They should have done so long ago. About all the taxpayers are good for is to bleed them. If they do not like it, let them quit earning money or accumulating property. There are not so many of them as there are those who want the pleasure of spending it, so we are not particularly concerned about them.

But I am beginning to think they are waking up. I hope so. And when they do and focus public attention upon legislative blunders in finance and point to our prodigal extravagance and demand an accounting, they may collectively compose a political force of which we will take quite as respectful notice as we now pay to other elements of our population.

Mr. President, I have no intention, I assure the Senator having charge of the joint resolution, of offering any obstruction to its final consideration. I felt bound to state my attitude concerning it, even at the risk of tedious reiteration. But I do think, Mr. President, that we should in no uncertain way limit this increased appropriation to the current fiscal year. The joint resolution does it, probably; I am not prepared to say that it does not; but I think the insertion of the world "only" on page 3, at the end of line 2, will make it impossible to consider it hereafter as a precedent, or permit it to be used as a basis for increased permanent compensation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NEW in the chair). Does the Senator from Colorado offer that as an amendment?

Mr. THOMAS. If there is no other amendment before the Senate, I will offer it as an amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 2, after the word "year" and before the colon, insert the word "only," so as to read: "The following classes of employees shall be increased as follows for such fiscal year only."

Mr. TOWNSEND. I will say to the Senator from Colorado that there is no question about that being the intent, and I believe it is effectuated by the wording.

Mr. THOMAS. It may be.

Mr. TOWNSEND. But I have no objection to inserting the word "only."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I do not desire to detain the Senate so as not to be able to get a vote by 2 o'clock, as I understand it is the desire of the chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads to get a vote by that hour. I am very much in favor of the joint resolution, because I am sure that the increases which are provided for as a rule are all right. There may be some instances where there should have been a larger increase. I want to point out what I think are two of those instances, and I am going to propose amendments to take care of those two propositions.

If the Senator from Michigan will bear with me, I notice on page 3 that it is provided that—

> Postmasters at offices of the third class, assistant postmasters, and clerks, including special clerks, finance clerks, bookkeepers, and other employees of offices of the first and second class, letter carriers in the City Delivery Service, carriers in the village delivery service.

And so forth.

But when the increases to be provided for the various employees in these various branches are stated I note that the carriers in the village delivery service are omitted. Whether it was the intention of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads not to provide an increase for the carriers in the village delivery service I do not know; but it would seem to me that they ought to be provided for the same as others.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The committee intended to provide for them, and from the information which was obtained from the Post Office Department, and we relied on the information from that department as to the salaries which were being paid, we believed that all those people came within the $1,000 class. However, I am going to propose an amendment, so that in subdivision 1 the increase shall cover those receiving $1,000 or less, inserting the words "or less."

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator proposes to amend the joint resolution on line 12, page 3, by making it read "$1,000 or less, to be increased $240"?

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is right.

Mr. HARRISON. That is thoroughly agreeable to me, and will practically take care of the amendment I was going to offer to that phase of the joint resolution, but which I will not offer in view of what the Senator from Michigan said. My proposed amendment was as follows:

> Carriers in the village delivery service to be increased $240: Provided, That carriers serving half time shall receive one-half of such increase.

I understand that there are a good many rural village carriers who work only half time, and it would seem to me that they should not receive the whole $240.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Senator is absolutely correct about that, and my object in putting it in here, and also putting in another provision covering in express terms "employees in the mail equipment shops," in order that that matter may go to conference and that we may find out what are the exact facts.

I have tried, as I said, to obtain full information from the department, but I shall offer that amendment, so that when the joint resolution goes to conference we can find out what the compensation is, because the committee wants to reach them all.

Mr. HARRISON. I am sure of that. I shall not offer the amendment I had prepared, because the Senator's amendment will take care of the situation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan offer that as an amendment now?

Mr. TOWNSEND. No. I am going to offer it. I simply gave notice that I would.

Mr. HARRISON. I understand that the Senator from Michigan intends to offer that amendment later.

The theory of the joint resolution, I understand, is to grant a larger percentage of increase on the smaller salaries, and on the larger salaries a proportionate decrease in percentage. Carrying out that theory, I can not understand why the committee increased fourth-class postmasters only 10 per cent. I was very glad, indeed, on yesterday to hear the statement of the Senator from Michigan on a larger increase than 10 per cent to take care of fourth-class postmasters. I understand from what the Senator from Michigan said that he would not oppose a further increase to the fourth-class postmasters. A great many increases are larger than 10 per cent. Fourth-class postmasters get all the way from $200 up to $999; and to carry out the theory of the joint resolution, as I said before, the fourth-class postmasters should receive a larger percentage of increase than 10 per cent.

There are, I know, a great many postmasters who are appointed and hold the positions simply in order to bring trade, perhaps, to their places of business out in the country; but there are a great many other instances where postmasters have to provide a building, maintain a separate building, and furnish light and fuel, in order to give good service to the patrons of their particular post offices. It would seem to me that, where that is necessary, where the postmaster has to go to the expense of maintaining a separate building or a separate room, and of furnishing fuel and light, the Government ought to pay for that service.

So I offer an amendment to the amendment, which I ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read it.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, line 11, of the committee amendment, strike out "10" and insert "15"; also strike out the period at the end of line 12, on page 5, and insert:

> And in all cases where the post office is kept in a room or building in which no other business is conducted they shall be allowed a reasonable sum, to be determined by the Postmaster General, and not to exceed $50 per quarter, to cover the cost of rent, fuel, and light.

Mr. HARRISON. I hope the committee will adopt that amendment increasing the 10 per cent increase now provided to 15 per cent, and in those cases where a separate room or building is maintained that an additional amount shall be added to that, not exceeding in any quarter $50.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I realize that it would be impossible for me to thoroughly discuss this joint resolution on account of the shortness of the time. I want to say, however, that I believe the last amendment, offered by the Senator from Mississippi, should be amended and then adopted. I believe we should increase the amount from 15 per cent to at least 20 per cent. The salaries received by fourth-class postmasters are entirely inadequate, and unless we are to understand that the postmasters who receive these small salaries, who, of course, always live in the country, are to be discriminated against, the same as the farmers are being discriminated against whenever occasion arises, I think this provision should be increased to at least 20 per cent.

I introduced a bill some months ago providing for a fixed salary for all these postmasters. I realize it is difficult for any committee to agree on a bill that will suit every Member of this body. I realize that this is an improvement upon the present law. But I do not believe that the allowance made to the fourth-class postmaster is sufficient. I join with the Senator from Mississippi in asking the chairman of the committee to make this at least a 20 per cent increase in the salaries of fourth-class postmasters. I suppose it will be conceded that in the instances where the office is located in some place of business, where the postmaster has his business outside of the post-office business, these salaries may be adequate. But where it is necessary to rent a building, to heat it and light it, and to have some one there all the time we know that the salary is absolutely inadequate and the allowance ought to be increased.

Mr. President, I had intended to say a word or two with reference to what the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] said a moment ago. I always listen with the greatest interest to what the Senator has to say.

But I differ with him upon the question of allowing what may be called a bonus, if you please, of making some allowance to the returning soldiers of this country. I do not know that the soldiers are asking for it, but I am reliably informed, Mr. President, that during this war the number of millionaires increased from 7,000 to 30,000—that 23,000 people in these United States were made millionaires during the war.

Mr. President, it is only fair to say that the people who unduly profited during the struggle should be made to pay a tax, which would give to these men at least a small allowance. We might find hundreds, perhaps thousands, of the boys who would not be willing to receive this allowance, but we do know that there are thousands of them who need it, and no man will deny that they deserve it.

They are not coming to Congress and asking that this shall be done, they are not saying that they are going to strike if it is not done, but Congress ought to remember that these men went on the fields of battle to sacrifice their all for no pay whatever and in the defense of their own country. Congress, I believe, has a responsible duty to perform in dealing with these men, and should not deal with them in a niggardly way.

Mr. President, I am not going to take further time, because I know the Senator in charge of the joint resolution is anxious to dispose of the measure to-day. I hope that he will accept the amendment of 20 per cent to fourth-class postmasters and let it go to conference.

Mr. WATSON. Has the Senator from North Dakota concluded?

Mr. GRONNA. I was going to say something about another section, but if I should take the time to do so I realize that the joint resolution would go over, and so I shall content myself with simply asking that the question which I raised be given consideration.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, the hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, I should like to ask the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], in charge of the joint resolution, whether he is entirely willing to have it go over until to-morrow without proceeding with it further at this time?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I believe that the Senate is practically ready to vote on the question.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] stepped out of the Chamber, and informed me before he left that he desires to make some observations to the Senate upon the joint resolution. I told him I would inform the chairman of the committee having the matter in charge of that fact, if the hour of 2 o'clock arrived before he returned to the Chamber.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. WATSON. I yield.

Mr. MYERS. I not only know that the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] desires to discuss the joint resolution, but I myself desire to make some remarks upon it for a few minutes; I do not know just how long. If the measure is to remain before the Senate, I should be pleased to proceed now. However, I have no objection whatever to its going over. If other Senators want to bring other business before the Senate at this time, I am perfectly willing to postpone until to-morrow the few remarks I have to make.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I have been led to believe that the joint resolution could be voted upon very soon—within half an hour. Of course, I realize if it is going to take more than that, if the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], who is now absent, proposes to oppose it and take considerable time, that would of course encroach upon the regular order. I do think, however, that we ought to get a vote. May I inquire how much time the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] wishes to occupy?

Mr. MYERS. I think from 10 to 15 minutes, possibly; perhaps a little longer.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Are there any other Senators here present who want to discuss the joint resolution?

Mr. CALDER. I want to occupy about 10 minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. May the Chair observe that the joint resolution is the regular order. We do not pass at 2 o'clock into any other order without the action of the Senate in that respect.

Mr. MYERS. So far as I am concerned, I am willing to say what I have to say right now, if agreeable to other Senators.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I am quite sure that there will be prolonged debate upon the joint resolution, and I trust that the Senator from Michigan will be quite content that it may go over until to-morrow. With that understanding, I move that the Senate proceed in open executive session to the consideration of the peace treaty with Germany.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have no doubt a majority of the Senate are opposed to that motion at this time, and that by a proper opposition we could defeat it. I do not care to take that attitude, however. In view of the fact that Senators seem to be insistent, and, as stated by the Presiding Officer, the joint resolution has the right of way, though there is a majority in the Senate now in favor of finishing its consideration, I am willing, under the pressure that has been urged by certain Senators, that the joint resolution may go over until to-morrow morning. Then I shall move to take it up, and I shall hope to hold it before the Senate until we dispose of it, because it is an emergency measure and ought not to be postponed for the purpose of debate or something of that kind, when no vote is expected on any other question.

Mr. FLETCHER. Will the Senator signify at what time he proposes to take it up to-morrow?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I propose to call it up to-morrow morning at the conclusion of morning business, or at the first opportunity when I can get the floor, as I did this morning.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think that is very important. I believe we lose two hours every day——

Mr. TOWNSEND. I think we are wasting time now in not going ahead and disposing of a measure which can be disposed of in a short time.

Mr. FLETCHER. If the Senator calls up the joint resolution promptly at the close of morning business to-morrow, I think we can conclude it before 2 o'clock.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I shall do that.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. WATSON. I renew my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the treaty with Germany in open executive session.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I very much regret that I was unable to conclude yesterday, and in order that I may conclude as speedily as possible to-day, I shall ask Senators to refrain from any interruption of my remarks; and I shall also ask unanimous consent to incorporate certain extracts from papers and treaties as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Wednesday, October 8, 1919.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I insert at this point a summary of the subjects which I shall discuss:

1. Introduction—League of Nations Resolution, January 14, 1919.
2. Is the Old Faith Dead?
3. Washington's Philosophy.
4. A Fraudulent Scheme.
5. Defects in the Covenant.
6. Ratify this Treaty and Germany Triumphs.
7. Treaty Condemned by Common Judgment of Mankind.
8. British Masses Oppose Scheme.
9. British Labor Party Demands Amendments.
10. The Meaning of the War.
11. Territories Which We Guarantee.
12. British Rule in India.
13. The African Problem.
14. Dismemberment of China.
15. Injustice to Korea.
16. Treaty Imperils Missions.
17. Conclusion—America Must Lead.

Mr. President, on the 14th day of last January I offered a resolution which I ask to have read at this point by the Secretary as part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Senate resolution 412, by Mr. FRANCE.

Whereas on the 11th day of November, 1918, the President of the United States announced the signing of an armistice between the United States and the Central Powers, against which this Nation had been at war, the President at that time declaring, "The war thus comes to an end"; and

Whereas it has not as yet come to the knowledge of the Senate of the United States that peace negotiations have been entered into with the enemy; and

Whereas the keeping for any length of time of an American Army upon European soil is undesirable and a cause of vast expense and of deep anxiety to the American people; and

Whereas profound unrest among the people of many nations and violent revolutions in several countries, which spirit of unrest and revolution are augmented by the hardships resulting from the maintenance of armies of occupation, and by that underproduction, throughout the world, of the necessities and commodities of life which has resulted from the long withholding of many millions of men from productive industry must be a cause for deep concern on the part of the several governments: Therefore be it

Resolved, First. That the Senate, as part of the treaty-making power of the Government, does hereby consent to and most earnestly advise that, at the very earliest possible moment, negotiations be entered into with the enemy looking to the establishment of a just peace, and that all subsidiary questions which might delay the establishment of such a just peace between the nations, without which peace national stability is everywhere endangered, may be postponed for a later discussion at an international conference.

Second. That the Senate, as part of the treaty-making power of the Government, does hereby consent to and most earnestly advise that at the earliest possible moment consistent with the safety of this Nation American troops be returned from Europe; and, further, that after the establishment of peace the President call upon the Governments of North and South America to appoint two delegates each to an international conference, to be held at some suitable time and place, to consider plans for the closer cooperation of these Governments in promoting justice, progress, and friendship among and within the said countries of the Western Continent; and, further, that the President also, at some time subsequent to this conference of the American Republics, call upon all the nations to appoint delegates to another international conference to be held at some suitable time and place to discuss and consider plans for the promotion of justice, progress, and friendship among and within the nations of the world, such conference to particularly discuss and consider plans for the removal, so far as may be, of the economic and social causes of war, and to this end particularly give attention to—

First. The congestion of population of some nations.

Second. The underpopulation of other nations.

Third. The unregulated competition between the more populous and industrial countries for the raw products and trade of the less populous and agricultural ones.

Fourth. The exploitation of the weaker and the less advanced by the stronger and more highly organized nations.

Fifth. A larger self-determination of peoples and nations.

Sixth. The possibility of the cooperation of the more advanced nations, for the improvement of the conditions of the backward countries, particularly those of Africa and parts of Asia, by the formulation of plans for the reclamation of waste lands, for the utilization of natural resources, including water powers, for wise colonization, for education, and for the spread of civilization, in the interest of those countries and of the world.

Seventh. The best means for the wider and more rapid extension of education and civilization throughout the world, looking to the ultimate elimination of national, racial, and religious antagonisms.

Eighth. The establishment of constitutional republics or of governments of such uniformity throughout the world as would make for that national stability upon which could be based a permanent international order.

Ninth. The elimination of all causes of national enmities and the establishment of friendship and justice between the nations, with a view to the ultimate establishment of a league of nations or world federation of republics, for the purpose of promoting the cause of progress and of peace throughout the earth.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I presented this resolution because I believed that then, after our valiant and invincible armies had carried our banners through battle on to victory, winning for themselves and for the Republic immortal glory, after our national honor, so long compromised, had been vindicated, after our aims had been achieved, that the fathers and mothers of America desired and had a right to demand the return home of their heroic sons, and the termination of the suspense, misery, and oppressive burdens of war. I was, moreover, fully persuaded that an undue prolongation of the status of war would threaten the stability of every nation of Europe and tend to undermine the structure of our western civilization. I was convinced also that from a peace conference held in Europe, during a status of war, and dominated by the reactionary ministers who represented governments and special interests, and not the peoples whose voices had been suppressed by despotic decrees and repressive statutes, there could come forth no international covenant dedicated to justice, to the elevation, liberation, and self-determination of peoples, to progress, to peace, to the common welfare of mankind, such as would commend itself to the aspirations of an agonized world, new-awakened to a consciousness of its destiny, and with a quickened conscience as to its responsibility.

The prolongation of the peace conference did, sirs, imperil the stability of all European Governments, and from it has come to us a peace treaty which contains within it malignant hatred for the conquered foe, violence against the rights of many peoples, injustice not only to China, a friend and faithful ally, which stood by our side and faced the fires of war, but to our own Nation, and a reactionary plan for a new armed coalition of nations, representing a small minority of the peoples of the earth, which armed coalition is designed to enforce the treaty provisions, perpetuate the wrongs which the treaty sanctions, arrogantly assert its power and authority over nonmember nations, and hold in subjection for all time not only the millions of helpless ones who have hitherto been the victims of oppression and exploitation, but those also who shall be betrayed into a surrender to this new tyrannical supergovernmental power of a liberty dearly bought and long enjoyed.

Sirs, if this has been a war of democracy against autocracy, if it has been a war for liberty, I sometimes question whether we have yet achieved either victory or peace. Peace is not here. This is the aftermath, and who shall say what the final harvest shall be from these fields plowed by shell, harrowed by shrapnel, and fertilized with the precious blood of those youth who but a few short months ago represented all that was best in man and in civilization? To-day on many fronts in Europe armies are joined in mortal combat, while starvation, pestilence, and outrage are taking as heavy a toll as reeking gun, bloody bayonet, and dripping sword. Bitter discontent, distrust, intolerance, despotism, hatred, brutality, massacre, riot, and revolution, and all the ancient greeds, lusts, and unholy ambitions of men and nations, unsated yet by this long four years' feast of blood, menace the world with further dissolution. The reactionaries stand trembling, pallid, and aghast at the wild furies which have come out of this Pandora's box of war which has been opened. But, sirs, hope still remains within the box; and it is for this Senate, by sternly refusing any compromise with that injustice which is the all-potent cause of war and revolution, to take hope out and send her forth on beneficent and healing wings to touch and comfort the souls of all those millions of the sons of men now bowed down in bondage, darkness, and despair.

Sirs, the fathers with faith established a government in harmony with universal law, dedicated it to the everlasting principles of justice, and launched it down the swelling tides of time, to move on toward a divinely appointed destiny, and I can not believe that this Senate will now wreck her by the ratification of a treaty which surrenders her sovereignty and her liberty, alters the very purposes of her formation, by making her a subservient part of a supergovernment, devoted to aims alien to her own, and pledges her the very harbinger and champion of freedom in the world to shed the blood of her sons to hold in hopeless slavery the subject peoples, whose souls long to be free from the clutch of the last great empires which shall ever be founded by subjugation and for exploitation. The gentlemen at Paris had not the faith and vision of our fathers, and so they miserably failed, and we have here a very travesty of justice in this treaty and in this plan so falsely named a league of nations. But, sirs, we must be charitable. The world was very sick while those three venerable statesmen sat at Paris seeking to repartition it in accordance with the formulæ of the old and secret diplomacy. The world was sorely stricken, and yet they sought to soothe it with beatific platitudes, while with sinister determination by the blockade during the long armistice, with the cruel weapon of starvation, they murdered the emaciated children and wasting women of the fallen foe. The censored cables kept many a secret from the sovereign American people, but when that hideous, murderous policy is known here, there will be a storm of indignation against this treaty and against those responsible for it and for that policy. The heroic British troops knew of that policy of coercion by starvation and threatened mutiny in protest. The masses of London knew it, and on a Sunday last April they marched, 100,000 of them, to Hyde Park to demand an end to the inhuman blockade. Their protestations came from understanding hearts, for many in that vast throng had known the pangs of hunger and the agony which claws and tears the hearts of parents who kneel in helplessness beside the filthy pallet of rags and straw, to close the glazing, sightless eyes of a jaundiced, waxen, emaciated child, perishing for want of bread. Sirs, those were malignant men who censored all our cables, but truth may not forever be suppressed, and when the millions of America, in cities, towns, and hamlets, all those who are devoted to our best ideals, all those who walk through peaceful country lanes, in the solemn Sabbath stillness, to unpretentious sanctuaries, to pray in deep sincerity, as did their fathers, "Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done," shall know this awful story, when they shall see the pictures we have seen of wide-eyed, famishing, wondering children, whose cries and prayers for food could not be answered because of the unspeakable cruelty of these cold-blooded ministers, there will surely come a day of retribution.

Shall we blame these venerable statesmen of a passing age, as they looked out over the mighty, seething, blazing cauldron of a world made molten in the fires of war, for seeking to pour the white-hot fluid into the molds made after the ancient fashion of the only patterns which they really knew? Shall we blame them if they sought to place this new and very heady wine of liberty into the old bottles of imperialistic form? Shall we reprimand these self-sufficient, amateurish surgeons of a world disordered and diseased if in their simple eagerness they sought to heal by covering with this new man-made, artificial skin of the so-called league of nations the feculent, festering, rotting ulcers of the world, wholly forgetting that before such sources of corruption could be cured the putrescent, pestilential sores must first be healed from beneath by the deep penetration of the purifying air and disinfecting sun of God's eternal justice?

IS THE OLD FAITH DEAD?

Mr. President, is it possible that from our minds has faded the memory of our origin? Can it be that by this subtle, superficial, modern sophistry there has been uprooted and destroyed within our hearts that sacred inheritance of an exalted faith in our own peculiar national destiny? It has been intimated in this Senate Chamber, in the very city which bears his reverenced and immortal name, that conditions have changed, and that the doctrines enunciated by Washington with reference to foreign affairs are no longer applicable. We are now asked to believe, since our indoctrination with this "new freedom," that

Washington was really quite provincial, very narrow, pitifully lacking in world vision, because, having achieved our American independence, he then advised what some are pleased to call a policy of selfish national isolation. We are now new advised that the matchless and prophetic words of his Farewell Address are out of date, because he warned "against the insidious wiles of foreign influence," against "weaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe," against "entangling our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition," against "implicating ourselves by artificial ties in the ordinary vicissitudes of her politics, or the ordinary combinations and collusions of her friendships and enmities." But, sirs, we would do well to remember this, that if it be true that the political philosophy of Washington is both antiquated and like tarnishing tinsel false; if there be no fundamental and unchangeable principles in accordance with which we may in such a desperate hour as this shape, with assurance of success, our temporary policies, then, indeed, is all lost. All is vanity, and—

> She comes, she comes: The sable throne behold!
> Of night primeval and of chaos old;
> Thus at her fell approach and secret might,
> Art after art goes out, and all is night.
> See skulking truth, to her old cavern fled,
> Mountains of casuistry heaped o'er her head;
> Philosophy that leaned on Heaven before,
> Shrinks to her second cause and is no more.
> Religion, blushing, veils her sacred fires,
> And unawares morality expires.
> No public flame, nor private, dares to shine,
> Nor human spark is left, nor glimpse divine.
> Lo! thy dread empire, chaos, is restored.
> Light dies before thy uncreating word;
> Thy hand, great anarch, lets the curtain fall,
> And universal darkness buries all.

As we consider to what vast, limitless, and pathless wastes we have drifted, as we behold skies dark with clouds and storm, as we hear throughout the world the ever-increasing ominous roar and reverberation of revolution, it would be well for all charged with responsibility—and that means every American—for the safety of the great Republic, caught in the cross currents and troughs of a perilous sea, to turn once more to the faith of the fathers, to read again those words written in days of clearer inspiration, to examine again with scrupulous care that mighty chart of all our liberties, the Constitution, by which they did, and we and our sons must, guide this Nation safe past those destructive shoals of ignorant materialism, sophistry, and insincere demagoguery upon which have perished the ancient empires and republics of the world.

WASHINGTON'S PHILOSOPHY.

Was Washington, after all, only a shrewd utilitarian in his enunciated foreign policy, cautiously advising "safety first" and placing peace above national righteousness and honor? Was he actuated by purely materialistic motives? Was he but a dull churl, who could not catch a wider vision of the destiny of the world, or was he too weak and cowardly to follow where he saw? Which would they have us believe? The political philosophy of Washington seems to be but little understood, and during recent weeks men have advocated wrapping his teachings in the great winding sheet of oblivion and burying them with the bones and ashes of the ancient heresies, because they say he advocated the doctrine of national isolation. I do not understand him or the fathers thus. We must read the context, study deeply his words as well as those of his contemporaries, catch his faith, perceive his love for mankind, and ponder the inspiring story of his life of selfless service if we would have a true comprehension of the profound and benevolent philosophy from which there sprang those admonitions and that most wise advice as to future national policies.

If I understand Washington aright, he was not an advocate of narrow and selfish isolation. He would not have opposed plans for international cooperation in harmony with the principles upon which this Republic was founded. That he was opposed to entangling alliances designed to further selfish and sinister ends does not prove that a true league of all the nations for purposes in line with those for which this Government was founded would have met with his condemnation. The true test of a league of nations measured by his lofty moral standards is: Is it a league of all the nations founded on justice, liberty, and the common welfare, and designed to further the interests of humanity; or is it an entangling alliance based on force, tyranny, and injustice to further the interests of a privileged few? By that acid test this so-called league of nations is condemned.

Let me now briefly state Washington's political creed, which we are now asked to repudiate, in words taken from his first inaugural and his Farewell Address.

He believed in and made "fervent supplications to that Almighty Being who rules over the universe—who presides in the councils of nations—that His benediction may consecrate to the liberties and happiness of the people of the United States a government instituted by themselves for these essential purposes." He held "that the propitious smiles of Heaven can never be expected on a nation that disregards the eternal rules of order and right which Heaven itself has ordained," and that "the preservation of the sacred fire of liberty and the destiny of the republican model of government are justly considered as deeply, perhaps as finally staked on the experiment intrusted to the hands of the American people." He went to his grave with "unceasing wishes that your union and brotherly affection may be perpetual; that the free Constitution which is the work of your hands may be sacredly maintained; that its administration, in every department, may be stamped with wisdom and virtue; that in fine the happiness of the people of these States, under the auspices of liberty, may be made complete by so careful a preservation and so prudent a use of this blessing as will acquire to them the glory of recommending it to the applause, the affection, and the adoption of every nation which is yet stranger to it." This was his philosophy. Shall we abandon it?

Profoundly reverencing the God of nations, holding "these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, that to secure these rights governments are insituated among them, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed," the fathers constituted a government devoted to the achievement of these aims, "to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity," and their souls were inspired with the faith that by the example and through the instrumentality of a government so established the institutions of ordered liberty would be extended in ever-widening circles, through the centuries, to carry at last their unspeakable blessings to the remotest shores and the most distant islands of the sea where dwell the sons of men. These purposes were also to guide and to control our foreign policy, for Washington said, "It will be worthy of a free, enlightened, and, at no distant period, a great nation, to give to mankind the magnanimous and too novel example of a people always guided by an exalted justice and benevolence."

I can find no support for the contention that the fathers, particularly Washington, Hamilton, and Madison, placed any narrow limitation upon the extent of the sphere which might be embraced in governmental organization, or that they taught any doctrine of national isolation. On the contrary, they most clearly perceived that the principle of federation, with the careful maintenance of the nice adjustment and proper balance between the rights of self-determination of the parts and the surrender by a reasonable delegation of powers by the parts for the safe unification into the whole, would lend itself to most wide application and indefinite expansion. Washington asked, "Is there a doubt whether a common government can embrace so large a sphere? Let experience solve it. We are authorized to hope that a proper organization of the whole with the auxiliary agency of governments for the respective subdivisions will afford a happy issue of the experiment. 'Tis well worth a fair trial and full experiment." This question as to the extent of territory which might be embraced by a republican form of government is fully discussed in the Federalist, particularly by Madison. (No. XIV, Extent of the country no objection to the Union.) He says:

> The error which limits republican government to a narrow district has been unfolded and refuted in preceding papers. I remark here only that it seems to owe its rise and prevalence chiefly to the confounding of a republic with a democracy, and applying to the former reasonings drawn from the nature of the latter. The true distinction between these forms was also adverted to on a former occasion. It is that in a democracy the people meet and exercise the government in person; in a republic they assemble and administer it by their representatives and agents. A democracy, consequently, will be confined to a small spot. A republic may be extended over a large region.

And again, referring to the principle of republican federations, he states:

> If Europe has the merit of discovering this great mechanical power in government by the simple agency of which the will of the largest political body may be concentered and its force directed to any object which the public good requires, America can claim the merit of making the discovery the basis of unmixed and extensive republics.

And again:

> As the natural limit of a democracy is that distance from the central point which will just permit the most remote citizens to assemble as often as their public functions demand, and will include no greater number than can join in those functions, so the natural limit of a republic is that distance from the center which will barely allow the representatives of the people to meet as often as may be necessary for the administration of public affairs.

And again:

> But why is the experiment of an extended republic to be rejected merely because it may comprise what is new? Is it not the glory of the people of America that while they have paid a decent regard to the opinions of former times and other nations, they have not suffered a blind veneration for antiquity, for customs, or for names to overrule the suggestions of their own good sense, the knowledge of their own situation, and the lessons of their own experience? * * * They reared the fabrics of governments which have no model on the face of the globe. They formed the design of a great confederacy which it is incumbent on their successors to improve and perpetuate.

The experiment, sirs, has been successful. The wisdom of the fathers has been demonstrated, for its has been, beyond question, proven that such a Federal Government as ours operates across our continent as effectively as it functioned along their coast. Who will maintain that a federation such as ours might not be extended to embrace this hemisphere? Bismarck applied the principle invoked by the fathers, modifying the application of it to suit his ends and to meet special conditions, and from discordant and belligerent states, speaking diverse dialects, he builded a single powerful empire. Her ablest statesmen have urged the application of this principle of republican federation to all the wide-extended and diverse parts within the British Empire, but the reactionaries, blinding themselves to the teachings of history and refusing to look forward to the inevitable consequences, have resisted all such benevolent and enlightened plans. Was John Quincy Adams speaking idle words at Plymouth, on December 22, 1802, when he said:

Westward the star of empire takes its way.
Let us unite in ardent supplication to the Founder of Nations and the Builder of Worlds, that what then was prophecy may continue unfolding into history—that the dearest hopes of the human race may not be extinguished in disappointment, and that the last may prove the noblest empire of time.

It would ill become us here, where by the wise application of the principle of federation we have founded a mighty empire of sovereign states, to deny the possibility of the extension of these principles to secure international cooperation for the liberation and elevation of all men everywhere. It was not because he believed in selfish isolation, it was not because he desired to confine to a narrow sphere the application of this principle, that Washington warned against foreign alliances. It was, rather, because he clearly perceived the fact which we must now recognize that while this Nation might from time to time alter its temporary policies from reasons of expendiency it could not abandon its principles or depart either in its foreign or domestic activities from those exalted purposes to which it had been dedicated without complete self-destruction. He warned us that we must not form permanent alliances with Europe because her interests and her purposes were alien to our own. He who votes to make this Government a part of an international government or a constituent member of a supergovernment not devoted to the identical purposes and clearly expressed aims of our Constitution has cast a vote to destroy his country. Sirs, to forsake these principles and purposes or to compromise with policies which violate them by the adoption of this treaty would be, in my judgment, nothing less than treason of the most perfidious brand. To do so would be treason, because it would be betraying all that is best, the very soul and spirit of our institutions. It would be most perfidious because it would be accomplishing the end with a fraudulent document which is not what it purports to be and which is designed to entice men by an appeal to their highest motives to commit an unspeakable wrong.

It would be no superhuman task to establish in time cooperation between the nations of the earth in accordance with the well-known principles of federation, but nothing in that direction can be achieved if these fundamental rules are disregarded:

First. The purposes of the federation must be those announced in our own Constitution—the promotion of justice, liberty, and the common welfare.

Second. There must be a universal and equitable application of the principle of self-determination within such federation.

Third. There must be just methods for the representation of the nations in the government to which there is to be a delegation of powers.

Fourth. There must be no elimination of, or discrimination against, nations desiring membership.

Fifth. The government to which there is to be a delegation of powers must be subject and easily responsive to popular control.

Sixth. The constituent nations must themselves all have forms of government responsive to popular control.

Seventh. There must be three perpetually independent coordinate branches—legislative, executive, and judicial—in the government to which there is to be a delegation of powers.

Eighth. There must be clear provisions for amendment and for judicial interpretation.

While it must be apparent that at the present time the conditions in the world are not favorable to the formation of such an international federation, yet the first stages in the establishment of voluntary international cooperation might now well be undertaken. It must be recognized, however, that these well-known principles may not be disregarded in the organization of international government if we are to hope for success, and further that almost every one of them is flagrantly violated in this crude document which has been submitted to us after it had been drawn by Englishmen.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President——

Mr. FRANCE. The English reactionary leaders are not only notoriously ignorant of but obstinately opposed to the principles of republican federal government, because this form is inconsistent with the aristocratic, imperial, and colonial system, as it has existed for so many years to the enrichment of the upper classes of England. This document breathes not the free spirit of the fathers who laid the foundation of this Republic but the spirit of those same aristocratic Englishmen whom the fathers opposed because the fathers could not consent to the enslavement of mankind to selfish greed.

I now yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, I sought to interrupt the Senator a moment ago, when he was speaking of the necessary provisions for judicial interpretation, to ask if, under the contemplated covenant, the body which sought to act or acted under its terms would not also be the sole judge of the legality of its action under the covenant?

Mr. FRANCE. That is true. That body, the council, would exercise legislative, executive, and judicial powers, and the fathers well understood the very essence of despotism to be a consolidation of legislative, executive, and judicial powers in one man or body, and this council, which is proposed, would have all of the very nature of despotism within it.

A FRAUDULENT SCHEME.

Mr. President, I venture to say that but relatively few men in the United States have carefully studied the league of nations scheme, but as more do so and as it becomes better understood its fraudulent and dangerous character becomes more and more apparent. It is represented to be, and by many here apparently believed to be, a covenant for the establishment of a society of all the nations for the preservation of the peace and security of the world. It, in reality, creates a new armed coalition participated in by a few nations representing a small minority of the peoples of the earth. It will be dominated by the imperialistic nations—Great Britain, Japan, and France—and its principal objects are to guarantee the territorial integrity of these Empires; to make safe the spoils of war; to preserve the status quo with its cruel system of colonial expansion and human exploitation; to force, by a war after the war, the Germans to fulfill the drastic, oppressive, and really impossible provisions of the treaty; in short, to form a supergovernment to be controlled by a group of nine men who purpose, by their schemes, to defeat the rising hopes of millions of men for emancipation from unfavorable conditions and liberation from foreign control.

Sirs, the world is laughing at us for our serious consideration of this monstrous scheme. This treaty, in which we would compromise with injustice, is so deceptive as to have the appearance of being a part of a huge confidence game. By its submission the world tragedy partakes of the melodrama. It is not strange that bitter laughter should have greeted the appearance of this scheme in the House of Commons. The Right Hon. David Lloyd-George, M. P., first lord of his treasury and prime minister of His Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and of the British Dominions Beyond the Seas, Emperor of India, might well often chuckle by his fireside as we sit here in solemn deliberation upon whether or not we shall ratify a solemn contract by which, for no consideration in return, we irrevocably pledge the blood of American youth to fight for the preservation of all of His Majesty's vast dominions and for the perpetuation of a system by which the English dukes and lords grow fat upon the spoils taken from the toiling and impoverished millions of that Empire, to whom the determination of their own destiny has been denied. It is scarcely to be marveled at that His Majesty should have conferred upon this canny and too clever politician and diplomat the Order of Merit.

[From the New York Sun, Aug. 7, 1919.]

LLOYD-GEORGE IS HONORED BY KING—CONFERS ORDER OF MERIT FOR SERVICES IN WAR.

LONDON, August 6.

King George to-day conferred upon Premier David Lloyd-George the Order of Merit as a sign of his appreciation of Lloyd-George's war services.

In a letter to the premier, dated Buckingham Palace, August 6, announcing the award, the King says:

"MY DEAR PRIME MINISTER: Honors and rewards to the officers of the army, navy, and air force having been submitted to Parliament, I feel that my people will share with me regret that it is not possible to express the nation's grateful recognition of the persistent services rendered by the prime minister both in carrying the war on to a victorious end and in securing an honorable peace. To rectify somewhat this omission and personally to mark my high appreciation of these services it gives me great pleasure to confer upon you the Order of Merit.

"Believe me, yours, very sincerely,

"GEORGE R. I."

The House of Commons to-day gave a formal vote of thanks to Marshal Foch, of France, the allied commander in chief, and the various military and auxiliary services of Great Britain that served in the war. The vote included mention of the British women's organizations.

King George could scarcely do less, and even a hundred thousand pounds and an earldom would not be too much for such a service.

DEFECTS IN THE COVENANT.

I can not discuss all of the defects of this league of nations scheme, which is both organically unsound and ethically indefensible, but I desire to recapitulate, without extended comment, some of the most serious defects which have already been fully discussed by others.

1. There is no declaration of human rights and no dedication of it to the securing of justice, liberty, and the common welfare.

2. It is a close coalition, which exercises the power to exclude nations.

3. This coalition arrogantly assumes to dictate to and control nonmember nations.

4. There is created a despotic oligarchic supergovernment not subject to popular control.

5. There is no provision guaranteeing the right of withdrawal, this only being possible by unanimous consent.

6. There is no controlling and directing power residing in the popular assembly, which is in reality the league.

7. The chief powers are lodged with the small body, the council, which can exercise them arbitrarily at will and without control.

8. The interrelations of assembly and council are not defined, but certainly there is no control of the council by the assembly.

9. There is no provision for open sessions of the council.

10. There is no mention of a quorum, and four out of nine of the council might meet and take any action.

11. Each member of the council would have vested in him incredible power to commit his country to obligations of war or peace, and such member need not be chosen by the people.

12. Clauses dealing with armament production are weak and ineffective; the permitting of the taking into consideration by the council of geographical situations in deciding armaments, leaving the way open to competition in armaments.

13. Members of the league "undertake to respect and preserve the territorial integrity" of the various nations without regard to the question of justice.

14. We surrender our rights to settle by peaceable methods our own disputes with other nations.

15. There are no adequate safeguards against war.

16. There is no distinction made between offensive and defensive war, and a member nation could not defend by force its territory from invasion.

17. There is no clear definition of what are international and what domestic questions.

18. The provisions for making amendments are very obscure, a fatal defect, in view of the crudeness of the whole document.

19. There is no definite time fixed after which peoples held as mandatories shall be free.

20. Members reserve the right to exclude nonmembers from trade with mandatory colonies.

21. We shall be expected to assume control over Armenia, Turkey, and the most turbulent portions of Europe, this meaning continued war.

22. A single member of the council could prevent our making a treaty with another nation which it was to our interest to make.

23. The Monroe doctrine is not safeguarded.

24. It is not a true league of nations, and members are not given the same powers and proportionate representation.

25. It is a coalition seeking to achieve selfish competitive ends by the compelling power of force, rather than a league of cooperating nations seeking to secure worthy aims by the persuasive power of justice.

I believe also there is no constitutional grant which gives to the Federal Government authority to delegate to our member of the council of the league such vast prerogatives and powers as he would exercise.

A most excellent monograph entitled "What Every American Should Know About the League of Nations," by William George Jordan, concisely and ably discusses some of these and other vital objections to the league, and I would ask to have that monograph printed as part of my remarks but for the fact that it has already been printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of August 7, 1919, at the request of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], to which RECORD I would refer those desiring to read the monograph.

RATIFY TREATY AND GERMANY TRIUMPHS.

Sirs, the recommendation of this treaty, with its league of nations scheme, is the logical culmination of a foreign policy of almost unbelievable stupidity, and if we should place our hands to its ratification we would, in my judgment, make Germany triumphant and prepare the way for a greater and perhaps a final world disaster. We would be setting the mighty stage of the world for that ultimate bloody tragedy, a war between the East and the West, which might culminate in the subjugation of the occidental by the oriental civilization. Many thoughtful men were disturbed when they perceived that Germany was planning a Mittel Europa and considered it a grave menace when she sought to drive her railway down to Bagdad to find an outlet at Basra on the confluence of the ancient Tigris and Euphrates near the Persian Gulf. They trembled because it seemed to portend a movement toward the fulfillment of her dream of universal empire. It was a narrow and perilous path across Bulgaria, Turkey in Europe, and Asia Minor, between the Mediterranean and Black Seas, to the desert sands of the Arabian Peninsula between the Euphrates and the Persian Gulf eastward and the Red Sea on the west, but it was, with all its perils to Germany, the path of lesser resistance. It was most perilous because the French were anxious, Great Britain was deeply concerned, while the giant Russian Empire on the east, holding Central Asia and Turkestan, covetous to control every shore of the Black Sea and Constantinople, watched with unresting, envious eyes Germany's every movement, couched ready to spring at any moment. It had been a keen contest and a long one—that between European diplomats for the control of the Near East—and the clash came at last with an assassination in Serbia and then followed the world calamity. But, sirs, what were those small opportunities and plans of Germany as she, surrounded by hostile powers, cautiously sought to push her way southeastward, compared with the vast possibilities of greater dominion which will lie extended before her after the ratification of this treaty? This new-armed coalition which we plan will set up a new balance of power, but will Germany be weakened or can she by it be isolated?

Does the new international scheme substitute true international cooperation for the common welfare for international competition for selfish and imperialistic aims? This plan surely preserves the old order of competition in armaments, in military power, in the extending of spheres of influence, in plans for a greater domain. How will Germany be placed in this new competition? Will there be no opportunity for her diplomacy and for the secret machinations of those who were her military overlords? Why, sirs, this treaty gives her unparalleled opportunity, which it is hardly conceivable that she will not embrace.

In the first place, we play into the hands of her former military masters by making with her people the very kind of peace these military lords warned them we would impose—a peace which humiliates, enslaves, and places burdens upon the masses of the people almost too heavy to be borne, and then by the six months' starvation of her women and children during the armistice we put a more bitter hatred, the very iron into the souls of her men which makes them fit material to be forged into a mighty weapon by these military masters. Of Russia, on the east, once her mighty competitor and adversary, we have by our incompetence and folly made an enemy, and she, by her wiles, has made a friend. Having, because of ignorance and prejudice, alienated from the Allies the great Russian peoples, we now, as if that were not enough, despoil China to enrich Japan, and turn deaf ears to the cries of helpless Korea, craving justice and ambitious for that very liberty which our own missionaries have taught her to love, while through Russia, China, Korea, and through Tibet and friendly Turkey in Asia the way is open for Germany to cooperate with outraged, starving, revolutionary India and Egypt, already in rebellion. Great Britain sees the peril, and now seizes Persia for protection, thus irritating France and increasing the enmity of the eastern powers. Ratify this treaty, sirs, and you squarely divide the Occident from the Orient and make all the nations of the east, except Japan, with their all but limitless resources of man power and territory, the natural allies of Germany. You place the Germans, with their unusual capacity for military and commercial organization, in command of a situation which might be used by them for the destruction of the western civilization. I submit herewith a synopsis which will roughly indicate, as it is only approximate, my views as to what will be the new realignment of nations after the formation of our coalition, outside of which will be so many other nations which must of necessity and in self-defense form a coalition in opposition.

Principal nations inside of our proposed league or coalition.
United States	100,000,000
United Kingdom, less Ireland	41,126,040
France	39,602,258
Belgium, 1910	7,423,784
Italy	36,546,437
Portugal	5,957,985
Poland	12,247,600
Roumania	7,508,009
Greece	4,821,300
South Africa	8,256,810
Australia	4,895,894
New Zealand	1,099,449
Japan	60,666,777
Canada	7,206,643
Bolivia	2,889,970
Brazil	24,618,429
Cuba	2,627,536
Ecuador	1,323,900
Total	368,818,821

Principal nations outside of our proposed league or coalition.
Ireland	4,390,219
Austria	28,718,928
Hungary	22,784,531
Bulgaria	4,337,516
Germany, 1914 (estimated)	67,812,000
Luxembourg	259,891
Montenegro	436,789
Russia	148,303,000
Turkey	1,891,000
Egypt	15,969,000
Asiatic Russia	21,632,000
Asiatic Turkey	19,382,900
China	320,650,000
Korea	16,913,224
Indian Empire	315,156,396
Afghanistan	6,380,500
Argentina	7,885,237
Mexico (estimated)	15,501,684
Spain	19,950,817
With a total population of	1,038,355,632

There should probably be included in the list of nations outside of this proposed league or coalition, the aggregate population of which I have estimated to be about 1,038,355,000, over 100,000,000 of population, representing the peoples of Africa, outside of Egypt and South Africa, who will really have no voice or representation in our league under the proposed organization.

There are several of the more important European countries whose alignment with one or the other of these two groups will for a long time remain doubtful. I refer particularly to—

Norway, with a population of	2,391,000
Sweden, with a population of	5,521,000
Denmark, with a population of	2,775,000
Holland, with a population of	5,945,000
With a total population of	16,632,000

Not only will the treaty create a division of the world into two coalitions, but careful examination of and reflection upon this list will make it clear that practically every country of those outside of the proposed league or coalition has some real present or some past historic grievance against one or more of the members of the league. It would be impossible within a reasonable time to review or even enumerate these grievances, some of which will be at once apparent, and others of which, if less immediately apparent, are no less real. To our enemies during the war, who must remain our open and avowed enemies, as we are to be theirs under the provisions of this treaty, we have driven Russia by our Quixotic and irrational policy of military intervention, while Ireland, Egypt, the Indian Empire, China, Korea, Afghanistan, Mexico, and Spain are, because of the circumstances, both naturally and by the terms of the treaty sympathetic with those enemies.

Sirs, a wise statesmanship must be guided by practical considerations as well as by high ideals, and it would be difficult to prove that to be a wise diplomacy which would place the United States in an armed coalition with countries possessing aggregate populations of, as I have indicated, only 368,818,811 in opposition to a possible coalition against it of nations possessing an aggregate population of 1,038,355,632, in view of the fact that ours, the smaller coalition, is formed in large part for the exploitation of and for the purpose of holding territory wrested by force, and with utter disregard of justice or of right, from those peoples in the other coalition who possess an overwhelming superiority of men and territory, and that the smaller coalition thus insolently assumes the right to dictate to and control the peoples who are not to be admitted.

It has always been the guiding policy of this Nation never to fear to stand in the minority or alone for international justice and righteousness; but we, who have always feared to act even with a majority for the sanction and perpetuation of injustice, should not now be criticized for refusing to stand with a small minority of the peoples of the world in the defense of a plan which, because of its injustice, has incurred the condemnation of the overwhelming masses of mankind. By the very nature of the covenant we by ratifying it invite disaster.

> Thrice is he armed that hath his quarrel just,
> And he but naked, though locked up in steel,
> Whose conscience with injustice is corrupted.

Sirs, as we sit here, out beyond the Atlantic, beyond the territorially tiny United Kingdom, beyond the devastated fields of France, beyond the vanquished and famishing Central Empires, beyond distracted Poland, beyond the Carpathians and the vast plains where Russia and Siberia, our new and mighty enemies, lie; still far beyond there stretches the vast domain of the half-slumbering, taciturn, infinitely patient, but now restlessly stirring East, the vast, mysterious Orient, whose uncounted millions, with sad, all-seeing eyes, burning with the deep wisdom of the centuries, with hearts on fire, with piled-up decades of unrequited wrongs, now gaze so fixedly, suspiciously, and cynically at us to see how much is after all our true devotion to those principles of justice which we have praised, and whether, with this small plan devised by self-sufficient and complacent men of reactionary thought, we can compose a world distracted with war and turbulent with revolution.

European statesmen—men dominated by bigotry, hatred, intolerance, criminal ignorance, colossal egotism, and acting with utter lack, it seems to me, of a true confidence in the capacity of their fellows for self-government, and without true faith in the common destiny and brotherhood of man, together with an utter failure to comprehend the awful lessons of this war—have devised this plan, which squarely divides the East from the West, and which, sirs, if it shall be ratified, in the end may cause the "Star of Empire" on its further unresting westward way to pause once more above China, Egypt, and India, first cradles of the race.

TREATY CONDEMNED BY COMMON JUDGMENT OF MANKIND.

I wish that more of our people might realize the fact that this treaty and this covenant, devised by a few men to serve special and narrow interests, have been met by the condemnation of the common judgment of the overwhelming majority of mankind. I have already referred to the fact that nations with populations aggregating more than a billion of people, indeed, more than two-thirds of all the inhabitants of the earth, are either merely excluded from the league or are directly injured by it, and hence must be, of course, in opposition to it. But, in addition to this, men of liberal mind everywhere, who have carefully examined its provisions, find themselves compelled to denounce both the method and the whole nature of the plan. No more eloquent condemnation of it could be written than that contained in the manifesto of Gen. Smuts, the one figure who loomed in stature so greatly above the men who were assembled working out their narrow plans at the peace table at Paris. I quote from the manifesto:

> I have signed the peace treaty not because I consider it a satisfactory document but because it is imperatively necessary to close the war. * * * The promise of the new life, the victory of the great human ideals for which the people have shed their blood and their treasure without stint, the fulfillment of their aspirations toward a new international order and a fairer, better world are not written in this treaty. * * * There are territorial settlements which will need revision. * * * There are punishments foreshadowed over most of which a calmer mood may yet prefer to pass the sponge of oblivion. There are indemnities stipulated which can not be exacted without grave injury to the industrial revival of Europe, and which it will be in the interests of all to render more tolerable and moderate. * * * The abolition of militarism * * * in this treaty is unfortunately confined to the enemy.

The French Liberals have been active in their opposition to the scheme, as they are convinced that the league does not meet with the requirements for a true society of nations, and that the treaty is not in harmony with the 14 points as specifically laid down by President Wilson.

[From the New York Times, Apr. 12, 1919.]

FRENCH LABOR BODY AGAINST THE LEAGUE—SAYS IT IS NOT WILSON'S—CONDEMNS POLICY OF ARMED INTERVENTION AND BLOCKADE.

PARIS, April 11.

A placard was posted through Paris to-day by the General Federation of Labor, entitled "An appeal to public opinion and the workers." It contains the following reference to the league of nations:

"Our diplomats offer us a project of a league of nations which is not the society of nations such as was prescribed in the 14 points of President Wilson. The peoples of the entire world in their thirst for justice acclaimed these 14 points and we accepted them. The French working class, faithful to its conception of a war on war, rises against the sabotage of peace."

The placard condemns the policy of blockade constraints and political and armed interventions. It protests against the expedition to Russia, and asks for the conclusion of a real peace to which all peoples can subscribe.

On May 11, 1919, the general assembly of Socialists, an important political body, at Paris, adopted resolutions against the peace treaty, in which it was stated:

Justice is violated in nearly every phrase.

The Labor-Socialist conference at Berne condemned the treaty.

[From the New York Times, May 14, 1919.]

Failure to include Germany and Russia in the league of nations, the statement asserts, must be righted speedily if the league is to be made effective for preventing war. The limitations of German armaments without application of restrictions to other nations also is criticized, and the attention of the labor world is called to the danger resulting from the establishment of the boundaries of Poland, which, it is held, does violence to the rights of peoples to choose their political allegiance, and, by separating German States into two separate parts, these things are said to create a danger which will remain a source of trouble and ill will.

The callous handing over of Shantung, with its resources and 40,000,000 to 50,000,000 Chinese, to Japanese economic control can not be passed over in silence. The statement says:

"This peace is not our peace. The nations are still menaced by the policy of the victors in sharing the spoils without thought of the inevitable consequences."

The Women's International Conference for Permanent Peace at Zurich sent the following communication to the peace conference:

[From the New York Globe, May 15, 1919.]

By guaranteeing the fruits of secret treaties to the conquerors the terms of peace have tacitly sanctioned secret diplomacy, denied the principle of self-determination, recognized the rights of the victors to the spoils, and created all over Europe discords and animosities which can only lead to future wars. "By demanding disarmament from one set of belligerents only the principle of justice is violated and the rule of force continued. By the financial and economic proposals 100,000,000 people of this generation in the heart of Europe are condemned to poverty, disease, and despair, which must result in the spread of hatred and anarchy within each nation."

The Italian Liberals have also expressed similar convictions.

BRITISH MASSES OPPOSE SCHEME.

Sirs, the people of the United States have been deceived by the men who had selfish interests to serve, by the American autocrats and British lords who have been controlling the news agencies, censoring the cables, and suppressing those facts which they thought too tough for the unsophisticated understanding of the American people. We have been kept in ignorance of the true conditions in Europe, but, in various ways, we have learned enough to fill us with a deep distrust for the methods of the reactionaries who are fathering this scheme, but also with a hope and confidence that the liberal-minded, liberty-loving men of England are in perfect unity with their liberal-minded, liberty-loving brothers of this great Republic in their aspirations for a better world order and in their unqualified repudiation of this unholy plan. This treaty is, from a selfish standpoint, highly advantageous to England, and, in a large sense, inimical to the interests of all other nations, and it is for this reason that men who feel a pride in the spirit, in the achievements, in the best traditions of the English race, may well rejoice over the fact that in this world crisis there are millions of men in England to whom the principles of justice mean more than mere temporary advantage unjustly gained, and who are hence opposing this plan which would immensely strengthen the British Empire, because it seems to them to violate those principles of liberty, justice, and humanity which have always been so dear to every unperverted English heart. The view of the masses of Englishmen seems to be expressed in a statement in the London Herald of May 8, 1919, which I quote:

There is no honor left for any of us. The league of nations is a body without a soul. President Wilson has been beaten. He forced public acceptance of his ideals on the other powers, but they have beaten him secretly. He compromised on essentials, and therefore the details have gone astray. From the moment he abandoned the first of the 14 points he abandoned them all.

I quote also from J. L. Garvin, in the English Sunday Observer, of May 10, 1919:

These terms give no fundamental solution to any European problem. They resolve in the vicious circulence of the old diplomacy, they repeat the fatal precedents which have always led back to war and made the end of one struggle the direct cause of another. There will be quarrels, conspiracies, agitations, assassinations, revolutions, and collapses.

I quote the following from the London and Manchester Daily News, of September 13, 1919:

But the golden moment was lost. Europe needed food, and work, and peace to heal its wounds. But it was denied these things. Its wounds were kept open and inflamed. Six precious weeks were wasted on the "Hang the Kaiser" election in this country, an election in which the mind of the nation, instead of being moved to great issues, was saturated with the basest appeals to revenge and ignorance, and we emerged from that saturnalia to the discussion of peace with the atmosphere poisoned by false issues and shameful commitments. We have never recovered from the indelible crime. It involved us in the French peace of revenge instead of the American peace of healing, and its fruits are scattered over Europe in famine, disease, revolution, war, and all the miseries of a great continent collapsing deeper and deeper into barbarism. President Wilson got his league of nations, but he got it at a price that threatens to make it little more than the pious aspirations of the Holy Alliance. Under French inspiration we plunged, with Mr. Churchill joyously leading, into the infamous war on Russia, which will live as the most shameful chapter in the history of this country. French generals were discovered prancing over Europe like conquerors, and our own troops, under the impulse of an insane imperialism, were pushed forward into advantures beyond Bagdad and into Turkestan which was ingeniously disguised under the name of Transcaspia.

BRITISH LABOR PARTY DEMANDS AMENDMENTS.

I have not seen in any of the American daily newspapers any discussion of the most important fact that the British Labor Party, representing, it is estimated, about 20,000,000 of the citizens of the United Kingdom, has advocated amendments to the covenant of a most vital character, which, if adopted, would alter the whole nature, structure, and purpose of the covenant plan. There can be no doubt that the British Labor Party now directs the destinies of England and that at the next election it will come into full control. Indeed, I am informed that even the conservatives are inclined to look with favor upon the British Labor Party coming into power. No adequate conception of conditions in the United Kingdom can possibly be obtained by a perusal of the American newspapers, and my knowledge of the situation there has been gained from the personal communications of my brother, Mr. Royal Wilbur France, an attorney, of New York City, who went to England on professional business in the spring months of this year, and whom I requested to put himself in touch with the thought and feeling of the real present leaders of Great Britain toward the great international problem, and it was to comply with his request for a statement of the position of the British Labor Party toward the league of nations that the following manifesto was issued by the joint secretaries. Until this manifesto was brought back and given some publicity by the press most of us here were under the impression that the people of England were practically unanimous for the league. I ask that this manifesto may be printed in the RECORD at this point of my remarks:

[Trade-Union Congress and the Labor Party. Special national conference to consider the Allies' proposal for the league of nations will be held at Central Hall, Westminster, S. W., on Thursday, Apr. 3, 1919. Chair to be taken at 10.30 a. m. by Mr. G. H. Stuart Bunning, M. P., chairman of the parliamentary committee.]

LEAGUE OF NATIONS COVENANT.

The joint committee, having considered the text of the league of nations covenant, are of opinion that it is defective in certain important particulars and required to be amended to bring it into conformity with the proposals of the international working class movement. The league of nations, in order to establish and maintain world peace, must be based on direct representation from parliaments, and not merely from governments, so as to secure and maintain its democratic character and prevent it being used as a buttress to executive authority; it should include all the nations of the world willing to join in creating it and accepting its obligations. It should contain provisions for control of armaments, definitely declared to be a step toward national disarmament, for freedom of trade, and for carrying into effect an international labor charter.

Oh, Senators, do you realize what it means when a great political party, which is soon to come into power in England, should write a sentence like this:

It should impose upon the signatory nations the responsibility of holding colonies and dependencies in wardship for the purpose of training and educating them in political qualities which will enable them ultimately to practice self-determination, and, in accordance with the proposals in the labor war aims, this provision should apply to all such colonies and not merely those lately under German control. On these points we regard the league of nations covenant, issued from Paris on February 15, as defective and unsatisfactory, and we are of opinion that the British representatives at the peace conference should be called upon to propose and support amendments which will alter the scheme in accordance with the above conditions and so make it acceptable to the democracies of the world.

Further, the joint committee is strongly convinced that the immediate and total abolition of conscription in all countries is an inseparable part of a successful league of nations. We consider that the gigantic military estimates recently presented to the House of Commons are conceived in the old spirit which brought about the war and has been discredited thereby; they are calculated to fasten compulsory military service on this country, and as a consequence on other countries, as a permanent part of national policy. In our judgment, therefore, the Government should be pressed to reduce these estimates and to instruct its delegates at the peace conference to work for the total and universal abolition of compulsory military service.

The joint committee will circulate to all the affiliated organizations at the earliest possible moment the full text of the league of nations covenant with the amendments which we consider necessary.

Affiliated trade-unions, socialist societies, and cooperative societies may send one delegate for every 2,000 members or fraction thereof. Voting cards will be issued on the basis of one card for every 1,000 members or fraction thereof upon which affiliation has been paid. Affiliated local labor parties or trades councils may send one delegate and shall be entitled to one voting card for each delegate. A fee of 2/6 must be paid for each delegate.

Delegates' forms are inclosed herewith and should be returned immediately.

Yours, faithfully,

C. W. BOWERMAN,
A. HENDERSON,
Joint Secretaries.

32 AND 33 ECCLESTON SQUARE, Westminster, S. W.

I also hold in my hand a document which contains the amendments which were considered by the joint committee of that party to be necessary in order that the fundamental defects of the league of nations plan might be remedied, these amendments being calculated to alter the purpose, method of organization, control, and operation of the league. The essential points contended for by the British Labor Party are, first, that the league of nations should be a society made up of all the nations; second, that there should be a democratic control of the league by a body of delegates chosen from the national parliaments; third, that all colonies should be held in wardship to be fitted by education and civilization for ultimate self-determination; fourth, the abolishment of conscription and the making compulsory the reduction of national armaments.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will it disturb the Senator if I ask leave at this point to insert a statement from a Japanese newspaper on the character of the Crown or the King in Japan, the imperial authority?

Mr. FRANCE. It would be highly pertinent to what I am saying.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is a translation of an editorial in the Niroku, a Japanese newspaper, published in the Japan Advertiser on May 9, 1919:

The imperial family of Japan is as worthy of respect as God, and is the embodiment of benevolence and justice. It is the parent not only of her 60,000,000 but of all mankind on earth. The league ofnations, proposed to save mankind from the horrors of war, can only attain its real object by placing the imperial family of Japan at its head, for to attain its object the league must have a strong punitive force and a supernational and superracial character, and this force can only be found in the imperial family of Japan.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield to me a moment?

Mr. FRANCE. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Apropos of the statement made by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN], I think he should take into account the fact that many of the writers in Japan speak in a superlative way, and the whole literature of Japan, or at least the political literature of Japan, does not support the proposition that the Emperor is regarded as ruling by divine right. I concede that there are a few of the Japanese who take that position, but Japan is fast becoming a liberal empire, and the present premier of Japan, Mr. Hara, entertains as liberal views in regard to democratic principles and the triumph of them as almost any statesman in the democratic nations of this hemisphere or of Europe.

Mr. FRANCE. If that be true, I would say to the Senator that, inasmuch as the British Labor Party, which will shortly come into power, favors a democratic or popular control of the league, if Japan would also favor such democratic control, the Senate of the United States would seem to be the only body standing in the way of such democratic control, since France and Italy seem not to be opposed.

Mr. KING. I do not know whether that is a challenge to any position which I assumed or whether it calls for a reply. If the latter, it would be impossible, in the time which would be permitted without trespassing upon the time of the able Senator, for me to make reply. But I submit, and I think I speak for the minority side, at least, and for many of the majority, that the Senate of the United States regards the league of nations as a democratic platform, so to speak, and not reactionary in the sense that is implied by the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. FRANCE. In that respect the several Senators who entertain that view differ with the 20,000,000 of men in the British Labor Party, and I believe differ with the great masses of the American people who are devoted to the principles of democratic control throughout every department of Government, and who feel that a control of international affairs by a council of nine men not to be elected by the people but to be appointed by Governments would be both undemocratic and dangerous.

As I consider these amendments suggested by the British Labor Party most important, I ask that they be printed in the RECORD at this point as part of my remarks, the articles to which the amendments refer being the articles of the original draft of the league.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Trades-Union Congress and the Labor Party amendments to the covenant of the league of nations Thursday, Apr. 3, 1919. G. H. Stuart-Bunning, chairman; C. W. Bowerman, Arthur Henderson, joint secretaries.]

Amendment to articles 1 and 2:

That the body of delegates should be chosen from the national parliaments by some such method as proportional representation, so as to secure an accurate representation of national opinion. Each nation should have five representatives and have votes upon a graded system.

Amendment to article 3:

That the executive council shall consist of 11 members, including representatives from the five allied powers and from Germany and Russia, and that it be so constituted as not to be independent of the body of delegates.

Amendment to article 4:

That the regulation of the activities of the league shall be under the control of the body of delegates and not of the executive council.

Amendment to article 5:

That the international secretariat shall be under the final control of the body of delegates and not of the executive council.

Amendments to article 7:

1. That, as this article contemplated the starting of the league without invitations being sent to Russia or any of the late enemy countries, the article be redrafted so as to provide that these countries may take part in the inauguration of the league.

2. That any country accepting the purposes, the constitution, and the obligations of the league may notify its willingness to join the league, and, if there be no objection on the part of a majority of the executive council, shall be admitted a member of the league; but if there be such objection, the decision shall rest with a majority of the body of delegates. The debates on this subject must be held in public.

Amendments to article 8:

1. That no armies should be raised by conscription.

2. That as "geographical considerations" carry with them policies of national defense by rival armaments, their mention in this article assumed a military menace which the league of nations ought to remove and not encourage.

3. That the manufacture of armaments should be under the direct control of the league, as well as whatever forces are necessary for police purposes.

4. That as there is no real security for peace which does not include national disarmament, a declaration to that effect should be included in this article.

Amendments to article 15:

1. That it be provided that the secretariat itself may draw the attention of the executive council to any matter which in its opinion may result in war.

2. That here and elsewhere the high contracting parties be bound to submit full information of matters in dispute, together with any pronouncements made upon them by the executive council or body of delegates, to the national parliaments concerned.

Amendments to article 16:

1. That wherever coercive powers are taken which may involve the interest of small States, provisions should be inserted securing for these States special consideration.

2. That before a state of war is declared the body of delegates shall meet and decide what course of action can best be taken.

Amendments to article 19—

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, the provisions of article 19 of the original draft of the covenant are identical with those of article 22 of the revised draft. The language of both articles is practically the same. This article deals with the subject of colonies and territories "which as a consequence of the late war have ceased to be under the sovereignty of the States which formerly governed them and which are inhabited by peoples not yet able to stand by themselves under the strenuous conditions of the modern world," and the doctrine is announced that to these peoples, colonies, and territories, "there should be applied the principle that the well-being and development of such peoples form a sacred trust of civilization, and that securities for the performance of this trust should be embodied in the constitution of the league." The plain implication of the language of this article is that these peoples who are not yet fitted for self-government should be held under tutelage until, by the application of a constructive colonial policy, they shall be elevated, educated, and fitted for self-determination. A careful consideration of the past colonial policies of the imperial nations, of the language of this article, and of these seemingly insignificant amendments to this article proposed by the British Labor Party will make it clear how revolutionary in their nature these amendments really are. I read the amendments:

1. That the provisions and obligations of this article be applied to all peoples in the position of those dealt with in this article.
